"A priest, called Henry Otho, was one day saying mass, in Durn, in the diocess of Wurtzburg, and, through his want of caution, upset the chalice, and the sacred blood was spilled all over the corporal. It appeared at once of the real colour of blood, and in the middle of the corporal was an image of the crucifix, surrounded with several other images of the head of the Redeemer, crowned with thorns. The priest was terrified; and although some other persons had already noticed the accident, he took up the corporal and laid it under the altar-stone, that it might decay in some time, and nothing more would be known about it. God, however, did not wish that such a miracle should be concealed. The priest was at the point of death, and remorse of conscience troubled him even more than the agony he was suffering; he could bear it no longer, but confessed all, told where the corporal was concealed, and then died immediately. All was found to be as he stated, and God wrought other miracles to confirm its truth. The magistrates investigated the whole affair with the greatest caution and deliberation, and sent an authentic account of it to the Pope, and he published a brief, dated the 31st March, 1445, inviting all the devout faithful to ornament and enlarge the church honoured by so stupendous a miracle.

"Thomas Treter relates the next miracle. Some Jews bribed an unfortunate Christian servant woman to procure a consecrated Host for them, and when they got it, they brought it into a cavern, and cut it in little bits on a table with their knives, in contempt of the Christian faith. The fragments immediately began to bleed; but instead of being converted by the miracle, they buried them in a field near the city of Posen, and went home. A Christian child soon after, who was taking care of some oxen, came into the field, and saw the consecrated particles elevated in the air, and shining as if made of fire, and the oxen all on their knees, as if in adoration. He ran off at once, and told his father; and when he found the fact to be as the child stated, he gave notice to the magistrates and the people. Crowds immediately followed him to the place, and all saw the particles of the sacred Host shining in the air, and the oxen kneeling in adoration. The bishop and clergy came at once in procession, and collecting the holy particles into the pixes, they brought them to the church. A little chapel was built on the spot soon after, which Wenceslaus, King of Poland, converted into a sumptuous church, where Stephen Damaleniski, Archbishop of Goesen, attests that he saw the sacred fragments stained with blood.

"Tilman Bredembach relates that there lived in England, in 1384, a nobleman of the name of Oswald Mulfer; he went to his village church one Easter, to receive his paschal communion, and insisted on being communicated with a large Host. The priest, fearful of his power, if he denied him, placed the large Host on his tongue, but in the very act the ground opened under his feet, as if to swallow him, and he had already sank down to his knees, when he seized the altar, but that yielded like wax to his hand. He now, seeing the vengeance of God overtaking him, repented of his pride, and prayed for mercy, and as he could not swallow the Host—for God would not permit him—the priest removed it, and replaced it in the tabernacle; but it was all of the colour of blood. Tilman went on purpose to visit the place where this miracle happened: he saw, he says, the Host tinged with blood, the altar with the marks of Oswald's hands, and the ground into which he was sinking still hollow, and covered with iron bars. Oswald himself, he says, now perfectly cured of his pride, fell sick soon after, and died with sentiments of true penance."

For the present we abstain from discussing whether Nicholas Serrarius, Thomas Treter, or Tilman Bredembach are writers of the first character or not, or whether the alleged miracles above narrated are worthy of belief, or on a par with the more modern wonders of Rimini. Our present inquiry, and, of course, the preliminary one, is a more practical one, and confined to the mere matter of fact—Are such miracles as these really believed in by the intelligent and educated classes of Roman Catholics in Ireland, or are they ranked by them among pious frauds, winked at by those in authority, as a short cut to the edification of the vulgar? We reserve our reasonings until we are better instructed upon the matter of fact. What do educated and pious Roman Catholics in Ireland really think or believe upon this subject?

We cannot close the first year of our labours without expressing our sincere satisfaction at the cordial reception which our pages have met with from all classes of our fellow-countrymen. We commenced those labours by undertaking to maintain the right of educated men to study the Holy Scriptures, and to discuss freely those differences which unfortunately exist among us; and we further undertook that such discussion should be carried on in the spirit of candour, fair play, and mutual good will. We look back with pride to the practical proof afforded in our pages that it is possible, even in Ireland, to conduct controversy on both sides with earnestness and ability, without degenerating into the vulgar declamation of polemic strife, or descending to personal scurrility. If truth and unity are ever to be attained, we feel more assured than ever that it will be through controversy, carried on in a mild and Christian spirit. In such a spirit we are, under God's blessing, determined to persevere. We hope, also, as we proceed, to render our labours not only accessible, but intelligible, to a still larger class of our fellow-countrymen, who are anxious to think for themselves, independently of priestly thraldom. We have been disappointed but in one point—that we have not been able to induce any Roman Catholic priest to reply to a single article which has appeared in our columns. We inserted a friendly challenge, in our first number, and repeated it again and again, to any priest or bishop of the Roman Catholic Church, in Ireland or England, to come forward and discuss, not orally, but in print, in our pages, in a spirit of candour and Christian kindness, the whole controversy. We announced that we did not require the writers publicly to give their names; so that, even if they failed, their Church need not necessarily suffer. We now ask our readers why not a single Roman Catholic priest has accepted our offer, and entered the field against us, while it is notorious that not a few of them have endeavoured to put us down in ways which, probably, they would be ashamed to avow? Why is this? We think our readers will scarcely believe that they despise our efforts, or think us their inferiors in learning or powers of thought. If truth be on their side, and they feel convinced that it is so, why should they not boldly come forward to defend it, and prevent their flocks from being misled by what must be sophistry and untruth, if their views are the right ones? We are still ready to receive their communications; and all we require is, that Christian temper should be preserved; and where authorities are cited, accurate references given to the volume, page, and exact edition, so that time may not be lost in, perhaps, a vain search. This we have always ourselves done, and shall continue to do, with scrupulous fidelity, being anxious only for one thing—the attainment of truth—and deeply convinced that nothing is greater than truth, and that ultimately it must and will prevail.

A copy of the following letter having been forwarded to us, we think it deserving of publication. We greatly regret that the arrangement contemplated in it was not carried into effect. We can conceive nothing more desirable for promoting a calm and dispassionate inquiry after truth than that the clergy of the two Churches should enter into amicable proceedings of this kind; and we heartily regret that the Rev. Mr. O'Mullane did not proceed with what he at first agreed to.

This letter raises a serious question, whether "the index of the Council of Trent" be in force in the Roman Catholic Church in Ireland. Some have affirmed that it is, others that it is not. This is a question which Roman Catholics in Ireland should wish to have cleared up: we invite communications on the subject. It will be better to publish the index itself, in connection with communications which throw light upon it.

"TO THE INHABITANTS OF THE PARISH OF GLANWORTH.

"DEAR FRIENDS—You are, perhaps, aware that recently a prospect presented itself that, by the mutual co-operation of the Roman Catholic clergyman of the parish and myself, an arrangement might be made, whereby the Roman Catholic translation of the inspired Scriptures might be brought within the reach of each of you; and thus you might possess, and search for yourselves the Sacred Volume. I regret that this expectation of co-operation for your benefit has been frustrated, by the Roman Catholic curate, on Saturday last, declining to carry out the plan we had agreed on a fortnight before. The reason which he assigned to me for this was, that I had in view 'ulterior objects, and a cunning design;' alleging that such was evident, from my expressed intention of providing also for sale the Protestant translation of the Bible. I cannot see how the exercise of my unquestionable right to supply to any who desire to purchase it a Protestant Bible should interfere with any benefit to be derived from the dissemination of the Roman Catholic version also. That I have 'ulterior objects' in view, in endeavouring to place the Bible within your reach, is no 'cunning design,' but an open and a candid one. My primary object simply is, that you should come to the knowledge of what the prophets, and evangelists, and apostles of our Lord taught and recorded. And my final aim is, that, through the knowledge of the truth, your souls may be saved in the great day of the Lord.

"That Mr. O'Mullane would persevere in his expressed intention of sanctioning the circulation of his own version of the Scriptures, I hardly expected. It would be a boon too large and liberal for Rome to confer—permission to purchase cheaply and unrestrictedly even their own version, without note or human comment. But in what position does his withdrawing from the arrangement leave the matter? Personally, Mr. O'Mullane has exhibited the liberality of his own sentiments, and has marked his opinion of the unreasonableness of withholding the Bible, by disavowing all opposition to the reading of the Romish translation of the Scriptures. You have, therefore, I conclude, his permission for obtaining and reading it, when and where you can. But the open sanction to its indiscriminate sale he is not permitted by his Church to give. Witness the 4th rule of the Index of the Council of Trent, and various other authorities. Opposition, therefore, between the Church of Rome and the Word of God is palpable: there is no mistake about the matter. Romanism and Scripture cannot stand together; one must yield the place; and Rome is determined she will not; and, therefore, if she can, the Bible must. However inconvenient it may be, surrounded by Protestant light and liberty, to avow this principle, it is evident that practically she acts on it; and withholds, as far as in her lies, from the people she can influence, a knowledge even of her own translation of the Word of God.

"Have you ever read the declaration of the Saviour, in the Gospel of St. John, iii. chap. 19 v. (Douay version)—'This is the judgment, because the light is come into the world, and men have loved darkness rather than the light: for their works were evil. For every one that doeth evil hateth the light and cometh not to the light, that his works may not be reproved. But he that doth truth cometh to the light, that his works may be made manifest, because they are done in God.'

"And again, John v. 39—'Search the Scriptures, for you think in them to have life everlasting; and the same are they that give testimony of me.'

"And St. Paul, in his 2nd Epistle to Timothy, 4th chap., 15 to 17 verse—'From thy infancy thou hast known the Holy Scriptures, which can instruct thee to salvation by the faith which is in Christ Jesus. All Scripture inspired of God is profitable to teach, to reprove, to correct, to instruct in justice, that the man of God may be perfect, furnished to every good work.' And Isaiah chap. viii. 20—'To the law rather and to the testimony. And if they speak not according to this word they shall not have the morning light.'

"Reading these plain statements of Christ our Lord and his apostles and prophets, can you reconcile the strenuous opposition which the Church of Rome exhibits to the free circulation of the Scriptures with a consciousness that her doctrines will bear comparison with the testimony of that word? No, dear friends; Rome knows well that her system and Scripture are irreconcilable, and THEREFORE she withholds the Scriptures from the mass of her people. Witness the fact, that the Bible is a contraband article in Italy. Witness the fact, that in Ireland the Bible is an unknown book among multitudes of Roman Catholics; and when the Word of God is spoken of, they often conceive the expression to refer to their own Prayer Book. Witness the shrinking from the performance of his late agreement, by the Roman Catholic curate of this parish, as well as his declining my proffered challenge to a fair and public discussion of our respective principles. Watch, and note whether any measures will be adopted for bringing your own version of the Bible within your reach.

"But Mr. O'Mullane further urged as a reason for withdrawing from the arrangement, that I would take occasion to speak to you on religious subjects. Well, what if I do? The freedom of speech of a British subject, and a Protestant minister, does not depend on his sanction to the circulation of the Bible; nor can his withholding that sanction seal my lips. One might suppose that if your principles be in accordance with the Word of God, a knowledge of that Word would fortify you against any attempt to overthrow those principles. I cannot see how withholding the Bible can weaken my cause, unless the Bible be in my favour. If, indeed, as I allege, the testimony of the Bible be a confirmation of the principles he fears I would disseminate among you, all is plain enough. But what is made plain? That Rome is necessitated to keep the people in ignorance of the Scriptures, that she may keep them in communion with herself.

"One subject more I must allude to. Mr. O'Mullane, in our recent conversation, attempted to work upon my fears. He warned me against speaking to you on religious subjects, on pain of your scorn. Scorn and insult my Master suffered for the truth's sake, and he has taught me, 'the servant is not greater than his master.' 'It is enough for the disciple that he be as his master, and the servant as his Lord. If they have called the good man of the house Beelzebub, how much more them of his household. Therefore fear them not; for nothing is covered that shall not be revealed, nor hid that shall not be known. That which I tell you in the dark, speak ye in the light, and that which you hear in the ear preach ye upon the housetops,' &c., &c.—John xv. 20, and Matt. x. 25, &c. But Mr. O'Mullane hinted at more substantial matter of apprehension. He little knows the provision which the Bible makes to prepare the Christian for all contingencies in the path of duty. He must surely have forgotten—when he warned me thus 'as a friend'—that there is another 'Friend who sticketh closer than a brother,' and who had previously warned me thus—'I say unto you, my friends, be not afraid of them that kill the body, and after that have no more that they can do. But I will forewarn you whom ye shall fear: Fear him which, after he hath killed, hath power to cast into hell; yea, I say unto you, fear him.'

"Mr. O'Mullane has warned me of scorn, and hinted at more serious consequences. I hold him answerable for either insult or injury, should such be offered. But such I do not anticipate. My experience of your uniformly friendly and courteous demeanour assures me that harmony and good feeling must continue to prevail between us, unless there be a strong stimulus applied to alter the genuine tendencies of your naturally kindly feelings. You will not consider me 'an enemy because I tell you the truth.'

"In conclusion, allow me to assure you of the entire cordiality with which I desire the promotion of your best interests, and of my studious endeavour to avoid all approach to personal offence; while I speak the truth, it is in love; and surely you have too much manly and honourable feeling to think evil in your hearts of an honest man who candidly and faithfully speaks his mind in the language of a gentleman and the spirit of a Christian minister.

"One request I must earnestly make of you—Ask God, for Jesus Christ's sake, to give to you and to me his Holy Spirit—that by him all prejudice and ignorance may be removed, in whichever quarter they may exist; that we may each be guided or preserved in the knowledge, and belief, and love of the truth; and that our precious souls may be saved through Christ for ever. I am, Dear Friends, your faithful servant in Christ,

JOHN ALDWORTH.

WARNER CHRISTIAN SEARCH AND THE FATHERS OF THE FOURTH CENTURY ON PURGATORY.

IN our number for June we published a letter from "A Catholic," asking that some one would publish in our paper the testimonies to the existence of purgatory which the Fathers of the first three centuries have left us.

This letter was answered, in our number for July, by "W. C. Search," who mixed up in his answer the Fathers of the three first centuries and the Fathers of the fourth century also. We then answered the proofs which "W. C. Search" gave from the Fathers of the three first centuries; and we stated our reason why on that occasion we confined ourselves to what he had brought from those three centuries—viz., because those only could be any answer to the letter to which he undertook to reply.

Our readers will remember, or, if not, by looking back to our number for July, page 82, column 2, they will see the result of our examination of the authorities which "W. C. Search" produced from the three first centuries. The result of our examination of them was as follows:—"We have now gone over all the witnesses that 'W. C. Search' has brought for purgatory, from the first three hundred years of the Christian Church. There are only two! One of them believed only after he left the Catholic Church and became a heretic; the other, who was always a Catholic, never believed it at all. We are now entitled to take it as established that this notion of purgatory was no doctrine of the Gospel of the Church for three hundred years. Whenever it came in afterwards, it was an invention of men."

To this no reply has been made: no one has attempted to question our proofs as to those two witnesses; and no one has attempted to bring any other witnesses from the first three hundred years. We are, therefore, entitled to consider the above statement as unanswerable until some one can be found to answer it.

At that time we left out "W. C. Search's" proofs from the fourth century, because they had nothing to do with the letter he undertook to answer; but we said that we would consider them separately on some other occasion, and we now propose to do so.

Here we ask our readers to refer to "W. C. Search's" letter, which they will find in the CATHOLIC LAYMAN for July, page 87, column 1. In the paragraph marked 4 "W. C. Search" quotes, from the historian Eusebius, the account of the Emperor Constantine's funeral. [We hope our readers always preserve the back numbers of the LAYMAN to refer to; but in case any do not, we here reprint this part of "W. C. Search's" letter.]

"In this manner did Constantine perform the last duties in honour of his father. But when he had departed with his guards, the ministers of God, surrounded by the multitude of the faithful, advanced into the middle space, and with prayers performed the ceremonies of Divine worship: the prince reposing in his coffin, and the people in concert with the priests, not without sighs and tears, offered up prayers to heaven for the repose of his soul, in this manifesting the most acceptable service to a religious prince. The deceased emperor was thus admitted to a participation in the religious rites, the mystic sacrifice and holy suffrages of the faithful.—Eusebius de Vita Constant., lib. 2."

The place from which this is taken is the fourth book, c. 71, and not the second book, as referred to by "W. C. Search."

We have already said that we never correct translations through mere pedantry. There is much in the above that is wrong, but we correct only what affects the argument. "W. C. Search" has marked these words in italics—"offered up prayers to heaven for the repose of his soul."

We have already observed how fond Roman Catholics are of putting in the word "repose" where the writer never put it. The Greek has no more than this—"Offered up prayers for the soul of the emperor." Even this might as well be translated differently—"offered up prayers for the life of the emperor." It might as well be translated of prayers offered for the life of the living Emperor Constantius as for the soul of the dead Emperor Constantine. But we are willing to take it as if it meant the latter; and then the question will be, whether these were prayers for a soul in purgatory or thanksgiving for a soul in heaven. And here we must observe, that "W. C. Search," for some reason of his own, leaves out a passage from the middle of his quotation, without giving any notice that he does so. And part of what he leaves out is as follows:—That God thus gave to Constantine "the things which were desired by him—a place in the memorial of the Apostles—the habitation of a thrice blessed soul, having equally glorified him with the appellation of the Apostles." Thus, it appears that the nature of this service was simply joining the Emperor Constantine in the same memorial, or remembrance, which they made of the Apostles themselves! Whether this were rightly done, or whether it were not rather a flattery of the deceased emperor to please the living one, is not the question here; but surely it can be no testimony that they who did this believed that the soul of Constantine was in purgatory! Were the Apostles, then, in purgatory? And when those flattering priests joined Constantine in the remembrance which they made of the Apostles, does that prove that they thought Constantine's soul was in purgatory?

Let it be remembered that this passage is none of our seeking; it is one of the proofs that "W. C. Search" brings for purgatory in the fourth century, because there was no better to be had.

The passage appears to us very strong, indeed, the other way; for the Emperor Constantine, though he had some good points, was far from being a holy man. If, then, there had been such a place as purgatory, he was a very fit person to go there; and since these priests never dreamed of his going there, it is clear they could have no notion of such a place.

"W. C. Search" next quotes St. Cyril of Jerusalem, also of the fourth century, as follows—"There (in the Sacrifice of the Mass*) we pray for the holy Fathers and the bishops that are dead; and, in short, for all those that are departed this life in our communion; believing that the souls of those for whom the prayers are offered receive very great relief (it should be advantage) while this holy and tremendous victim is upon the altar—Catech. Myst. 5, pages 297, 298. Read prior and subsequent to this quotation."

We have read as directed, and we find that all this is said of patriarchs, prophets, APOSTLES, and MARTYRS, as well as of holy fathers and bishops, and of all who died in our communion. Were all these in purgatory? Surely the Church of Rome at the present day will tell "W. C. Search" that the apostles and martyrs were never in purgatory at all. Hence it is clear, that commemorations which were made for apostles and martyrs, as such as for all other faithful departed, could have nothing to do with purgatory. Does the Church of Rome include apostles and martyrs now in her purgatorial prayers? Does she not say that it would be an heretical impiety to do so? Clearly, then, these "commemorations" were not purgatorial.

* These words are "W. C. Search's," not St. Cyril's.

"W. C. Search" thus quotes St. Chrysostom—"Not without reason was it ordained by the Apostles that, in celebrating the sacred mysteries, the dead should be remembered." "W. C. Search" points this in capital letters; and, of course, he thinks it of great force to prove purgatory. Does he not know that the Church of England and Ireland remembers or commemorates the dead in the very same way, at every celebration of the holy communion? "We also bless thy holy name for all thy servants departed this life in thy faith and fear." Why does he not quote this as a proof of purgatory? The Church of England and Ireland "remembering the dead" should surely be as good a proof of purgatory as St. Chrysostom "remembering the dead."

"W. C. Search's" quotation from St. Ephraim is not proved to be written by him. It is, in all probability, a forgery. The passages of Scripture quoted in it are enough to prove this; for he could hardly have given interpretations of Scripture so manifestly false. And even if this passage had really been written by him, it would not prove that he believed in purgatory. On the contrary, in his 12th Discourse, he affirms, "that there is no middle between hell and the kingdom of heaven."

No. 8. "W. C. Search" says, he abstains from quoting Origen. We are not surprised at this, as we have already shown that Origen's opinion on the subject is counted heretical by the Church of Rome itself.

"W. C. Search" says he also abstains from quoting Arnobius, of Sicca. We do not wonder at this either, as we know that Du Pin, the most learned man the Roman Catholic Church has had in that kind of learning, has given us this character of Arnobius, of Sicca—"It must be confessed that he did not perfectly understand the Christian religion when he wrote these books."—Eccles. Hist., vol. i., p. 147. Dublin, 1723.

He also abstains from quoting Basil and Ambrose. We do not wonder at this either; for we expect to be able to answer on them, too, when they are quoted.

"W. C. Search" concludes by quoting Bishop Forbes, of the Church of England; forgetting that Bishop Forbes never believed in purgatory, and that, therefore, his having used the expressions that he did is only a further proof that such expressions may be used by those who did not believe in purgatory; and that, therefore, those expressions have a different meaning.

The great mistake that runs through all such proofs of purgatory is this, that whenever Roman Catholics read of any prayers for the dead, or any commemoration of the dead, they always take for granted that it must be for getting the souls of the dead out of purgatory, even though the writers themselves say that it is for a totally opposite purpose. We have often exposed this fallacy in the LAYMAN, and no one as yet ventured to answer upon it. Is it not a striking fact that in all the proofs, such as they are, which "W. C. Search" brings from the Fathers of the first four centuries for the doctrine of purgatory, that purgatory itself is not so much as mentioned once in any of them? Could this be so if they really believed in such a place? Is it likely that Roman Catholics now, for the space of 400 years together, should never so much as mention purgatory once in any of their writings? Yet this is what we find in the early Church. Hence it is that Roman Catholic controversialists now, in trying to prove purgatory from the first four centuries, are obliged to rely on places which make no mention of purgatory, but are forced to rest their case on "commemorations for the dead," even though such commemorations, as in the case of Constantine, were clearly intended for souls supposed to be already in heaven.

We wish Roman Catholics would look at this fairly, and at once get rid of the absurd notion, that such remembrances of the dead are any proof of purgatory.

To enable them to do this the better, we quote here a case that has recently occurred. We have, in the Freeman's Journal newspaper, of April 2, an account of a solemn High Mass offered on that day for the late Dr. Murray, who had died on that day month. A sermon was preached at this very High Mass by the Rev. Mr. Meagher, P.P. of Rathmines; and how did this sermon begin? It began thus:—"With the holy dead all is well. St. Laurence has but embraced in heaven the last and greatest of his successors, and conducted him ere now, let us trust, to his place in the quires of everlasting jubilee: yes, with the holy dead all is well. . . Your city has lost a bishop, but has gained an additional patron and advocate in the skies." Now, it is clear that Mr. Meagher, when preaching this sermon at this High Mass, did not think it at all necessary to believe that the person for whom that Mass was offered was then in purgatory. Now, if the Rev. Mr. Meagher, in preaching thus, at this High Mass, had been openly contradicting the doctrine of the Church of Rome, in the presence of all the clergy and people of Dublin, would he not have been censured? We know that his preaching was not censured, but approved by all who heard him, both lay and clerical. Will any priest or authority of the Roman Catholic Church in the diocess of Dublin now pretend to say that the soul of Dr. Murray was in purgatory when that Mass was offered for him? Here, then, we have a plain and undeniable proof that the offering of sacrifice, and the making a solemn commemoration for a dead person, is no proof at all that the dead person is in purgatory. Well, then, when we read of any sacrifice or commemoration for a dead person, in the early Church, what right has any Roman Catholic to say that this is proof that that person was in purgatory, and that such sacrifice or commemoration could not be for any other purpose than getting the soul out of purgatory? We see plainly, in this instance, the falsehood and the fallacy of the argument. If the Church of Rome now thinks that there are other reasons for offering her sacrifice and making her commemoration now for souls that are not in purgatory, much more might the early Church offer her very different sacrifice, and make her commemoration for souls that she never believed to be in purgatory. How absurd, then, for any Roman Catholic now to say that sacrifice and commemoration for the dead cannot be for any other purpose besides getting the soul out of purgatory! Yet it is only by relying on this gross absurdity, contradicted even by their own practice at this present day, that any Roman Catholic can attempt to bring any other shadow of proof for purgatory from the early Church!

We commend this argument to the consideration of "W. C. Search;" and, until some one can answer it, we trust we shall hear no more of such proofs! for purgatory from the early Church.

Correspondence.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

SIR—In reading the CATHOLIC LAYMAN of July and August last, several matters therein seriously engaged my attention, each of which I shall consider in order; and, first of all, your reply to Mr. Aylmer's question, regarding the second marriage of "her that is put away." I am sure you answer candidly, and state fairly, the law of the land and the practice of your Church in these cases. But, then, another question naturally arises: the sincere inquirer after truth will be inclined to ask, how can the law of the land be at variance with the discipline or law of the Church? Is it not the same power that gives efficacy to both? Is not the Sovereign of England, pro tempore, the supreme head of the Established Church in Great Britain and Ireland? And no act of parliament can be considered the law of the land without the royal assent and signature of such Sovereign. These, or such like questions, every person inquiring after the truths of this religion will propose to himself. You say, the "ecclesiastical courts of the Church of England refuse these divorces." Then we are to understand that "the ecclesiastical courts," &c., do not acknowledge the acts sanctioned by the spiritual head of these courts. This does not show "the whole body fitly joined and compacted," &c. (Eph. c. iv. v. 16), nor does it indicate that the Church which ought to be "one body and one spirit" (Eph. c. iv. v. 4.), is careful to "keep the unity of the spirit"—Eph. c. iv. v. 3. Is it not, moreover, a fact, that in every case of a second marriage of "her that is put away," a clergyman of the Reformed Church is always found to administer the ceremony of such marriage? This appears to be a very strange feature in the Reformed Church, and one which ought to be shown as reconcilable to Gospel precept.

In page 81, July number, you ask—"What have the Fathers of the first three centuries to do with the Book of Maccabees?" That these Fathers have something to do with this book, may be seen in Clement Alexand., Stromat. Lib. 1; Cyprian, Lib. 2; Epist. 3 and 55 ad Cornel; and Origen, Lib. 6, page 290, et seq.; Euseb. Hist. Eccles. Again, with respect to purgatory, you ask—"What was the doctrine of Tertullian himself while he was a Catholic?" But in the interpretation of the passage which you quote from him, to prove what this doctrine was, I suspect you have made a serious mistake, to which I beg to call your attention. The words of Tertullian, cited by you, prove nothing, either for or against purgatory. When he says "grief for the dead is idle, and the impatience of grief is idle," he uses plain, unequivocal words, which cannot be misunderstood. He does not say that prayers for the dead are idle, or that sacrifice and alms for the dead are idle; and when you prove that "grief for the dead, &c., and the impatience of grief," &c., may be understood for prayers and sacrifice, the passage will bear your interpretation, but not till then. Tertullian does not affirm, as you state, that to pity them who are called away is to do an injury to Christ; but he says, "we do an injury to Christ when we do not contentedly accept their being called away by him, as if they were to be pitied." Saint Nilus fully explains the nature of that grief which Tertullian deprecates, and which the Christian Church discountenanced in all ages. He says—"To be grieved, to weep, to fast immoderately for the death of a relation, indicates unbelief and the want of hope. He who believes that he shall rise again from the dead will feel comfort, will return thanks to God, will change his tears into joy, will pray that he (the dead person) may obtain eternal mercy."—Lib. i., epist. 311, t. xi., p. 116.

In page 82 you reject the word "repose," which "W. C. S." puts into his translation of the passage he quotes from Tertullian; you blame him for using the same word again in Cyprian, "when it is, at least," you say, "a doubtful translation;" yet strange, you have not removed the doubt. "Upon falling asleep" is, at best, an obscure elucidation, and in perfect keeping with your notion of "refrigerium."

I request you will show from Scripture the progressive gradation of the felicity of the blessed in heaven.

Cyprian's words—"non offerretur pro eo, nec sacrificium pro dormitione ejus celebraretur"—evidently denote actions subsequent to the time of his (excedens) departing this life, and can leave no doubt as to their precise meaning.

The same Cyprian is still plainer in Epist. 52, page 72, where he says—"It is one thing to be cast into prison and not to go out till the last farthing be paid, and another to receive at once the reward of faith and virtue; one in punishment of sin to be purified by long suffering and purged by long fire (or, as some have it, diutine), and another to have expiated all sins by previous suffering."

Concerning the doctrine of purgatory, as taught by the Catholic Church in the third century, nothing can be plainer than the words of Origen.

His words are as follow:—"For if on the foundation of Christ you have built not only gold, and silver, and precious stones, but also wood, and hay, and stubble, what do you expect when the soul shall be separated from the body? Would you enter into heaven with your wood, and hay, and stubble, to defile the kingdom of God; or, on account of these incumbrances, remain without, and receive no reward for your gold, and silver, and precious stones? Neither is just. It remains, then, that you be committed to the fire, which shall consume the light materials; for our God, to those who can comprehend heavenly things, is a consuming fire. But this fire consumes not the creature, but what the creature has himself built—wood, and hay, and stubble. It is manifest that, in the first place, the fire destroys the wood of our transgressions, and returns to us the reward of our good works."—Hom. 16 in Jerem., T. iii., p. 232. For more on this same subject read Hom. 6 in Exod., page 148. Hom. 14 Lev. page 259.

In page 94, August number, your distinction between περι and υπερ is rather far-fetched, and will not stand the test of strict criticism; but waiving this for the present, we pass to your "correct translation" of the Vatican text, which, notwithstanding the importance you attach to it, proves very little, if anything, in your favour. Περι των τεθνηκοτων, you are found to render "concerning the dead," or "on account of the dead;" not a word about the living. There is as much said in the text about the unborn as there is about the living; and yet you say—"The sacrifice was offered, and the atonement was made, not for the dead, but for the living." You adduce the case of Achan as a precedent, in which you say—"There was sacrifice offered, too; for all his sheep and his oxen were burned." As ex parte statements prove nothing, I shall, if you permit me, place all the incidents of Achan's death before the reader. Approved version, Joshua vii. 24—"And Joshua, and all Israel with him, took Achan, the son of Zerah, and the silver, and the garment, and the wedge of gold, and his sons, and his daughters, and his oxen, and his asses, and his sheep, and his tent, and all that he had; and he brought them into the valley of Achor." Verse 25—"And all Israel stoned him with stones, and burned them with fire, after they had stoned them with stones."

For an holocaust consisting of victims such as those mentioned in the 24th verse above, you have neither precedent nor precept, in the law of Moses. Joshua had no order from God to offer sacrifice. The Lord said to him—"Neither will I be with you any more, except you destroy the accursed from among you."—Joshua vii. 12. No more was required, no more was done. Observe, the Lord does not call all Israel accursed; but he says, except you destroy the accursed, &c. The fourth chapter of Leviticus is next to be considered. Verse 2—"If a soul sin through ignorance," &c. Verse 3—"If the priest that is anointed do sin, according to the sin of the people," &c. Verse 13—"And if the whole congregation of Israel do sin through ignorance, and the thing be hid from the eye of the assembly," &c. Verse 14—"When the sin which they have sinned against it is known, then the congregation shall offer," &c. Verse 22—"When a ruler hath sinned and done something through ignorance," &c.

On a cursory perusal of the fourth chapter of Leviticus, it is easy to perceive that it relates solely to accidental sins, or sins committed by mistaking the laws, or the proper sacrifices and ceremonies, as ordained by Moses, for which they were bound to offer sacrifice when they saw their mistake. It is, therefore, necessary to show that Judas was guilty through ignorance, and participated in the sins of the slain. Neither does the sacrifice of Hezekiah (2 Chron. xxix, 21, 22, &c.), nor that of Ezra (viii. 35), bear any analogy to the sacrifice offered by Judas. In fine, there is not in the whole of the law of Moses any command to offer sacrifices of expiation for Israel on account of the idolatry of individuals. Idolaters were ordered to be stoned (Deut. xvii. 5): no other conditions annexed; no sacrifices prescribed.

I think from what I have here stated, it is plain, that if Judas offered sacrifice for the living, he did not offer that sacrifice in conformity with any prescript or ordinance contained in the law of Moses, and, therefore, the inference aimed at in your "correct translation," and which you made to depend solely on the adventitious support of that law, must, consequently, fail, not having the authority of such law to support it.

I will not now say anything about the right of Judas to offer sacrifice for the dead; but I will say, that the Jewish synagogue, both before and at the time of our Saviour, did practise praying for the dead.

I need not prove it; a clergyman of the Church of England does* it for me—Johnson, "Unbloody Sacrifice," page 292. Speaking of the practice of the primitive Church on this point, he says—"They seem to have learned this practice from the synagogue; for it is certain the Jews, in and before our Saviour's time, did use it"—prayers for the dead.

I think it necessary to remark, that it does not appear that Achan was guilty of idolatry. "When I saw," says he, "among the spoils a goodly Babylonish garment, and 200 shekels of silver, and a wedge of gold of fifty shekels weight, then I coveted and took them."—Joshua vii. 21. The sins were alike, you admit; therefore, the others coveted the donaries of the idols, and took them; they did not worship them. The writer does not say they did. And in Deut. vii. 25, 26—"Thou shalt not desire the silver or gold that is on them, &c., lest thou be snared therein, &c.; lest thou be a cursed thing like it." The word lest is here worthy of some consideration.

In the foregoing I have been actuated solely by a spirit of candour and impartiality; a question of such grave importance as that of religion should thus only be discussed.

Hoping your will excuse my lengthy epistle,

I remain, sir, yours sincerely,

EDMOND POWER.

In consequence of the difficulty we find in making room for long articles, the length of the preceding letter obliges us to endeavour to be brief in the remarks with which we accompany it. We regret this the less, however, as the subjects of which it treats have been so fully discussed in our pages before.

In a letter from Mr. Aylmer, published in our June number, into which our respected correspondent contrived to introduce a great variety of topics, he asked us how we reconciled with the New Testament our law of divorce, which permitted to marry her that is put away. The point being very irrelevant to the subject we were discussing, we thought it enough at the time to correct his mistake in supposing that there is any such law of divorce. Mr. Power now presses us with the divorces occasionally granted by the legislature, in cases of adultery. And without admitting, as he seems to require, that the connection of the Church of England with the State makes her responsible for every act of parliament to which the Sovereign gives assent, we have no hesitation in conceding that our Church does regard such divorces as valid, and that her ministers do not scruple to remarry parties so divorced. But the prohibition against marrying her that is put away (Mat. v. 32) evidently applies only to one who is put away contrary to Christ's command; and our Lord makes the special exception, "saving for the cause of fornication." We believe, indeed, that there are few subjects on which it would be more easy to prove that "the Church of Rome has erred" than in her theory that "marriage is a sacrament," and the deductions which she has drawn thence (in spite of our Lord's words) as to the absolute indissolubleness, in every case, of the marriage bond—a theory the strictness of which has been more than neutralized by her practical facility in the far more objectionable measure of annulling marriages ab initio. More important subjects of controversy have hitherto prevented us from devoting an article to this point. We hope, however, to be able to do so at no distant time.

Next in order to matrimony, Mr. Power is so ungallant as to take purgatory. A correspondent of ours had begged to be furnished with any passage in which the Fathers of the first three centuries spoke of purgatory. "W. C. Search" replied by a quotation from the Maccabees; at which we very naturally exclaimed—"What have the Fathers of the first three centuries to do with the Book of the Maccabees?" If Mr. Power wishes to take occasion of this question to discuss the canon of Scripture, we need not be afraid to meet him, only that we think it convenient to keep distinct separate subjects of discussion. There is no point on which the Council of Trent stands more plainly opposed to facts than in its decision which includes the Apocrypha in its canon. Our Lord and his Apostles used the same Old Testament canon as the other Jews of their time. St. Paul, who counts it one of the greatest privileges of his nation, that to them was committed the oracles of God, never accused them of unfaithfulness in this high trust. And it is demonstrable that the canon of the Jews of that time did not include the Apocrypha. Accordingly, some of the most learned of the Fathers do not include it in their canon. But when we shall have occasion to appeal to their testimony, we do not mean to quote them in the fashion used by our correspondent—"Clement Stromata, Book i., Eusebius Ecc. History." &c., which is much the same as if one was to quote Hume's History of England, without mentioning volume or page.—a mode of quotation which ought never to be adopted by any one who is willing that his references should be verified.

As to the remainder of Mr. Power's letter, we shall not continue to discuss further any of the questions which turn on the most correct way of translating different passages of ancient writers. In every dispute there must be a last word; and we are content to invite any readers who are competent to judge, to turn back to our previous articles, to which Mr. Power has referred, and then judge between us. But as to the great questions at issue, something more may be said.

Much of Mr. Power's letter is expended in bringing passages in proof of purgatory which, in point of fact, only prove that prayers for the dead were commonly practised in early times. We have already exposed this common fallacy (see p. 49). We showed that the primitive prayers for the dead did not proceed on the supposition of there being a purgatory, and that they were offered for the Blessed Virgin and the saints, who no Romanist now would assert were ever in purgatory. We pointed out (p. 59) that many were of opinion that, before the final judgment of the great day is pronounced, it is right to pray that our friends may then obtain mercy, even though we have reason to believe that God has already done what we ask, and that they are already acquitted in his sight; and we added, that prayers for the dead were offered because the happiness of the faithful departed is believed to admit of increase, as it certainly is incomplete as long as the soul is separate from the body. But Mr. Power himself has incidentally furnished us with the strongest proof that prayers for the dead do not necessarily imply a belief in purgatory. When he was anxious to give proof that the Jews practised prayers for the dead, he offers us, instead of quotations from ancient authors, the assertion of Mr. Johnson, in his "Unbloody Sacrifice." We cannot allow that the mere assertion of a strong advocate of prayers for the dead can be allowed to take the place of proper proofs; but the mere fact that there have been men professing warm attachment to the doctrines of the Church of England, who have advocated and practised prayers for the dead, is sufficient to show that such prayers by no means involve the belief in the doctrine of purgatory.

In our last number we exposed the practice of passing off Church of England divines as supporters of Romish doctrines, by the help of garbled quotations, completely misrepresenting the opinions of the writers appealed to. And we strongly suspect that, had Mr. Power seen with his own eyes the passage in Johnson's Unbloody Sacrifice which he cites, he would not have thought it fair, to say nothing about the sentences immediately before it. They run as follow:—

"The ancients did not use these prayers as if they thought of a purgatory: 'tis certain that this last is a modern invention, in comparison with the oblations and prayers offered by the primitive Church in behalf of their deceased brethren. They did not allow prayers to be made for such as they thought ill men, either as to principles or practice. They prayed for the Virgin Mary, apostles, patriarchs, and such as they believed to be like them."

The quotation given by Mr. Power, which seems most directly to apply to purgatory, is from Origen. We wonder he did not say from Saint Origen. If our readers should ask why the name saint is not commonly given to this excellent man and laborious writer, they will be told that it is because of several heretical notions which are to be found in some of his writings. Some of these relate to this very point, of the state of the soul after death. For Origen had picked up from the Platonists opinions as to the possibility of a purification of souls after death, which led him to conclude that the torments of hell would have a purifying influence on the souls of the wicked, and would, therefore, not be eternal—a notion for which he was justly condemned by the early Church. We doubt whether Mr. Power has done the Church of Rome a service by his attempt to trace the doctrine of purgatory to this source.

Lastly, with regard to the passage in Maccabees, we shall not enter further into the question of diversities of translation. Mr. Power seems not to have exactly understood the object of our reference to the case of Achan. Even if the sacrifice of Judas were offered for the dead, we have already showed that prayers for the dead by no means imply belief in a purgatory. But we said that there is every reason to think that that sacrifice was offered not for the dead, but for the living. The case of Achan proved, that the sin of individuals might bring ruin on the whole people. But the sin of the soldiers of Judas could not be atoned for by the people (as the sin of Achan was) by their putting the idolaters to death (Deut. xvii. 5), since these soldiers were dead already. A devout Jew, then, would find, in his law, no more appropriate guide for his conduct, under the circumstances, than that contained in Leviticus iv., and would naturally offer sacrifice, to avert from the living punishment for the sins for which, he feared, they had involuntarily become responsible. This, at least, is a rational account why Judas should have offered sacrifice for the sake of the living; but we defy any one to produce, in all the law of Moses, the slightest warrant for the offering sacrifice for the benefit of the dead.

In our remarks on Mr. Power's letter, we hope we have endeavoured to aim at the same "spirit of candour and impartiality" by which he has laudably expressed his own desire to be actuated.

ROMAN CATHOLIC CATECHISMS—THE USE OF GRAVEN IMAGES.

SIR—In your last number I pointed out how readily mistakes and inconsistencies arise in the opinions of Roman Catholics, from their neglecting to consult the original documents, which should alone have with them an infallible authority. I would now call your readers' attention to a misunderstanding arising from the same cause, connected, also, with the same subject, that of the second Protestant commandment, and the cause of no little irritation between the members of the two creeds.

This misunderstanding is two-fold—Protestants taking the manuals of instruction in most ordinary use, and sanctioned by ecclesiastics of rank, as representing the doctrine of the Church; and finding the second commandment wholly omitted, or extremely mutilated, somewhat hastily conclude that Roman Catholics reject a verse apparently not very favourable to their doctrine about images. On the other hand, Roman Catholics are indignant at being supposed capable of suppressing an admitted portion of the Decalogue, and offer an explanation of its practical omissions as inconsistent with the doctrine enunciated by their own Church as is the accusation they seek to refute. I think a reference to their acknowledged standards will show that both are alike mistaken. The Roman Catholic Church neither rejects this verse, as Protestants often fancy, nor considers it to have no distinct or additional force, beyond that conveyed in the first commandment, as Roman Catholics suppose, when they account for its frequent omission by saying, that its insertion would be useless and superfluous, and a mere repetition of the First Commandment in different words.

I need hardly say, that this important verse appears in every Roman Catholic edition of the Bible, and cannot, therefore, be supposed to be rejected by them; but it is also expressly declared to be binding on all Christians by the Catechism of the Council of Trent. This is so obvious, on the perusal of its exposition of the Decalogue, that it is not necessary to do more than refer to the passages.* The main point is, therefore, whether it can be omitted on the ground of its conveying no precept, or forbidding no sin, not already enjoined or forbidden in the third verse. I am not discussing at all the view that Protestants, or others exercising their own judgment on the passage, would be likely to arrive at; but I wish to elicit that interpretation which has been made for Roman Catholics, to which they are bound to submit, and in accordance with which they should deal with this fourth verse.

It is to be remembered that the Catechism of Trent, though professing to treat the two verses as forming but the one commandment, yet found it almost inevitable to expound them separately; and after commenting on the first—"Thou shalt not have strange gods before me"†—proceeds to explain the additional meaning of the second—"Thou shalt not make thee any sculptured image . . thou shalt not adore them, nor honour them."‡ Under the latter head it shows that the entire precept points to a "two-fold manner" in which the "majesty of God can be vehemently offended;" the first consists in worshipping images in the grossest form of idolatry, by making them actual divinities—and this may fairly be included in the injunction to have no "strange gods;" but the second is the impious attempt to express in form or colours the image of the true God. This is a command not at all included in the first, nor to be deduced from it by reason—if that were allowed—as a corollary might be from a proposition. I do not say that this is the whole of the true meaning to be gathered from the fourth verse; but it is an interpretation plainly put on it by a binding Roman Catholic authority, and manifestly showing that they held it to contain a prohibition of a sin—important, for by it "the majesty of God" would be "vehemently offended"—and a sin not elsewhere denounced in the Decalogue.

‡ Original Italian edition. Rome, 1567.

That such was their mind is clear from the subsequent passages, where they prove, enforce, and limit the exact effect of this "prohibitory part of the precept."* No effort of reason, without revelation, could know, with certainty, that it is forbidden to show out honour for the true God by raising statues in his name; to man it would seem but a fitting and just tribute to his sacred majesty. If it was thought necessary that the finger of God should write on the tables of stone the injunction not to take his name in vain—which our ideas of the respect due to his awful attributes might have led us to think superfluous—how shall we venture to omit, as unimportant, the fourth verse, which guards us against a sin into which our reason and nature would rather lead us than serve as any natural protection?

It seems an irresistible conclusion, that the Roman Catholic Church has decided it to be, at least, a distinct and important part of a precept of the Deity, and, though they do not adopt our interpretation, they give it sufficient importance to make its omission, by individual priests and teachers, an unwarrantable breach of their doctrine, as it certainly appears a violation of the frequent injunction applied to these very verses—"Thou shalt not add unto the word which I command you, neither shall ye diminish ought from it."†

As to the fact that this omission is common and usual, it is only necessary to ask for any of the cheap catechisms, in ordinary use among the masses, to be satisfied that the practice of the generality of priests has ventured to differ from the declared theory of their Church. I am not aware of any catechism in Italian that gives this fourth verse, for the translation of the Trent Catechism is not in use among the laity. German catechisms, of very large size, omit it also; and in France the commandments are usually taught in couplets, of which the following are the first:—

"1. Un seul Dieu tu adoreras, et aimeras parfaitement.
2. Dieu envain tu ne jureras, ni autre chose pareillement."

The only Irish one that I have seen with a translation makes the same omission,‡ and there are abundance in the English that follow the example. Is it surprising that Protestants give an unfavourable construction to so general a suppression, and is it not strange that Roman Catholics will not refer to the true standards of their faith, instead of allowing such perversions of their own doctrines?

IDOLATRY AMONG THE HINDOOS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

SIR—The anecdote, told in your paper for November, of the reply of a Tinnevelly Hindoo gentleman to a Roman Catholic priest forcibly reminded me of a question which I often asked myself, many years ago, when I first went to India—viz., "What is Idolatry?" that sin so universally denounced in the Bible. This question was suggested by the fact, that while idols were conspicuous in every Hindoo temple, and "under every green tree" by the road side, and while the Brahmins themselves were to be seen prostrated before them, they all, when questioned, declared they did not worship idols, but that they bowed down before them as the representatives of the absent deities, to whom, in reality, their homage was addressed.

This reply of the Brahmins, connected with the fact that the idolatry of Hindoos is considered in Europe an admitted fact, led me to examine the account given in the 32nd chapter of Exodus, of the first great apostasy of the Jewish nation, when they made the golden calf; and there I was struck with the expression, in verse 5, "to-morrow is a feast to Jehovah." The golden calf was, therefore, no new god, but intended as the representative of the Holy One, who had "brought them out of the land of Egypt;" for in the 8th verse, this power is attributed to their idol, though, as the people themselves well knew, that idol was not in existence, as an idol, when their deliverance from Egypt took place; they could not, therefore, have imagined that this calf had brought them out of Egypt. The nation were hardly so besotted as to think that; but they held it to be the visible representation of that power which had delivered them from Egyptian bondage.

The belief held by many, that the calf was supposed to be a god distinct from the true, as Baal or Moloch, and that the Israelites, in making it, had determined to change the supreme object of their worship, may have arisen from the expression, in the first verse, "make us gods," and that in the fourth verse, "these be thy gods;" but the word translated "gods" in both these passages is the same—אלהים—mentioned in the first chapter of the Book of Genesis as the Creator of heaven and earth; and it is with reference to this plural noun that Aaron, in the fourth verse, uses the plural pronoun "these," which would evidently be inapplicable to the single object (the calf) to which he was pointing.

The gross, material worship of a lifeless idol (such as Europeans, who have not lived in an idolatrous country, suppose to exist there) is rarely acknowledged, except by the poorest and most ignorant classes of the people. The Brahmins, to a man, repudiate anything so senseless, and even the lower classes are ashamed often to acknowledge it; while, at the same time, their dread of and reverence for their idols discovers itself on many occasions. Nor need this be a matter of surprise; for acts of power, motion, and knowledge are often attributed to these lifeless blocks, which, if true, would naturally obtain for them the greatest reverence. Thus, on one occasion, in a Bramin's house, in the town of Hoobly, in Western India, an earthen image was produced, very slowly and gradually. First a foot appeared (this was shown to the astonished populace, by the Bramin, as what had occurred during the previous night, while he slept); after a few days another foot was found beside it; and gradually legs grew on these; and, in the course of months, a perfect image of Vishnu appeared—self-created. Can we wonder if the populace worshipped such an image?

Europeans generally receive these and similar tales with such undisguised derision, that Hindoos seldom venture to tell them the stories which are current among themselves of miraculous cures performed by images, and of the acts of locomotion and supernatural power which are attributed to most of the idols throughout India; but these, remarkable as they are, are fully equalled by the tales generally current of Christian images in Papal Europe. To say nothing of ancient stories, that of the image of the Virgin Mary, at Rimini, in Italy (referred to in a former number of your paper), which moves its eyes (commonly called the winking image), is a matter of the present time. I have heard that this story was strongly reprobated by M. de Silvour, the Archbishop of Paris, as injurious to religion, and calculated to bring it into contempt. Whether the Pope is otherwise minded, or whether he has favoured the world with his infallible opinion, or decided that the miracle was true, perhaps some of your readers may be able to say. In the town of Tournay, in Belgium, there is, in one of the churches, an image of the Blessed Virgin, whose face is quite black. So unusual an appearance excited the curiosity of a gentleman of our party who was looking at the church, and he asked the sextoness the cause. She replied, that on one memorable occasion, when Tournay was besieged, that image of the Virgin had advanced to the ramparts, and, by catching the balls of the besiegers in her apron, had saved the town; but that the powder of the cannon had blackened her face as we saw it. The visit to Tournay which I here narrate occurred many years ago; but I conclude that "the black virgin" is there still. For the story which the sextoness told the priests would not be responsible; but for the state of the image they surely are, as it must have been coloured by their permission: and when images perform such prodigies of valour who can blame the people for worshipping them?

The charge of idolatry was one brought against the Romish Church, at a very early period, by Mahomed and his followers; and the contempt which they exhibited towards the cross was solely as an object of worship. They believed, too, that the Blessed Virgin was the third person of the Trinity; and though this was evidently an error, even in the corruptest ages of the Church, yet it shows Mahommedans considered that she received Divine honours from the Christians with whom they came in contact.

A friend of mine in India had a Mahomedan servant, with whom he used to converse freely on religious matters. This man once classed the prevailing religious systems of India as follows:—The Hindoos and the Portuguese worship images; the English and the Mohamedans worship God."

I am, sir, your obedient servant,
A RETIRED EAST INDIAN.

FARM OPERATIONS FOR DECEMBER.

(From the Irish Farmers' Gazette.)

Wheat.—We should hope that the greater portion of the seed wheat has been committed to the ground long ere this. Where that has not been the case, no exertion should be spared in doing so without delay; in no case should it be deferred till after Christmas, as after that period it will be getting late to sow any of the winter varieties.

Beans and Peas may still be sown; the best variety of bean to sow now is, the Russian, or the Heligoland, for the feeding of stock; the best for human consumption are, the early Mazagan and long pod.

Peas chiefly used in feeding stock are, the gray maple, Pennsylvanian, and strawberry; for human food, the early Charleton, early Hotspur, double-blossomed May and marrow-fat peas are best.

Storing Roots.—Take every advantage of dry weather, in pulling and storing Swedish and Aberdeen turnips, mangels, parsnips, and carrots, before they encounter severe frosts. Roots, particularly turnips and mangels, intended for late keeping, are much more injured by frosts than most people imagine; for, although no injury is perceptible to the eye, their keeping properties are much injured when exposed to severe frosts. The site chosen for their storing should be cool and dry, and the best aspect is that facing the north, as, when much exposed to the east or south, early sprouting is the consequence; whereas, if the northern sides of walls, ditches, or plantations are chosen, their sprouting or vegetation is prevented, as long as it is possible, next season. Roots intended for storing till a late period should be taken up very carefully, and the leaves wrenched off by the hand; the crowns will thus remain uninjured, which will be scarcely possible if those employed to trim them are allowed to do so with a sharp-cutting instrument. The tap-roots should not be cut off, neither should the outer bark or skin of the roots be cut or bruised; the roots may be packed on the ground in longitudinal heaps, about six feet wide at the base, and tapering up, about six feet high, to a single root at top. It will be of much service if some branches of brushwood are placed in layers through the roots; they will prevent them slipping and tumbling down, which without this contrivance is a fertile source of annoyance. Parsnips and carrots will be much benefitted by being packed in pit or river sand. After the roots are packed as above described, they should be well thatched. Roots may also be packed in cool, dry sheds or cellars, and in caves or pits, where the subsoil is dry. Stored as above, any of these roots will keep till an incredibly long period in the spring.

Milch cows should be kept closely in the house, with the exception of about an hour for exercise, during which time their byres should be made clean and comfortable; their food should be generous, for which they will amply pay. Alternate feeds of cooked and raw food are much the best—the cooked in the morning and at night, the raw at mid-day. Cattle thus taken care of are much more profitable than leaving them starving and shivering at the backs of ditches, or poaching the land, in fruitless endeavours to pick up a sufficiency of food, to say nothing of the inhumanity of the system.

Young stock should also be well and carefully housed and fed; they require an abundant supply of nourishing food—as much, or more so, than those full-grown—to be profitable to their owners; it is a ruinous system to keep stock on cold, bleak pastures; and the improving farmer who has once shaken off the sloth and indifference which too often characterize the generality of our brethren, and put his stock on better and more careful keep, finds—in their altered appearance, and the prices obtained at the early summer fairs—so amply remunerated, that he will hardly be tempted to return to old habits.

Pigs.—There is no description of stock to which cleanliness, warmth, and good keep are more essential at this season than fatting pigs, stores, and breeding sows, more particularly as we are under the impression that pigs, for some time at least, will be the best paying stock. Cooked turnips, cabbages, parsnips, carrots, mangels, with a liberal allowance of pea, bean, and oatmeal, or barley-meal, will not be lost on the pigs, but pay a liberal per centage.

Digging.—On small farms this is the time to dig all land not under crop; dig deeply and roughly, so as to expose as great a surface as possible to the ameliorating influence of the winter's frosts and thaws. In wet or in drained ground, the land can be dug in ridges, and in dry land it can be dug out without ridges; but in either case, deeply and roughly, not scratching it in the usual old, slovenly manner. It may remain so until the sowing time, when, if intended for grain, it may be sown and harrowed in without any further preparation. But the mode of digging that we most commend is, to throw up the land as it is dug into high and narrow drills, similar to those made for turnips. This mode can be adopted whether the land is in ridges, or with a plain surface without furrows; the advantages of this method are, that a greater surface is exposed to the frost, snow, and air; it lies so high, that it is quickly dry, and if intended for corn will break down early in the spring in the best possible condition; but if intended for a root crop the advantages are still greater; for if the land is thrown up into drills, 27 or 28 inches asunder, in the spring, there is no more to be done than deposit the manure in the drills as already formed, and split them with the spade, covering the manure from both sides, when the drill is formed again for the reception of the seed, whether parsnips, carrots, mangels, or turnips, &c. Care should be taken in the digging to pick out all scutch-grass and root weeds.

Odds and Ends.—Keep draining, digging, subsoiling, and gathering manure, for without a liberal use of manure the draining, &c., will be of little avail; therefore, gather and manufacture manure by every means in your power; let nothing be lost. Remove all crooked, useless, and cumbersome fences, and form new ones; cut down, plash, and lay all overgrown fences. Keep the flail, or thrashing-machine, busy, so as to have fresh and clean straw before the cattle. Scour and clean out all open ditches and ponds. Cut and bruise furze, which is an excellent food for horses or cows, when it can be obtained. Repair and paint implements, where required, and let the well-regulated labour of those dependent on him, and a clean, comfortable farm-yard, be the careful farmer's pride and pleasure.

THE DEAD HAND—MORTMAIN.

THERE is no subject which we think ought to be urged more frequently on the attention of Roman Catholic laymen than the obvious tendency which the leading doctrines and rules of discipline, by which the Roman Catholic Church differs from the other professing Christian Churches, have to promote and extend the power and influence of the clergy, and to enrich the great ecclesiastical corporation of which they are members. And when they remember that the same body which derives such power, influence, and wealth from those doctrines and that discipline, as far as they can, stifle and forbid all inquiry into and discussion of them, it surely should excite suspicion in their minds that the origin and foundation of those doctrines and rules will not bear investigation and discussion.

In the ordinary transactions of life, this undoubtedly would be the result. Take, for example, a familiar instance. If the heir to a large estate was told that his father had made a will limiting and restricting the rights the law would otherwise have conferred upon him; that, by that will, the possession of his father's inheritance was subject to conditions, and clogged with limitations, which nothing but the clearest expression of intention on the part of the parent would induce a court of law to give effect to; that, instead of becoming his own master at the age which the law recognises as the age of discretion, he was to remain in tutelage and under the control of guardians during all his natural life; that his conduct and actions throughout the whole of his existence were to be regulated by their wishes and directions. Would he not, in such a case, examine most scrupulously the authenticity and construction of that will? Would he not subject it to investigation, and test its legality? And if, on demanding inspection of the instrument imposing such restrictions on him, he was to be told by those in whose possession the will was, and who claimed to be the guardians appointed by it, that he should not be allowed any opportunity of making such investigations; what, we ask, would be his course under such circumstances? Would any man, in such a case, tamely acquiesce in the claims put forward by the alleged guardians? Would he quietly resign those rights which the laws of his country bestowed upon him, and yield implicit belief to the assertions of those whose interest it was to keep him in tutelage and ignorance? On the contrary, would he not vehemently suspect that the alleged will had no real existence, or was, at least, erroneously interpreted? Now, if such would be our conduct in the ordinary transactions of life, why do we not apply the same reasoning and the same inferences to spiritual matters? We all, in the words of Scripture, are heirs of God and joint-heirs of Christ; heirs of that will and testament delivered by God the Father through his Son, and sealed by his blood—joint-heirs of that eternal life revealed in that will. The Church of Rome and her priests say they are the appointed guardians and interpreters of that will; and, as they interpret it, the joint-heirship to eternal life is limited and controlled at the will and pleasure of themselves as guardians; and when the disinherited layman asks to see and inspect the will in question, these self-constituted guardians indignantly refuse to satisfy his curiosity.

We ask, therefore, Roman Catholic laymen, ought not this refusal to excite their suspicions as to the real contents of the will and testament of their Heavenly Father? Are they willing to resign their birthright at the bidding of those who say that birthright belongs only to those who submit in all things to their rule and governance? And when they find that every one of those doctrines, and all those rules of discipline which other churches reject as not contained in that will, tend materially to promote the power, influence, and wealth of those self-constituted guardians, surely the suspicion created by their refusal to allow free interpretation of the will assumes new force and increased strength, and ought to be removed only by the clearest and most unimpeachable evidence. That such is their tendency we will now endeavour to show, and for that purpose will notice more in detail some of the principal of them.

In ecclesiastical government and discipline the most marked difference between the Church of Rome and that of England may be found in the forced celibacy of the clergy, and in the recognition and encouragement of monasteries and nunneries. By the former of these the clergy are severed from all those ties which would otherwise bind and connect the clergy with their lay brethren. To the individual so severed the exaltation of the church is the only object of ambition. Shut out from the ordinary affections and charities of social life, his existence is wrapt up in that of the corporation to which he belongs. Is he pious? His piety hopes for the spread of religion through the extended dominion of the church. Is he ambitious? His ambition can only be gratified by the supremacy and exaltation of that body to which he belongs. Is he selfish and self-indulgent? That selfishness and self-indulgence finds its easiest gratification in the increased wealth and importance of the same body. Take, again, the institution of monasteries and nunneries. Their vows are vows of poverty; but that vow is only as to the individual member, and does not interfere with the acquisition of wealth by the society of which he is a member; and when we remember the age at which persons become members of those institutions, the class of society from which alone novices are sought, it would be, perhaps, impossible to devise institutions more calculated to accumulate wealth; and such, indeed, practically has been their effect in every country and in all past ages of the world.

Again, if we take the distinguishing doctrines of the Church of Rome in matters of faith, the result is the same. It is hardly necessary to point out how materially the doctrine of the infallibility of the church tends to exalt the clergy, who are the only recognised agents in disclosing and interpreting its infallible decrees. For though, theoretically they may say that the infallibility resides in general councils, or in the Pope himself, or in the received tradition of the church, practically the teaching of the individual priest, claiming, of course, to be in conformity with the doctrines of their church, and forbidding inquiry and discussion by the laity, is put forward by each with a claim to infallibility. Again, in the doctrines of purgatory, of confession, and of priestly absolution, not only is the priest exalted, but who does not see that, in them, unfailing sources are opened up for pouring into the coffers of the church the wealth of weak and frightened sinners? Tell the weak and pious devotee that the remission of his sins is in the hands of his priestly adviser—that by his absolution the pains of purgatory may be alleviated and abridged. His piety tells him that, notwithstanding all his prayers and all his desire to serve God, he is still but an unprofitable servant; and with all this consciousness of sin about him, is it likely that, at the approach of death, he would resist the exhortation to bestow his goods on those who would use them for the alleged good of his soul? Nor are the same doctrines less effectual with the profligate and worldly-minded. Tell such a one, when the approach of death warns him that he is soon to leave those pleasures and riches which constitute his happiness in this world, that his condition in a future state depends on the bestowal or withholding of the last rites of the church, and then suggest that his peace with God may be made by the devotion of that wealth he can himself no longer enjoy to so-called pious uses. Every feeling of his selfish and hardened heart is enlisted in favour of such a disposition of his goods. That very selfishness which never hesitated to sacrifice the interests of others to the gratification of his own desires, or the advancement of his own interest, will now make him sacrifice the temporal interests of those nearest and dearest to him to that which is now paramount in his thoughts—namely, his spiritual safety.

We might extend these observations more at length; but we have noticed them in this brief manner as an introduction to a document to which we hope to call the attention of our readers more in detail in succeeding numbers. We allude to the recent report, presented by the Mortmain Committee to the House of Commons. In that remarkable mass of evidence we have numerous instances of the practical workings of the Roman Catholic system. There we will find detailed how unscrupulously the emissaries of Rome pursue, with calumny and persecution, those who dare to dispute her claims to universal obedience. How indefatigably she prosecutes her great object, of bringing all matters, whether spiritual or temporal, under her guidance and control. How the vow of obedience and poverty becomes the instrument of extorting from the unhappy devotee that property, all claim to which was supposed to have been renounced on admission within the walls of the convent. And, above all, there will be found numerous and well-established cases, in which the weak and aged, in the very hour of dissolution, at the instigation of their spiritual advisers, and in many instances by their intervention, in actually framing the necessary documents, have forgotten the claims of relations and friends, and have impoverished their own families, in order to swell the wealth and promote the objects of the Romish Church. We hope to proceed with this subject in our next.

WHO WAS THE FIRST ABSENTEE BISHOP?

IN the first article of our first number, which formed the prospectus of our periodical, and, as it were, struck the key-note to which our other articles were to be attuned, we spoke of the misfortunes of Ireland, and the way to remedy them, as a subject which should engage our especial attention. It may, perhaps, then have struck some of our readers as an omission, that we, in our last volume, have not said a word about absentees. To give a dissertation on absentee landlords, however, would but ill harmonize with the other topics of our paper; so we hope our readers will be satisfied if we give them instead a few of our thoughts on absentee bishops.

It seems plain enough, that if an absentee landlord be a bad thing, an absentee bishop is even worse. The meaning of the word bishop is an overseer; and what supervision can be exercised by one who is habitually absent? How can one far removed from them keep a watch over the faith and morals of his flock? And if, even with modern facilities of communication, a non-resident bishop must be felt to be one who neglects his duty, what must have been the case in ancient times, when penny-postage, and railroads, and electric telegraphs were unknown, and when such things had not been imagined, even in fairy tales? Accordingly, the practice of non-residence was almost unknown in the primitive church; and there exist both canons of councils and sayings of Fathers condemning anything resembling it. "Having read the Scriptures," says St. Athanasius (Apol. i.), "you know how great an offence it is for a bishop to forsake his church, and to neglect the flocks of God." Pope Paschal II. says, in his 22nd epistle—"Bishops ought to be disentangled from secular cares, and take charge of their people; and not to be long absent from their churches." Even in later times, the second Lateran Council enjoins (Can. 10)—"That churches be not committed to hired ministers; but that every church, which has the means, have its own proper priest." And, again, the third Lateran Council directs

(Sess. 13)—"When a church, or the ecclesiastical ministry, be to be committed to any man, let such a person be found out for this purpose who can reside upon the place, and discharge the cure by himself; but, if it be done otherwise, then let him who has received lose that which he has taken contrary to the holy canons."

In after times, however, we know that the corrupt practice prevailed of a bishop wholly absenting himself from his see, enjoying, indeed, its revenues, and taking rank according to its dignity; but either wholly neglecting its duties or else discharging them by some hired substitute. It would be a pleasure, surely, at least, if we could find out who was the first to set an example of such neglect of duty, and if we could brand him with perpetual infamy. Full of these thoughts we took up, as our most trustworthy guide, Cardinal Baronius, the famous Roman Catholic ecclesiastical historian; and though, no doubt, there did not seem much use in looking at the early volumes, still, for fear of passing over the first delinquent, we thought it best to begin at the beginning. One of the first things that attracted our attention, as we glanced through the history of the first century, was the heading of the pages which were marked with the year of the Lord, the year of the emperor's reign, and also the year of the pontificate of the reigning Pope, St. Peter being the name of the Pope which first met our eye. On examining when his popedom commenced we found that he is stated to have taken possession of the See of Rome A.D. 45, in the second year of the Emperor Claudius, resigning then the bishopric of Antioch, which he had held for seven years before. He is stated to have been Bishop of Rome for twenty-five years—a length of time which no succeeding Pope has equalled; so that it has become a customary address to a newly elected Pope, "Thou must not expect to see the years of Peter." When we read this, it struck us how much less strict the rules of the church were in the apostles' time than they became shortly afterwards; for it was reckoned, in the primitive ages, a discreditable thing for a bishop to migrate from one see to another, and more especially from a poorer to a richer. Several of the Fathers inveighed against the practice, as a kind of spiritual adultery (giving up a poorer wife for a richer); and the same practice has been condemned by several councils—Nice, Chalcedon, Antioch, Sardica, &c. Thus Pope Leo I. decreed (Ep. 84, c. 4)—"If any bishop, despising the meanness of his city, seeks for the administration of a more eminent place, and upon any occasion whatsoever transfers himself to a greater people, he shall not only be driven out of the see which is anothers, but he shall also lose his own." Surely Pope Leo, and the other popes who made similar decrees, ought not to have been so severe, if they had only recollected how their own predecessor, St. Peter, had obtained the Bishopric of Rome by abandoning the See of Antioch, which he had formerly held. Doubtless, however, the apparent irregularity of this proceeding must be accounted for by the fact, that the discipline of the church was not so strictly maintained in the apostles' time as in the purer ages that succeeded them!

Let us, then, pass on from the question how St. Peter obtained the See of Rome, to examine how he administered it. And it is a curious fact, that though we read a good deal in Scripture both of St. Peter and the city of Rome after the year A.D. 45, we do not once read of the two being together. We read of St. Peter being at Jerusalem (Acts xv. 7) or at Antioch (Gal. ii. 11), where St. Paul "withstood him to the face, because he was to be blamed." There is reason to think that he was in Corinth (1 Cor. i. 12) and (as St. Epiphanius also agrees) in Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, Asia, and Bithynia, to which places he directed his general epistle (1 Peter i. 1). Many are also of opinion that his general epistle was written from Babylon, in Assyria (1 Pet. v. 13); but there is no Scripture evidence that he ever was in Rome. Of course we do not, like some Protestants, bring forward these passages as proving that he never was in Rome, but only that he did not constantly reside there. Again, when we read of the city of Rome in the New Testament, we have good grounds for thinking that St. Peter was not there. St. Paul directed to the Church of Rome one of his longest epistles; but among the numerous salutations which he sends at the end to the Roman Christians, by name, there is not one mention of St. Peter; and, indeed, we can scarcely doubt but that, if the Roman Church had enjoyed at the time the benefit of an inspired apostle residing among them as their bishop, St. Paul would have directed his letter to some church that wanted it more. Again we are told (Acts xxviii. 30) that St. Paul resided for two years at Rome; and we know that during that time he wrote several letters (e.g., Epistle to the Galatians, the Ephesians, the Philippians, the Colossians, to Philemon, and the second to Timothy); but though in these he sends several salutations from the Roman Christians, by name, to those whom he addressed, St. Peter's name does not once occur. In particular, St. Peter could not have been at Rome when St. Paul wrote (Col. iv. 11) respecting Tychicus, Onesimus, Aristarchus, Marcus, and Justus—"These only are my fellow-workers unto the kingdom of God which have been a comfort unto me." Or, again, when he wrote (2 Tim. iv. 11)—"Only Luke is with me." Or, again (2 Tim. iv. 16)—"At my first answer no man stood with me, but all men forsook me: I pray God that it may not be laid to their charge."

We were happy to find that, in inferring from these passages that St. Peter was not constantly resident in Rome, we had the support of Cardinal Baronius, who also gives very satisfactory reasons for his absence; for it must be remembered that St. Peter was an APOSTLE, and, as such, "it was his duty not to stay in one place, but as much as it was possible for one man to travel over the whole world, to bring those who did not yet believe to the faith, and thoroughly to establish believers." (Baron. Ann. lviii. sec. 51.) The Acts also contain full accounts of the earlier parts of St. Peter's apostleship; but in those days (Acts ix. 32) he is spoken of as passing through all quarters, and it is not likely that he got lazier as he got older. And we have in St. Paul a specimen of the work of an apostle. He says (Romans xv. 19), that from Jerusalem, round about to Illyricum, he had fully preached the Gospel of Christ; and even this did not satisfy him, for he designed (v. 24) going to Spain besides. Surely we cannot think that St. Peter was less active in doing apostles' work. Baronius gives us to understand that St. Peter left Rome at the commandment of the Emperor Claudius, that all Jews should depart from Rome; and, however strange it may seem that a Christian bishop, noted for courage, should abandon his see at the command of a heathen ruler, there can be no doubt that St. Peter was well employed when he was away. Baronius enumerates (p. 537) the names of a variety of churches which claim to have been planted by St. Peter or his disciples—Mauritania, Numidia, Britain, all Italy, Gaul, Spain, Africa, Sicily, and the adjacent islands. "How," says he on another occasion (An. xxxix. p. 272), "could he who had the care, not of one city only, but of all Christendom, who was bound to provide for all, to visit all, if he could, to instruct, to admonish all—in short, to feed the whole flock intrusted to him—how could he (and especially in times when the Christian faith was everywhere assailed, both by Jews and Gentiles)—how could he be confined within the limits of one city, however dignified, and not rather (as St. Luke testifies he did) go round and visit all the churches?"

Nothing can be more satisfactory than this. The cardinal has clearly proved that St. Peter's duty, as an apostle, made it impossible for him to confine himself to a residence at Rome. But, then, a perplexity remains. Why did St. Peter undertake the office of Bishop of Rome when he must have known that his higher engagements, as apostle, must prevent him from discharging the duty of bishop to a particular church? For St. Paul, we know, who says he had the care of all the churches, never fettered himself by undertaking the lower office of bishop of a particular see. What could have induced St. Peter to act differently? It could not have been because the office of Bishop of Rome was the highest place in the church, because every one agrees that the See of Rome had not this dignity before St. Peter became its bishop; nor could it be the title of bishop of the metropolis, for St. Peter, who had the title of apostle, needed not to covet any other; and we know that in his epistles he never calls himself Bishop of Rome. And, surely, we cannot think that his inducement was money, and that he took possession of the revenues of the richest see, paying a curate for doing his duty; for it is remarkable that some early authorities speak of Linus or Clement as Bishop of Rome at the very time that Baronius represents St. Peter to have filled that see.

Altogether we closed the volume in very disagreeable perplexity. There was no use in searching through its pages for any later examples of absentee bishops, if any of those who, in after ages, neglected their sees, could plead with truth that St. Peter had set them the pernicious example.

But when we reflected on the matter, we said, No, the thing is impossible. We must have been imposed on. St. Peter must have been calumniated. He never could have undertaken an office the duties of which he did not mean to fulfil. And he never could have thought that a bishop could discharge his duties without residing among his people. No doubt, if he ever was at Rome (or wherever he was), apostolic authority must have superseded episcopal, and the advice of the inspired apostle must have been implicitly followed in the government of the church. But knowing, as he did, that his apostolic commission required him to travel about constantly, he could never have accepted an inferior office, the duties of which required him to remain constantly in the same place. And the story of his having been Bishop of Rome must have originated in the emulation which existed among the ancient churches, all of whom were anxious to head their list of bishops with the most venerable name they could find. And, after all, there is as ancient authority to connect the name of St. Paul as that of St. Peter with the appointment of the first Bishop of Rome.

There is, however, one serious objection to our settling the question in this way. St. Peter's having been Bishop of Rome is one of several things which must be proved before we can establish the Pope's supremacy and infallibility. And if it should appear that St. Peter was not Bishop of Rome, down will come the whole theory of the Pope's supremacy, just like a house of cards when you pull the bottom cards away. Can any of our Roman Catholic readers tell us how we are to avoid this very disagreeable consequence?

WHERE IS IT?—A COLLOQUY.

AN inquirer after truth was lately discussing theology with a reverend convert from the Protestant faith to the Church of Rome. Transubstantiation, Purgatory, the Sacrifice of the Mass, the Invocation of Saints, and the worship of the Blessed Virgin Mary formed, of course, subjects of great interest in the discussion; but it is not our present object to repeat what was said on either side on any of those interesting subjects; and we shall take up the discussion at the point on which the reverend convert to the Church of Rome ultimately was induced to take his stand, in acknowledging that he had not become convinced of any of the peculiar tenets of Rome by reasoning or reading upon them, but took them all on trust, as matters resolved and settled by the infallibility of the church whose tenets they are.

Inquirer.—But, reverend sir, assuming, for the sake of argument, that it were possible for me to lay all my doubts and difficulties at the foot of infallibility, as you seem to have done, will you come to the practical point, and tell me where it exists, that I may find it and avail myself of it? There may be a physician able to heal my sickness of the body, but if I know not where to find him his skill will remain useless to me, and my sickness remain unhealed; and, in the same way, supposing that this infallible tribunal exists somewhere, for the solution of my doubts, it will remain utterly useless unless I know where to find it, in order to avail myself of it and cast my difficulties at its feet. Where is it?

Father M.—It is in the church, speaking by its infallible head—the Pope.

Inquirer.—How am I to be assured of that? I have always heard it is said to be somewhere in the church; but I know that much difference exists among theologians in the Church of Rome as to the precise somewhere. One class of them is said to hold that infallibility resides in the popes; a second class that it resides in the councils; and a third class asserts that it is not in either of them separately, or in both conjointly, but that it resides diffused through the church generally. These several classes of theologians always seem to argue very ably in proving that their adversaries are wrong, but to reason very weakly and defectively when endeavouring to establish their own views; and I, therefore, am anxious to learn which of those systems you have found your belief on as the true one.

Father M.—The French divines formerly held that infallibility resided in general councils and not in the popes; the Italian divines hold that it resides in the popes and not in councils; there seems to be a leaning now everywhere in favour of the popes; and, for my own part, I hold it to be in the popes.

Inquirer.—It seems a strange thing that if there be a certainly infallible tribunal, there should be any uncertainty as to where it is, or in what it consists. If your doctrine of the Pope's infallibility be the true one, it was, of course, always true of every true Pope since the days of St. Peter, and one would think would have been universally acknowledged in all ages. What say you to the Council of Basle, which was composed of a crowd of bishops and clergy, who came together from all parts of Europe, and yet decreed, in its 33rd session, that "none of the faithful did ever doubt of this truth—that the Pope, in things belonging to faith, was subject to the judgment of the same general councils." And in session 38, "that the council has an authority immediately from Christ, which the Pope is bound to obey."* Æneas Sylvius Piccolomini (who was afterwards a Pope himself, Pius II.), advocated that opinion in that council, in many learned and eloquent speeches, and sarcastically but acutely attributed the numbers on the Pope's side to this good reason—"that the Pope disposeth of benefices, but the councils give none."

Father M.—You forget that the Council of Basle was opposed by the Pope, Eugenius IV., and that, when Æneas Sylvius became Pope himself, he changed his opinion, and published a Bull of retractation, declaring that as Æneas Sylvius he was a damnable heretic, but as Pius II. he was an orthodox pontiff!

Inquirer.—I am not ignorant of those singular facts; but you must allow me to say, that a matter so stiffly contested among themselves by Roman Catholic divines gains but little strength from either of them. That popes should ambitiously contend for superiority is natural enough, though some of them have disclaimed the title of Universal Bishop, if they are not misrepresented. But I cannot consent to take any Pope's word for his own infallibility, as that is the very matter to be proved.

Father M.—Whatever differences may have existed in the church, there is, nevertheless, very high authority in favour of the Pope—Baronius, Bellarmine, Albertus Pighius, Hosius, Canus, Aquinas, Cajetan, Pallavicini,

* Nec unquam aliquis peritorum dubitavit summum Pontificem, in his quæ fidem concernunt judicio eorundem concilliorum universalium esse subjectum.—Conc. Basil, decret. p. 117. Concilium habet potestatem immediatè à Christo, cui Papa obedire tenetur.—Conc. Bas., ses. 38., p. 101.

Alphonsus Liguori, and many others, are all of that opinion.

Inquirer.—But are not Alphonsus de Castro, Launoy, Gerson, Laurentius Valla, Tostatus, Du Pin, Bossuet, Erasmus, and many others of the contrary? I am, therefore, at a loss to know how such a matter can be considered settled by authority; and I apprehend the Council of Trent itself, with the Pope at its head, was unable to solve the enigma, and ultimately separated without any canon concerning it, though the discussion upon it lasted for several months, and a variety of proposed canons, relating to the Pope's supremacy, were drawn up, showing that the sole cause of their silence was the impossibility of coming to a common understanding upon it. In the absence, therefore, of an authoritative decision on this important point, on such a great occasion, where obviously the Pope, bishops, and legates would have decreed it, and were anxious to do so if they could have come to any agreement about it, an inquirer is driven to form an opinion for himself on the matter; and I confess the most plausible opinion, as to the seat of infallibility, supposing an infallible tribunal to exist, at times seems to me to be, that it rests on the decrees of general councils, when ratified and confirmed by the Pope: and if I can venture to judge from what I have heard from some educated men of your profession, few discreet Roman Catholics recognise either Popes or councils alone as incapable of error, and attribute infallibility only to both united—that is, to decrees of councils ratified by the Pope."

Father M.—I think your informers are scarcely aware of the difficulties into which such a doctrine would lead them. Supposing, for a moment, that both councils and popes have been wrong in each claiming independence and superiority over the other, and that the theory of your discreet (Roman) Catholics is the true one—that it is only the decrees of general councils, when confirmed by the Pope, that are really infallible—how do they get over such difficulties as the following—If the Pope's confirmation be necessary to the validity of a decree of a general council, must it not be asserted that it is the Pope and not the council that is guided by the Holy Spirit? Yet Catholics have always affirmed that general councils, lawfully called, have an infallible guidance of the Holy Spirit in framing their decrees. If they have not, what are they but the opinions of fallible men, like that of the majority of any other deliberative body? If it be, however, admitted that the Holy Spirit assists and guides the Council, how is it possible that the Pope can differ from its decrees? Can the Pope disannul what the Holy Spirit approves? Or can the Holy Spirit guide the Pope to reject the same thing which he has led the Council to receive and decree? If the Holy Ghost assists and guides both Pope and Council, the Pope must ratify what the Council has decreed, or the Holy Spirit must contradict himself, which is impossible. It seems, therefore, plain that the ratification of the Pope cannot be a mere condition; it is everything, or it is a mere form. It is, no doubt, true that the Council of Basle decided that they were above the Pope, and that they actually deposed Pope Eugenius, in 1439, who would not admit or confirm their decrees. You ask which was right, the Council or the Pope? In my opinion the Pope was right; and that Council could not have had the assistance and guidance of the Holy Spirit; for, if so, how would it be possible to believe that the subsequent refusal of the Pope to confirm the decree should deprive the council, ex post facto, of the guidance and assistance of the Spirit which had guided them to make it? It seems, therefore, plain that this mixed theory is not the correct one, and it was such difficulties as this, no doubt, that led such eminent controversialists as Cardinal Bellarmine to the conclusion—"Infallibility does not come partly from the Pope and partly from the council, but wholly from the Pope."†

Inquirer.—You seem, however, to forget that it is "the church," in its aggregate capacity, that God has promised to be with to the end of the world, not with any particular portion of it alone. And that God did not treat the Pope as "the church," is, I think, self-evident to any one conversant with the history of the Popes. Dr. Milner, in his "End of Religious Controversy," admits enough to convince any one who will venture to use his reason at all in matters of religion, that God has not always been with the Popes, and that some of them were but sorry representatives of Christ upon earth. "I, as well as Baronius, Bellarmine, and other Catholic writers," says Dr. Milner, "have unequivocally admitted that some few of our pontiffs have disgraced themselves by their crimes, and given just cause of scandal to Christendom, but the credit of our cause is not affected by the personal conduct of particular pastors." This may be true within certain limits; but it at least shows that God has not been always with the Popes, and, therefore, that the Popes, unassisted by councils at least, cannot safely be trusted by Roman Catholics as infallible. General councils, as solemn assemblies of the bishops of the church, may, with more plausibility, be supposed to represent the church in its aggregate capacity, and, as such, to be under the guidance of the Holy Spirit, and therefore infallible, as guided by that Spirit into all truth. No doubt there is difficulty in that theory (as you say), and popes have never admitted the supremacy of councils, but have often claimed it to themselves as their own prerogative, as vicars of Christ upon earth; but there have been often, as every reader of history knows, rival "vicars," who excommunicated and anathematized each other without mercy, and whose claims it would be difficult, or impossible, for the most impartial historian to decide between even now, much less when the heat of party feeling and conflicting interests were roused and in full force. Truth and piety do not seem to have been affixed to the chair of Rome more than to any other; and that the Papal State has not been exempt from the ordinary causes of error and impiety—ambition, avarice, and luxury—many ages have testified and complained. And in such times, at least, how is it possible to believe that the Pope was the sole, infallible guide?

Father M.—It was never held that the Pope was in all things infallible, and some of them may have erred, both in faith and virtue; but still Christ has promised never to desert his church; and I think there is less difficulty in admitting the Pope to be infallible than in believing councils to be so, or deciding between contending popes and councils, both of whom cannot be right, when they differ. Were I to go into the Scriptural argument, to prove the primacy of St. Peter and his successors, I think you would admit that the weight of argument is all on the side of the Pope.

Inquirer.—I should be very glad to hear you on those points when you are at leisure; though I am not ignorant of what has been said by learned writers on these subjects; and I even confess that it sometimes appears to me that if I could believe that infallibility exists anywhere, but in the Holy Scriptures (which are infallible, because inspired of God), the preponderance of argument between the three parties is in favour of the Papacy. Most of these arguments seem to be derived from something connected with St. Peter, derived from some word spoken to him, or some promise made to him, or some supremacy supposed to be in him; and, therefore, seem to point to something in the popes, as succeeding him, rather than to anything in councils

Father M.—I am very glad to find an inquirer of your earnest views disposed to agree with me on this point; it is one on which the order to which I belong—the Society of Jesus—holds very decided opinions.

Inquirer.—But supposing that this matter was settled, and all difficulty removed from my mind on the point—which I am far from saying is the case—it appears to me that a further difficulty immediately arises—namely, how is it to be ascertained when the Pope delivers himself infallibly? It is admitted by all parties that some popes have erred, that some were even heretical,* and that even, in the case of orthodox popes, they sometimes speak fallibly and sometimes infallibly. There are many Papal Bulls directly opposite and contradictory to other Papal Bulls. The difficulty, then, is, what is the test to distinguish between the fallible Bulls and the infallible Bulls?

Father M.—Nothing can be easier. When the Pope utters his decision ex cathedrâ, there is no doubt of the infallibility of the decision.

Inquirer.—I am aware that the Pope is said, by theologians of your school, to be infallible whenever he utters a decision or issues a Bull ex cathedrâ; but still it is necessary to learn how we are to ascertain a decision ex cathedrâ from a decision not ex cathedrâ.

Father M.—Nothing can be easier. There are certain essential requisites characteristic of a Bull ex cathedrâ, and without which it cannot be received as ex cathedrâ. They are seven in number; and but that I fear to weary you by the detail, I should be happy to enter into them.

Inquirer.—I feel deeply interested in so important a matter; pray do me the favour of detailing them, without any apprehension that they will weary me.

Father M.—Well, then, the first thing necessary is, that, before composing and issuing the Bull, the Pope should have opened a communication with the bishops of the universal church; that in such communication he should ask their prayers to the Almighty, that the Holy Spirit might fully and infallibly guide him, so as to make his decision the decision of inspiration. Secondly, it is necessary that, before issuing such Bull, the Pope should carefully seek all possible and desirable information touching the special matter which is under consideration, and which is to be the subject of his decision. He should be specially careful to possess himself of all available information from those persons who are residing in the district affected by the opinion called in question, and who are found faithful therein; so that the Pope may have all the requisite information for an infallible decision from the very district in which the opinion, on which the decision is sought, had its origin or existence. The third requisite or essential is, that the Bull should not only be formal, but authoritative, and should claim to be authoritative; it should not be issued merely as the opinion or judgment of the Pope, in his personal capacity, but as the decisive and authoritative judgment of one who was the head of that church which is the mother and mistress of all churches, to whom all Christendom owe subjection and allegiance, and who is the living voice of infallibility, and who, as such, has the power and authority to pronounce infallibly the decision required.

Inquirer.—My dear sir, you are assuming rather more than I am prepared to grant without proof, when you assert so dogmatically so many things about the Church of Rome; but I wish to hear the remainder of your seven requisites or essentials, so pray be good enough to go on.

Father M.—The fourth is, that the Bull should be promulgated universally—that is, that it should be addressed to all the bishops of the universal church, in order that, through them, its decisions might be determined and made known to all the members or subjects of the whole church. The Pope is the fountain head of all episcopal jurisdiction, so that there can be no episcopal jurisdiction but from the Pope; and as episcopacy is the only channel through which every grace flows to the church, so it is necessary that the Bull containing the decision of the Pope be addressed to all the bishops of the universal church.

Inquirer.—You will not suppose me to admit that the Pope is the fountain of all episcopal jurisdiction; and I apprehend it would be easy to show, from the proceedings of the Council of Trent, that no such tenet was admitted in that council; but I postpone giving you my ideas upon that matter, and I pray you to go on with your remaining requisites.

Father M.—The fifth requisite is, that the Bull should be universally received—that is, that it should be accepted by all the bishops of the whole church as an authoritative and infallible decision—that, after promulgation by the Pope, it should be accepted and promulgated by all the bishops as authoritative and infallible, or at least should be simply accepted by them without formal promulgation, or tacitly permitted by them without opposition, which is held to be a sufficient acceptance in a legal sense.

Inquirer.—It appears to me, that your first, second, and fifth requisites are matters very difficult to be ascertained. How am I to inform myself whether the Pope opened a previous communication with the bishops to obtain their prayers, or whether he sought and obtained all the required information before he proceeded to issue the Bull, according to your first and second requisites? The fifth seems equally difficult to be ascertained. Indeed, I scarcely know anything more difficult to ascertain with satisfaction than whether any given Bull was received and promulgated, or simply received without promulgation, or only permitted without opposition in any given country. Some are received in Spain, and are rejected in France—and some are received in France which are rejected in England and Ireland—and some are rejected in all these, and yet are said to be accepted in Italy; and the assertions made on all sides upon this fact are so contradictory that I know nothing so difficult to be determined satisfactorily. This 5th requisite opens a prodigious sphere of inquiry and disputation. However, pray complete your remaining particulars.

Father M.—The sixth is one of immense importance, more absolutely essential than any I have yet named. It is this—The matter in question, to be the subject matter of the Bull, must be one touching faith or morals—that is, it must concern the purity of faith or the morality of actions.

Inquirer.—That seems very reasonable; but I apprehend that the Church of Rome has strained "faith and morality" to include all matters of fact, even matters of history, wherever they seem to bear upon any question of "faith" or "morality." Witness the celebrated controversy between the Jesuits and the Jansenists, where the point at issue was the matter of fact, whether the opinions condemned by both parties were really contained in Bishop Jansen's book "Augustinus," which Pope Alexander VII. declared they were in a Bull, dated 1657, though the Jansenists denied that they were so in point of fact, and no one but the Jesuits could ever find them there. Pray, however, pardon this interruption, and, as our time is nearly exhausted, proceed with your seventh requisite.

Father M.—The seventh and last condition is, that the Pope should be free from all exterior influences, so as to be under no exterior compulsion or constraint. The Bull of Pope Liberius possessed the other essentials, but this last was wanting; that Pope acted under compulsion, under a fear of his life, and, therefore, as he was not free, his decision could not he regarded as ex cathedrâ. The Bull thus issued was full of error.

* The late learned Charles Butler, the eminent Roman Catholic lawyer, in his book of the Roman Catholic Church (Letter x., p. 122, edition 1825), says "In spiritual concerns the Transalpine opinions ascribe to the Pope a superiority and controlling power over the whole church, should she chance to oppose his decrees, and, consequently, over a general council, his representative. They likewise ascribe to the Pope the extraordinary prerogative of personal infallibility, when he undertakes to issue a solemn decision on any point of faith—the Cisalpines affirm that in spirituals the Pope is subject, in doctrine and discipline, to the church, or to a general council representing her. They affirm that a general council may without, and even against the Pope's consent, reform the church. They deny his personal infallibility, and hold that he may be deposed by the church, in a general council, for heresy and schism."

Inquirer.—This is another point which may be, to one at a distance from Rome, very difficult of ascertaining. How am I, or any one in England, to ascertain, with anything like moral certainty, whether the Pope, at the issuing of any Bull, was really under exterior influences, or perfectly free, even if it was issued at the present day? But the difficulty must be enhanced a thousand-fold when the inquiry concerns some Bull issued centuries ago. I am afraid your tests are scarcely available for practical use, and I entreat you to tell me how to get over so many uncertainties.

Father M.—My dear sir, nothing can be easier; you have only, in such cases, to go to the bishop, and ask him whether the bull was ex cathedra or otherwise.

Inquirer.—Oh! I see, and I suppose, if I can't get at the bishop, the parish priest will do as well. If the whole results in this, I might better relinquish the search after infallibility altogether, and at once use my own sense and judgment, however fallible, and compare the Bull with the Holy Scriptures rather than be left in such a maze of uncertainties, heaped one upon another, with no better guide than a man like myself, admitted to be fallible, and having, perhaps, some interest in deceiving me into the belief of a doctrine on which he, perhaps, depends for his livelihood. I shall be happy, however, to renew our conference on another opportunity; at present accept my thanks for all the trouble you have taken for my enlightenment—farewell.

THE GREAT WESTERN SCHISM.—No. II.

WE have had occasion, in our last volume (see p. 7), to bring before our readers Scriptural proof of the fact that, even in the apostles' days, teachers of error existed, and that even among the clergy of the Church; but that when the apostles warn their converts against the danger of being misled by such false teachers they tell them of no infallible safeguard against it. They say nothing of general councils whose decisions shall be miraculously secured from error; nor of any central church whose guidance may be implicitly followed; nor of any successor of St. Peter who shall supply Christians with unerring directions. Their only advice to their followers is to watch, to take heed to themselves and to the doctrine which had been delivered to them.

Modern Romanists, however, have discovered a compendious way of arriving at truth, a way of which we find no traces in the records of the apostolic age. Their plan is not to judge of the Church by its doctrine, but to judge of the doctrine by the Church which teaches it. And when they find Protestants pursuing the ancient method of testing whether a doctrine be true, by heedful comparison of it with the doctrines which the apostles are recorded to have delivered, they taunt them with the uncertainty of their process. They say, whether such and such a doctrine be true is, after all, but a matter of opinion; but that we are in communion with the successor of St. Peter is a matter of fact.

It is an obvious reply that this matter of fact, as it is called, together with the consequences supposed to follow from it, involves several very doubtful matters of opinion. It is matter of opinion whether St. Peter possessed privileges distinct in kind from those enjoyed by the other apostles, so that he alone of them was to transmit his infallibility to successors; it is matter of opinion whether St. Peter were ever Bishop of Rome; and, since St. Peter is said to have been Bishop of Antioch as well as of Rome, it is matter of opinion whether the Bishop of Rome necessarily exclusively inherits from him the office of infallible guide to the Christian Church.

But it might be supposed that, if all these points could be once comfortably settled, then we should be released from the necessity for all that care and watchfulness which the poor Christians of the apostles' times were obliged to employ—if we only adhere firmly to the doctrines of the Bishop of Rome, we shall, without any further investigation, be sure of being in the right. We are tempted to congratulate ourselves on having so simple a rule for attaining religious truth, and only to wonder how St. Paul should have so inexcusably omitted to have mentioned it to those whom he was cautioning against error.

But, alas, even this simple rule, "to adhere to the Bishop of Rome," has its uncertainties too; for we have first to determine who the real Bishop of Rome is. Now, in all the time between the third century and the Reformation, not a century has passed in which there has not been a schism in the church on this very point, and in which Christians have not been perplexed between the contending claims of different pretenders to the Romish See. We commenced in the last number a history of one of those schisms, commonly counted the 29th (!) of them, but not the last of them. It was, however, the greatest and most memorable of them, both for its duration, its extent, and its damaging effects on the Papal claims. It differs, too, from other schisms in this—that in other cases, but not in this, Roman Catholic divines are now 'pretty well agreed as to which of the rival claimants had right on their side, and as to which of the parties of their adherents are to be branded as schismatics. Even in these cases, however, it is a great mistake to suppose that, because a matter is plain to us now, it was equally plain at the time. Let us suppose that Roman Catholics are right in maintaining, that our Lord cannot possibly have made it necessary for Christians to search for truth by a toilsome investigation through the inspired records of his teaching, but that he must have afforded them a safe, and a shorter way to it; and what are we to think of the case of a man who has endeavoured to adopt this shorter and safer way, who has been only anxious to adhere to the Roman Pontiff, but who has, unfortunately, chosen the wrong one? He may have exerted in his choice of a right Pope as much care and watchfulness as Protestants think it necessary to spend in their choice of the right doctrine; he may have followed the opinion of some of those in whose learning and piety he had the most confidence; he may have had a considerable number of his contemporaries on his side: but, perhaps, some hundred years after his death, it may be discovered that the question which had perplexed him was an easy one; and that, though he had but the one thing to decide—who was the true Pope—he had decided it wrong, and had, in spite of all his care, wandered from the true fold, outside of which there is no salvation.

But the case of the great western schism is peculiar in this, that high Roman Catholic authority can still be produced in support of the claims of each of the rival popes, or at least in support of the opinion, that either of them might have been safely followed. This last is certainly the most charitable opinion, yet we doubt whether a Romanist can adopt it consistently; for the two pretenders could not have been both real popes. Either, therefore, the Christian world was for years without a Pope, or else one of the two was the genuine Pope, and the other was an impostor. Surely, then, it will not be said that it was a matter of indifference which of the two a Christian adhered to. The real reason why Roman Catholics have been so anxious to make out that there was safety on both sides is, that it is not pleasant for them to be obliged to confess that, with all their anxiety to find a rule which shall deliver Christians from all uncertainty, and all possibility of going wrong, their rule was one which set the half of Christendom in a fatal mistake for the space of several years. We shall prove, at all events, from contemporary documents, that the question—which was the true Pope—was one which Christians were at the time held bound to decide rightly, as they valued their everlasting salvation.

You will remember that we told you in the last number how the cardinals first chose Urban as their Pope; how they afterwards gave out that this choice, having been made by compulsion, and in terror for their lives, was invalid; and how they selected Clement as the true Pope.

The following are extracts from a circular issued by the cardinals soon after (see Baluzius Vitæ Pont. Aven. ii. 847):—"To all the faithful in Christ, the cardinals—bishops, priests and deacons—of the Holy Roman Church send greeting in the Lord. Having been appointed watchmen by the Lord God of Hosts, and occupying the highest post next after the Roman Pontiff, we are bound vigilantly to point out to the faithful the dangers which threaten their souls, and the snares and attacks of the enemy. Whereas, therefore, we have learned for certain, that that seducer, Bartholomew, formerly Archbishop of Bari, falsely calling himself Pope, has, as another Antichrist, sent certain false prophets to different parts of the world, whom he alone has constituted cardinals, together with some other defenders of his wickedness, in order that, by false persuasions and crafty suggestions, they may seduce the Christian people, and may cause them, to the eternal damnation of their souls, to adhere to the aforesaid apostate: and whereas, on this account, our most holy lord, Pope Clement VII., has desired us, who have perfect knowledge of this matter, to instruct the faithful concerning it: and whereas it pertains to none others than us, next after our most holy lord, Pope Clement VII., to inform the faithful who is the true Pope, therefore, we beseech you all, in Jesus Christ, for the safety of your souls, to adhere to the same lord, Clement," &c., &c.

Here, you see, it is taught plainly enough, that the adherents of Urban perilled their salvation; and there certainly appears great show of reason in what the cardinals said—viz., That if any doubt should arise as to who the true Pope was, no one could be fitter than the cardinals (who are the next highest authority to the Pope) to decide it; and it is hard to think that any man went fatally wrong who believed him to be the Pope whom the cardinals proclaimed as such.

However, as we do not wish to give you merely one side of the question, we shall give you an abridgment, on the other hand, of Urban's Bull denouncing Clement, which will be found in full in Raynaldus's Continuation of Baronius, An. 1378, p. 41:—"Since lately the vineyard of the Lord of Hosts—that is, the Holy Roman Church—has been compelled to heave deep groans, because the sons of her womb which she had brought up and raised from a lowly station to the highest dignities—viz., those children of iniquity and perdition, Robert, &c. [here the anti-Pope and his cardinals are enumerated]—have attempted to rend the seamless robe of the Lord, and have not only involved themselves in the bands of sin, but, being given over to a reprobate mind, have endeavoured to draw others with them to destruction; therefore, we who, by the Divine clemency, have the care of the aforesaid vineyard, have deemed it right, in the might of the Most High, to rise up and proceed against them and certain others of their favourers, as follows." Having then enumerated the offences of which Clement and his party had been guilty, in denying the authority of Urban, the latter proceeds:—"Wherefore, being unable, without grievous remorse of conscience, to tolerate any longer such wickedness, we decree that Robert [and Co.] have been and are schismatics, and apostates, and conspirators against us, and blasphemers, and to be punished as heretics; and we excommunicate and anathematize them, and we depose them from their cardinalships, and from all other ecclesiastical dignities, and we declare them incapable of holding any in future, and we deprive [certain of their lay supporters] of all their dignities, and of the order of knighthood; and we confiscate all the goods of the aforesaid condemned persons, both moveable and immoveable, and we declare their persons detestable and infamous, and that they ought to be taken by the faithful and kept in close prison and under safe custody until we command further on the subject."

"Further, we excommunicate any person who shall knowingly commit any of the bodies of the aforesaid to ecclesiastical sepulture; from which excommunication he shall not be absolved until he have, with his own hand, disinterred and cast out from ecclesiastical burial the bodies of the aforesaid.

"Further, we command every faithful person, of whatever rank—be he king, or queen, or emperor, or of whatever other dignity, even if he be cardinal of the Holy Roman Church—that he do not knowingly receive any of the aforesaid condemned persons into his city, camp, lands, or possessions of any kind; and that he do not carry, or suffer to be carried, to any of the aforesaid condemned, or to the places where they dwell, any grain, wine, flesh, clothes, wood, victuals, money, merchandize, or any goods whatsoever.

"Further, we command all the faithful to assist any persons who may be engaged in capturing any of the aforesaid condemned persons, or in detaining them when captured, or in transmitting them to us; and we excommunicate any private person who shall transgress the aforesaid commands, or who shall knowingly call the aforesaid Robert (styling himself Clement), by the name of Pope; or who shall believe or hold him for a Pope; from which excommunication he shall not be freed by any but the Roman Pontiff, except in the article of death."

Of the remainder of the Bull we shall only mention, that he offers to all those who shall undertake a crusade for the extermination of the aforesaid schismatics, and who shall persecute them to the utmost of their power, the privileges and indulgences granted to those who proceed to the succour of the Holy Land; and that he releases the subjects of the princes who adhere to his rival from their obedience to their monarchs.

Here, then, was a comfortable position for a private Christian to be placed in. On the one hand, Urban excommunicates him if he calls Clement Pope, or holds or believes him to be so; and he releases him from his obedience to his civil magistrate, if the civil power in question take the part of Clement; while, on the other hand, Clement is not backward in similar threats, if he hold Urban for Pope.

Remember that the main argument for the existence of an infallible guide in the church is, that it is inconceivable that God could have left Christians exposed to the risk of error in any matter concerning their eternal salvation; but here we see that the institution of the office of Pope does not preserve Christians from such risk of error; that, on the contrary, Christians were left for several years together perplexed between the claims of two popes, in favour of each of whom so much might be said, and each of whom uttered the most frightful curses against the other and his adherents.

We have just given a mild specimen of a Pope's curse; we shall now enable our readers to judge what it was worth: for you must remember that one of the two parties must have been the real Pope, and that his curses had all the efficacy which papal dignity can give. If any of our readers, then, have the misfortune to be cursed by the priest for reading the Word of God, or any other similar offence, it may be a comfort to him to find that even a Pope's curse is not a very fatal affair.

The Jesuit Maimbourgh writes as follows (History of the Western Schism):—"The thunderbolts and the anathemas which the two popes launched against each other, and against all those who followed the opposite party, did no harm to any body." P. 57.—"The two popes continued to launch against each other, from time to time, a thousand thunderbolts of curses, which caused furious scandal and terrible disorder throughout Christendom. But as they cared little for the thunderbolts which thus missed fire, they soon had recourse to other arms which did much more mischief, producing bloody and fatal effects." p. 78.

Antoninus, Archbishop of Florence, who was canonized as a saint, in 1523, writes as follows (vol. iii., p. 390):—"There were among the adherents of either party, all the time that the schism lasted, most learned men, and most religious, and (what is more) even distinguished by their miracles; and the question could never be so decided, but that there remained a doubt with very many. And though it be necessary to salvation to believe that there is but one vicar of Christ, yet, on the occasion of a schism (when several are called popes), it does not appear necessary to salvation to believe that this or that is the true Pope, but only whichever of them was canonically elected. And no one is bound to know who was canonically elected, any more than he is bound to be acquainted with the canon law; but the people may follow their princes and prelates." And again (p. 406)—"Urban and Clement, the pontiffs contending for the Papacy, on solemn days, each excommunicated the other and his adherents, as schismatics. Thence arose great confusion in the Christian religion; and a great opportunity was presented of sinning with impunity. For when any prelate or monk committed any crime, he passed over from the one obedience to the other, as if he were forsaking a schism; and so he not only escaped punishment for his crime, but he obtained even commendation and honour."

It would be easy to multiply quotations from some of the highest names in the annals of the Roman Church, that, notwithstanding the mutual anathemas of the contending pontiffs, the difficulty of ascertaining the true one was a sufficient excuse for the people on either side. In short, provided you believe that there is a Pope somewhere or other, it is quite unnecessary to know who he is; and you may be quite safe though you adhere to a false Pope, and though the true Pope be cursing you as hard as he can all the time.

Having mentioned, however, that there were on both sides saints who worked miracles, it would be a pity to conclude without giving some specimens of the light which those saints throw on the question. Odoricus Raynaldus (p. 48) gives the following "insigne responsum," as he calls it, from Peter, of Arragon, who had the reputation of being a saint, and of having had several celestial visions:—

"Your humble son, brother Peter, of Arragon, of the order of Minors, says, that in the revelations made by God to him unworthy, the cardinals (by the second election of the Cardinal of Geneva) are called by the Lord Jesus Christ and by his apostles—Peter, Paul, and John—Nicolaitans, and, by consequence, schismatics, enemies of God, and liars: and, though they be called cardinals, are not, as the Lord says (Apocalypse ii.)—'This thou hast because thou hatest the deeds of the Nicolaitans, which I also hate, and hast found them to be liars who say they are apostles and are not.' And I say, under your correction, that these words refer to the cardinals who made the second election: for it is certain that the heresy of Nicholas was, that he taught that wives were common, whence it follows that he must have taught that a woman may give herself to two men, a husband and an adulterer, contrary to the law of God. Such, then, speaking spiritually, was the error of the cardinals in the second election, who gave to the Church of God two husbands—viz., Urban, whom they had first chosen, and afterwards the Cardinal of Geneva. Therefore, the cardinals are called by the Lord, who foresaw the schism which should come to pass, Nicolaitans, schismatics, and, therefore, not cardinals, since a schismatic cannot be a cardinal. They are, therefore, exactly according to our Lord's description, called cardinals and are not."

We have not space to add to this exposition of the second chapter of the Apocalypse how the anti-Pope was made out to be Herod; nor can we make room for extracts from the letters of St. Catherine, of Sienna, mentioned in our last article, who makes use of rather strong language, calling the French cardinals, when she was mildest, demons in human flesh, and calling Clement himself a demon, an Antichrist, and a limb of the devil.

But the testimony of these saints did not produce effect on the opposite party, because they had their saints, too, who worked as many miracles, and who, they thought, were better saints, because they kept their temper better, and did not abuse their antagonists quite so fiercely. It is sufficient to name St. Peter, Cardinal of Luxemburgh, who, after a life of great austerity, worked at his tomb such a number of dazzling, incontestable miracles, that crowds assembled at his tomb from all parts of Europe. This served the cause of Clement, since people could not believe that one who worked such miracles after his death had not been enlightened by God in his life, or that he could have consented to receive a cardinal's hat from one who was not the true Pope. But people ought to have known, says Maimbourgh, that a saint may be deceived like other men, and particularly in matters of fact; and that the gift of prophecy and of discernment with which God sometimes honours his servants, is not a constant habit, which always infallibly discovers the truth to them, but is one which enlightens them on certain occasions, and leaves them to their natural resources on others.

We have said enough, then, to show that it was, at the time, an exceedingly difficult, if not an impossible task for a man to ascertain the true Pope. Nor can it be said, this was 400 or 500 years ago; for we cannot suppose that God dealt with his church by different rules in the 14th or 15th centuries and in the 19th. If any one tells you, then, that it is inconceivable that God could leave his church without some guide, able to lead them infallibly into truth, you may answer, that it is just as necessary that God should make them know who that infallible guide is; and that it is indelibly written on the page of history that God did leave the church for a space of several years in a state in which it was next to impossible to determine who that infallible guide was. This single test, then, will determine whether our suppositions, as to what it is likely God will do, are a good guide for ascertaining what he has actually done.

THE DOCTRINE OF INTENTION.

GREAT is the uncertainty of the law—is a phrase of common use among those who suffer (as, doubtless, some of our worthy readers may have done), from the fallibility of human tribunals; but, alas! great is the uncertainty of the Gospel, too, if the Church of Rome's authorized statements be worthy of credit; for no one can be assured that he has ever received a single sacrament, or ever been admitted into the Church of Christ at all, if the canons of the Council of Trent are true enunciations of Catholic truth.

This may startle many, and will, doubtless, be received with an incredulous smile by all who have not studied the doctrines of the Church of Rome in its approved and authorized documents. Let us, however, fairly inquire into the matter, and see whether the statement be correct or not:—

THE CHURCH OF ROME'S AUTHORIZED STATEMENTS.

"If any one shall say that the INTENTION of doing at least what the church does is not required in ministers, when they make and confer the sacraments, let him be accursed."—11th Canon of 7th Session of Council of Trent.

"The penitent ought not so to flatter himself, concerning his own personal faith, as to think that, even though there be no contrition on his part, or no intention in the priest to ACT SERIOUSLY, and to absolve him TRULY, he is nevertheless truly, and in the eyes of God, absolved on account of his faith alone."—Council of Trent, Session 14, chap. vi., on the Sacrament of Penance.

"Should any priest NOT INTEND to consecrate, but to act deceitfully; also, if any hosts, through forgetfulness, remain on the altar, or if any part of the wine, or any host, is hid, when he only intends to consecrate those which he sees; also, if any one has before him eleven hosts, and intends to consecrate only ten, not determining which ten he intends: in these cases he does not consecrate, because INTENTION is required."—Roman Missal, on Defects of the Mass.

Pope Innocent III., in his ninth epistle, lays it down that "the smallest mistake, even though made involuntarily, nullifies the whole act." The Council of Florence pronounced the same opinion. Cardinal Bellarmine, on Justification (lib. iii., ch. 8),* lays it down broadly—"Nor can any man be certain, with the certainty of faith, that he receives a true sacrament, since a sacrament cannot be made without the intention of the minister, and no one can see another's intention."

Well might Ambrosius Catharinus, Bishop of Minori, argue against the consequences of such doctrines, as frightful, in the Council of Trent. They were, indeed, frightful; for let an Infidel, or a deceitful priest, baptize a child, without having seriously the idea of baptizing it, that child, according to the teaching of the Church of Rome, if it die, is lost. Let a bishop ordain a priest, without having actually and formally, from absence of mind or any other cause, the idea of conferring the priesthood, and behold we have a priest who is not a priest, and those whom he shall baptize, marry, or absolve will not, according to the doctrines of Rome, be baptized, married, or absolved. The Pope himself, without suspecting it, might have been ordained in this manner; and as it is from him that everything flows (according to his teaching), all the bishops of the church might, some day, find themselves to be false bishops, and all the priests false priests, without there being any possibility of restoring the broken link.

Hear, however, Ambrosius Catharinus himself, in arguing against the decreeing this doctrine:—"Let there be a knave priest who feigneth, and hath not an intention to administer the true baptism to a child, who, after grown to a man, is created bishop of a great city, and liveth many years in that charge, so that he hath ordained a great part of the priests. It must be said that he, being not baptized, is not ordained, nor they ordained who are promoted by him. So that to that great city there will be neither eucharist nor confession; because they cannot be without the sacrament of orders, nor orders without a true bishop; neither can he receive orders who is not baptized. Behold millions of nullities of sacraments by the malice of one minister in one act only." The good Bishop of Minori, however, failed in resisting this decree, though he strongly protested against it.

* "Neque potest certus esse, certitudine fidei, se percipere verum sacramentum, cum sacramentum sine intentione ministri non conficiatur, et intentionem alterius nemo videre possit."—4th vol., p. 355, Cologne ed., 1615; also, 3rd vol., p. 48. De Sacramentis in Genere, lib. i., cap. 27. "Requiri intentionem faciendi quod ecclesiam facit."

And we have only now to say a few words upon the CONSEQUENCES OF THIS DOCTRINE.

I.—If the doctrine of intention, as laid down by the Council of Trent, is true, the Church of Rome cannot be a safe guide to follow, because it is impossible to know, either that the Popes and Councils, through whom she is supposed to utter her decisions, are real Popes and Councils, or that the persons by whom those decisions are received are baptized Christians; in short, impossible to know that she is a church at all:

If the doctrine of intention is not true, the Church of Rome cannot be a safe guide to follow, because, while pretending to be infallible, she has decreed a falsehood:

But the doctrine of intention must be either true or not true:

THEREFORE—The Church of Rome cannot be a safe guide to follow.

II.—If a Roman Catholic believes the doctrine of intention, he must live and die in utter uncertainty as to whether he has received any one of the sacraments, which his own church declares to be essential to salvation:

If a Roman Catholic does not believe the doctrine of intention, his own church pronounces him "accursed."

But every Roman Catholic must either believe the doctrine of intention or not believe it:

THEREFORE—Every Roman Catholic must live and die either under the curse of his own church, or in a state of utter uncertainty as to whether he has ever received any one of the sacraments which his own church declares to be essential to salvation.

III.—If Christ made the doctrine of Intention, as it stands connected with the whole Romish system, part of his religion, he founded a religion which makes obedience to the Bishop of Rome "necessary to salvation for every human creature" (Canon Law, Extrav. Com., Lib. i., Tit. 8, p. 1160, Pars. 2, Leips. 1830), and at the same time makes it impossible for any human creature to know who is a true Bishop of Rome and who is not; which makes it essential to obey the decrees of Councils, and at the same time makes it impossible to know which are true Councils and which are not; which makes the interpretation of Scripture depend upon the opinions of the Fathers, and at the same time makes it impossible to know who was a Father and who was not; which makes every man's salvation depend upon his receiving true sacraments, and at the same time makes it impossible for any man to know when he does receive them and when he does not; which makes an apostolical succession of priests essential to the existence of a church, and at the same time makes it impossible for any one to know who is in the apostolical succession and who is not; which compels every layman to have perpetual recourse to a priest, and at the same time makes it impossible for any layman to know when he has found one; which theoretically makes the church as firm as a rock, but practically makes it as unsubstantial as a shadow:

If Christ did not make the doctrine of intention part of his religion—that is, part of Christianity—the Church of Rome, in decreeing it, has decreed anti-christianity, and is therefore so far antichristian.

But Christ must either have made the doctrine of intention part of his religion or not;

THEREFORE—Christ must either have established a religion which is involved in such a hopeless mass of uncertainty, confusion, and absurdity as any mere human philosopher would be ashamed of; or, the Church of Rome is so far antichristian.

IMPORTANT QUESTIONS FOR ROMAN CATHOLICS.

Did the priest who baptized you intend to baptize you?

Did the bishop who ordained him intend to ordain him?

How can Pope Pius IX. be sure that he has been himself ordained or baptized?

If the priest did not intend to consecrate the host which he elevated for your adoration, what did you adore?

What certainty has any Roman Catholic, on his own principles, that he is not unabsolved, unbaptized, an idolater, and the victim of a fatal delusion?

IS NOT THE RELIGION OF ROME THE RELIGION OF DOUBT?

WE KNOW, If our earthly house of this habitation be dissolved, that we have a building of God, a house not made with hands, eternal in heaven.'—2 Cor. v. 1 (Douay version).

For this WE KNOW, that we abide in him and he in us; because he hath given of his Spirit.'—1 John iv. 13 (Douay version).

WE KNOW that we are of God."—1 John v. 12 (Douay version).

KNOW YOU NOT that you are the temples of God, and that the Spirit of God dwelleth in you?"—1 Cor. iii. 16 (Douay version).

I know whom I have believed, and I AM CERTAIN that he is able to keep that which I have committed unto him against that day."—2 Timothy i. 12 (Douay version).

IS NOT THE RELIGION OF THE BIBLE THE RELIGION OF CERTAINTY?

If a man is "justified by faith" (Rom. iii. 28, Douay version), as the Bible teaches, and as Protestants believe, how can any other man's intention confer or withhold JUSTIFICATION?

If the believer is "born, not of blood, nor of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of man, but of God" (John i. 13, Douay version), as the Bible teaches, and as Protestants believe, how can any man's intention confer or withhold REGENERATION?

If the believer's priest is Christ himself (see Heb. iv. 15, 16), as the Bible teaches and as Protestants believe, how can any man's intention confer or withhold ANSOLUTION?

THE EFFECTS OF EXCOMMUNICATION,

ILLUSTRATED IN AN ACTION OF SLANDER, BROUGHT BY PHILIP BOYLE AGAINST THE RIGHT REV. PETER M'LOUGHLIN, TITULAR BISHOP OF RAPHOE; TRIED AT THE LIFFORD SPRING ASSIZES, 1809, BEFORE THE HON. BARON M'CLELLAND AND A SPECIAL JURY.

THE facts were briefly as follow:—A chapel had been built, by voluntary subscription, by the Roman Catholic inhabitants of the parish of Kilbarron, in the county of Donegal; Dr. M'Loughlin, finding it too small, proposed to the parishioners the expediency of erecting two galleries, which were accordingly built by them. Immediately after they were finished, Dr. M'Loughlin and one of his parishioners, calling themselves a committee, allotted the principal pews to such of the wealthy parishioners as would agree to purchase them at a certain price. The parishioners conceived themselves ill treated by this partial allotment, and remonstrated against it, telling the defendant that it was not necessary to resort to this measure of disposing of the pews, as they were ready to pay the amount of the arrears due to the builder; and, to effect this purpose, a general meeting of the parishioners took place, when the plaintiff, Philip Boyle, was appointed collector to receive the amount of the balance due. The bishop became enraged with this opposition from the parishioners, when he found he could not dispose of the pews as he had intended, and peremptorily refused time to collect the money. The plaintiff begged for a little longer time; to which the defendant merely replied, "Desist, you set of combinators, or I will punish you with the weapons of the church." On the following Sunday the bishop persisted in his determination of disposing of the pews, and desired the persons he named to take possession of their seats. The plaintiff told the bishop that the parishioners would never consent to the pews being disposed of in that way, and entreated him to wait till the following Sunday. This only served to inflame Dr. M'L.'s passion, and he again called on his friends to take possession of the pews, adding, "I perceive there is a combination formed against me in this parish, and you, Mr. Boyle, are at the head of it." Boyle replied, "I deny the charge, my lord; I assure you it is not so." The defendant then addressed the congregation, and said, "Do you hear this man attempting to make a clergyman a liar at the altar of God!" and then, turning to the plaintiff, he added, "I will denounce you and your family, sir, on next Sunday."

On the following Sunday, Boyle and his family attended the chapel as usual. The defendant then asked him "If he were come to offer satisfaction for the scandal given on the preceding Sunday?" The plaintiff answered that, "If he had offended either against God, or the church, or the bishop, he was sincerely sorry for it." The defendant then required Boyle to sign a paper, on which were these words, "I, Philip Boyle, do withdraw myself from the head of a set of combinators," which the plaintiff declined to do, whereupon the defendant exclaimed, "I will now excommunicate you," and proceeded forthwith to pronounce the sentence in these words—"I, Peter M'Loughlin, titular Bishop of Raphoe, in the name of the Father, of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost; and of the holy apostles, St. Peter and St. Paul; of the blessed Virgin Mary, Mother of God, and of all the angels and saints in heaven, do excommunicate you, Philip Boyle, until you sign this paper." The candles were then extinguished, the chapel bells rung, and the plaintiff was rendered an outcast from all civil and religious society, and deprived of the consolations, not only of worshipping God according to his religious belief, but of all social intercourse with those of his own creed, for not pleading guilty to the charge of being a combinator. The foregoing facts having been proved in the usual manner, and learned counsel heard on both sides, the learned judge proceeded to charge the jury as follows:—

"Gentlemen, this is a special action on the case brought by the plaintiff, Philip Boyle, to recover compensation and damages from the Rev. Peter M'Loughlin, for having excommunicated him, and thereby deprived him of the society of persons professing the Roman Catholic religion.

"It has been contended that the excommunication pronounced by the defendant, Dr. M'Loughlin, did not extend to exclude the plaintiff from society, but only from participating in the sacraments; but evidence to the contrary has been given: and I conceive it absurd to contend, at the present day, that the sentence of excommunication by a Roman Catholic bishop has not the effect of banishing the delinquent from the society of Roman Catholics.

"Let me ask any gentleman conversant with ecclesiastical history, what was the power and effect of the sentence of excommunication in those dark times of bigotry and superstition, when Christian popes and prelates exercised an absolute power and dominion over Christendom?

"It is a historic fact, that such dread and apprehension did this odious weapon of the church excite, such terror did it create in the mind, that even the very name of it made princes tremble on their throne. And, gentlemen, unless the tenets and doctrine of the Roman Catholic religion have undergone an entire change, have we any right to infer that the nature and effects of excommunication are not still unaltered? What was its dreadful effects on the mind of an English monarch, Henry II., when he bowed down and humbled himself to the then reigning Pope, begged pardon of him, as if he were his vassal, and prayed his forgiveness? Gentlemen, the difference attempted to be sustained by the defendant has reluctantly drawn from me these historical facts. And from their times down to the present we have not heard that the effects of excommunication have undergone any change in the Roman Catholic Church. I, therefore, consider that the nature and effects of excommunication are very little altered from what they were in those times to which I have alluded; and I do not entertain any doubt that the sentence pronounced by the bishop, in this case, was intended by him to have the effect of excluding the plaintiff from the benefit of Catholic society.

"Gentlemen, in the hearing of the gentlemen of the bar, I do not hesitate to assert that, WHEN A ROMAN CATHOLIC BISHOP EXERCISES THE AUTHORITY OF EXCOMMUNICATION IN THIS COUNTRY, HE ASSUMES A POWER INCONSISTENT WITH THE LIBERTY OF THE SUBJECT, AND CONTRARY TO THE LAW OF THE LAND. God forbid that the subject of a free country should be compelled to crouch under such slavish dominion—a dominion repugnant to every principle of your inestimable constitution; for is it not, in point of fact, a judge trying his own cause, and giving judgment where he is himself a party?

"In our ecclesiastical courts the person offending is summoned, not before the bishop of the diocess, but before a judge, who has a temporal jurisdiction to decree as well on the merits as on the law of the case; and if the person be dissatisfied with the judgment of the ecclesiastical court he can remove the cause into a civil court. What is the practice? A petition is made out for a commission of delegates, consisting chiefly of the judges of the land, who are ever anxious to guard the rights and liberties of the subject. Gentlemen, how strongly marked is the contrast between this mode of proceeding in the Establishment, and that adopted by a titular bishop of the Roman Catholic Church, where the same person unites in himself, contrary to the spirit of our constitution, the distinct province of accuser and judge? Gentlemen, I repeat, that it would be a monstrous thing if such an assumption of power were to be sanctioned by law in this free country for a moment; and if, under all the circumstances of the case, you shall be of opinion that, by the sentence of excommunication, the plaintiff was deprived of the benefit of society, you ought to find a verdict for him, and compensate him in damages, not only for the loss of business, but for the trouble and anxiety of mind which this person and his family have, ever since the passing of the sentence of excommunication, suffered."

The jury retired for some time, and returned a verdict for the plaintiff. Damages, £125.

[We have been furnished by a legal friend with a copy of the declaration or pleading filed by Philip Boyle in the above case, and shall be willing to allow any one engaged in a like proceeding, to protect his liberty from similar tyranny, to take a copy of it.—ED.]

INDULGENCES.

THE Right Rev. Dr. Keane having declined to respond to our friendly invitation, "to defend and prove the power of indulgences," we have been obliged, reluctantly, to search for arguments ourselves in eminent Roman Catholic writers upon the subject. We proceed now, as briefly as we can, to lay before our readers the result; and if the received doctrine should, like one of Prince Rupert's glass drops, fly in pieces and vanish into smoke and air the moment it is touched, we entreat our readers not to suppose that we have intentionally handled it roughly, merely because it is of too tender a composition to bear touching. That we have candidly stated the received doctrine of indulgences in the Roman Church, without exaggeration or misrepresentation, we believe will be admitted by every fair reader of the article in our October number. Statement and proof, however, are often widely different, and in this matter we think will be found so.

That indulgences have no foundation in Scripture or antiquity will scarcely be denied. Durandus de S. Porciano, successively Bishop of Puy and Meaux, and Master of the sacred palace at Rome, who died about AD. 1318, says, in his Commentaries Super Libros IV., Sententiarum, lib. 4, distinct 20, q. 3, p. 791, Lugdun. Ed., 1595—"But very little can be affirmed, with any certainty, concerning Indulgences; because neither the Scripture speaks expressly of them, and the Fathers—St. Ambrose, St. Hilary, St. Augustine, and St. Jerome—say nothing at all of them." Cardinal Cajetan, Dominus Soto, Bishop Fisher, Polydore Virgil, Alphonsus a Castro, all confess that the use of indulgences came very late into the church, and that there is no controversy on which the Scriptures or Fathers spoke less than this. Thomas Aquinas and St. Bonaventure tell us that there were some in the church who said that the intention of the church in indulgences was only, by a pious fraud, to draw men to charitable acts which otherwise they would not have done; as a mother which promises her child an apple, to induce him to run to her, which she never gives him when she has brought him to it." Thomas Aquinas, of course, rejects this opinion, "because this is, in plain terms, to make the church guilty of a notorious cheat; and as (says he, from St. Augustine), if any falsehood be found in Scripture, it takes away from the authority of the whole, so, if the church be guilty of a cheat in one thing, she will be suspected in all the rest."* Bonaventure also, of course, rejects the notion of indulgences being only a pious fraud, for "this would be to make the church to lie and deceive, and indulgences to be vain and childish toys." While, however, St. Thomas Aquinas and St. Bonaventure could not bring themselves to suspect the church of resorting to pious frauds, to cheat mankind into virtue, there were not wanting others of learning and piety who, while cordially attached to the Church Catholic, exclaimed boldly against its corruptions, and especially against this new doctrine of indulgences.

Wesselus Groningensis, who flourished in the 15th century, and died A.D. 1489, was incomparably the best scholar of his age, and therefore called, in the quaint phraseology of the times—"Lux Mundi," the "Light of the world." He was not only skilled in school divinity (almost the only learning of that time), but in the Greek, Hebrew, Chaldee, and Arabic languages. He had travelled through Greece and Egypt, and visited most of the universities of Europe; and, on account of his great learning, was much in favour with Pope Sixtus IV., who, on his visiting him at Rome, offered him anything he should ask. Wessel asked only for a Hebrew and a Greek Bible from the Vatican Library. "You shall have them (said the Pontiff), but, simple man, that you are! why did you not ask a bishopric?" "Because," said Wessel, "I do not want one."

Wessel, though thus offered a bishopric by his friend, Sixtus IV., was no friend to indulgences, and boldly asserts, in his epistles,† that no Pope could grant an indulgence for an hour, and that it is a ridiculous thing to imagine that, for the same thing done, sometimes an indulgence should be granted for seven years, sometimes for seven hundred, sometimes for seven thousand, years, sometimes for ever, by a plenary remission; and that there is not the least foundation in Scripture for the distinction of remitting the fault and the punishment, upon which the doctrine of indulgences is founded. that the giving them was a design of covetousness; and although the Pope once swore to the King of France's ambassador that he did not know the corruptions of the sellers of indulgences, yet when he did know them, he let them alone, and they spread farther; that God himself doth not give plenary remission to contrition and confession; therefore, the Pope can much less do it. But, if God doth forgive, how comes the Pope to have power to retain? and if there be no punishment retained when God forgives, what hath the Pope to do to retain?

One Jacobus Angularis Hoeck wrote against Wessel, and confessed that "there is nothing in Scripture or antiquity expressly for indulgences;" but he argues, that that is no argument, for there are many other things averred in their church as necessary points, which have as little foundation as this—viz., St. Peter's being at Rome, and sacramental confession; therefore at last he takes sanctuary in the Pope's and church's authority.

Wessel replied, "That indulgences were accounted pious frauds before the time of Albertus and Thomas (i.e. Albertus Magnus and Thomas Aquinas), about A.D. 1220; that there was a great number of divines who still opposed the canons and practice of the Church of Rome in this matter; that, supposing the church was for them, yet the authority of Scripture is to be preferred to it, and no multitude of men whatsoever is to be believed against Scripture; that he had not taken up this opinion rashly, but had maintained it in Paris 33 years before, and in the Pope's Penitentiary Court at Rome, and was now ready to change it if he could see better reasons for the contrary; that the doctrine of indulgences was

* An anecdote is related of St. Thomas Aquinas when upon a visit to Rome, being in the closet of Pope Innocent IV., when an officer of his chancery brought in a bag of money, procured by the sale of absolutions and indulgences. "You see, young man," said the Pope, "the age of the Church is past, in which she said 'Silver and gold have I none;'" to which Aquinas (the angelic doctor, as he was called) replied, "True, holy Father; but the age is also past in which she could say to the paralytic, 'Rise up and walk.'" delivered very confusedly and uncertainly, by which it appeared to be no Catholic doctrine; that the doctrine was so far from being firmly believed, that there was not the strictest person of the Carthusian or other orders, that should receive a plenary indulgence at the hour of death, that yet would not desire his brethren to pray for his soul, which is a plain argument he did not believe the validity of the indulgence: that many in the Court of Rome spoke more freely against them than he did; that the Pope's authority is very far from being infallible, or being averred as such in that church, as appeared by the divines at Paris condemning the Bull of Clement VI., about indulgences, wherein he took upon him to command the angels! and give plenary remission both from the fault and punishment, which authorized Bulls were then to be seen at Vienna, Lemoges, and Poictou."*

In Spain indulgences were condemned by Petrus de Osma, a divine of Salamanca, and his followers, as appears by the Pope's Bull against him in 1478; and in Germany Johannes Burchardus de Vesaliâ, a famous preacher of Mentz, proclaimed that indulgences were only pious frauds and ways to deceive the people, and that they were fools who went to Rome for them.† The celebrated Gerson (John Charlier), one of the most eminent and excellent ecclesiastics of his time (he died in 1429), who was ambassador from the King of France at the Council of Constance, and one of the principal speakers on all matters of doctrine and discipline in that Council, and acknowledged by Cardinal Zabarella as the most excellent doctor of all Christendom, in writing on indulgences, boldly asserts, "that none can give a pardon for so many years as are contained in the Pope's indulgences but Christ alone."‡ And Cardinal Bellarmine himself, in his treatise on indulgences, lib. i., c. 12, confesses "that it were better if the church were very sparing in giving indulgences; and that he would not have the people too confident of the effect of them: for though the church may have power to give indulgences, yet they want their effect in particular persons; and therefore all prudent Christians do so receive indulgences as withal to satisfy God themselves for their sins;" which looks very like a statement that wise and prudent persons did not and ought not to rely on them.

Where such eminent Roman Catholic writers are thus opposed to trusting to the efficacy of indulgences, it would, we think, require very clear evidence to establish their validity to any mind not predetermined to adopt and believe in them. Whether any such clear proof is to be found of their validity, we are prevented by our limited space from discussing at present, but hope to proceed to consider it in our next number.

CAUTION.

INFORMATION having been received, and several complaints made, that the CATHOLIC LAYMAN newspaper has been destroyed or wilfully detained in some of the country Post-offices; and complaints having been made at the General Post-office to that effect; our readers are requested to call the attention of country Postmasters to the danger of conniving at such practices, by which they not only incur the forfeiture of their offices, but both they and every person who shall aid or counsel them in so doing incur the penalty of fine and imprisonment, with or without hard labour and solitary confinement, under the Post-office Offences' Act, 1 Vict., c. 36, which enacts as follows:—

1 VICT., C. 36, POST-OFFICE OFFENCES.

"SEC. 32. And for the protection of printed votes and proceedings in parliament, and printed newspapers, sent by the post, be it enacted, That every person employed in the Post-office who shall steal, or shall, for any purpose, embezzle, secrete, or destroy, or shall wilfully detain or delay, in course of conveyance or delivery thereof by the post, any printed votes or proceedings in parliament, or any printed newspaper, or any other printed paper whatever sent by the post, without covers or in covers, open at the sides, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and, being convicted thereof, shall suffer such punishment, by fine or imprisonment, or by both, as to the court shall seem meet."

"SECS. 35 and 36. And be it enacted, That every person who shall aid, abet, counsel, or procure the commission of any misdemeanor, under the Post-office Acts, shall be liable to be indicted and punished as a principal offender; and every person who shall solicit or endeavour to procure any other person to commit a felony or misdemeanor, punishable by the Post-office Acts, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor; and being thereof convicted, shall be liable, at the discretion of the court, to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding two years."

"SEC. 42. And be it enacted, That where a person shall be convicted of an offence punishable under the Post-office Acts, for which imprisonment may be awarded, the court may sentence the offender to be imprisoned, with or without hard labour, in the common gaol or house of correction, and may also direct that he shall be kept in solitary confinement for the whole or any portion of such imprisonment as to the court shall seem meet."

The Catholic Layman.

DUBLIN, JANUARY, 1853.

WE appear before our readers again at the commencement of our second year, having surmounted the difficulties which attach to the commencement of every undertaking, and we pause to look back on our past labours, and to look forward to the work before us.

The success of our exertions so far has only increased the intensity of our desire to proceed with candour and the spirit of love; and we would earnestly entreat all our correspondents, for the year to come, to try and write under the influence not only of kindness, but sincere love for souls, and a desire to promote our salvation in the great day, as we shall strive to do by them.

In this spirit we have already discussed many solemn questions, of the deepest interest—the present state of our departed friends—our own future prospects when we shall have followed them to the grave—our means of arriving at the knowledge of the truth here, and of obtaining the inheritance of the blessed hereafter. And we trust and believe that we have already aided some of our readers in clearing up at least some difficulties, and removing some errors.

We hope we have also led many to think more deeply and more seriously of the necessity of seeking for truth, and detecting error; and in proportion as we may have accomplished this, we feel our responsibility increased to exhibit truth as well as expose error.

In our laborious search after truth during the past year, we have been compelled to reject much which assumed its name, but none of those who have watched our progress, can suspect that we would leave them, without guide or compass, in the dismal abysses of unbelief. We bless God, that so far have our free inquiries been from leading us into the dank and foggy region of infidelity or scepticism, that they have led us to the deep conviction, that Christianity is the only system of true philosophy ever yet presented to the world, the true source and sole support of all that is great and good in the human mind. The religion of Christ we unhesitatingly believe to be the religion of God himself, the great source of light and life; and if we devote so much pains and thought to show the uncertainty and inconsistency of doctrines which we believe to be mere human additions to Christ's religion, it is that we may endeavour to restore to our fellow-countrymen the sublime and pure religion of our most Blessed Redeemer in its original simplicity and beauty, and assist in relieving men's consciences from burdens which they are not able to bear. The religion of Christ we firmly and practically believe to be not only the religion of truth and holiness, but the only "service which is perfect freedom." "Come unto me," says the Redeemer, "all ye who travail and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest. For my yoke is easy, and my burden is light."

We would, therefore, commence our second year's labours with the language of hope. To a man groping in the dark and dismal caverns of doubt and ignorance, how discouraging the gloom and uncertainty around, how sad the forebodings of dangers and difficulties beyond! How needful that he should have some one at hand to cheer and encourage him in his onward struggle to reach the light; and how exhilarating the first rays of sunshine which burst upon him, and gladden his heart with the hope of freedom and the enjoyment of the pure atmosphere of heaven.

Those who have long held religious opinions in which truth and error were mixed together are in some danger at first of rejecting all, when they find some erroneous. This danger belongs not to religion alone, but to all inquiries after truth upon any subject. Shall we, therefore, cease to seek for truth, or cease to expose error? A world of moral and intellectual darkness would be the result; for error increases of itself, truth only by the search for it. No man need seek for error or ignorance to find it; but truth must be sought. The indolent and cowardly will increase in error, and lose the little truth they have. Let us only believe that God will grant his truth to them that seek it; let us lay hold on every truth we find, and trust in him for more.

Our own experience has convinced us that there is a clear and marked line between truth and error. It has convinced us, too, that those who cannot yet trace the line between them may still see that there are great and glorious truths on one side, and dark and dreadful errors on the other; and this latter distinction is the most necessary for man. Who can draw the line where daylight fades into the night? But can we not distinguish light from darkness? Can we never say "it is day" or "it is night" till we have fixed the precise boundary between? And yet there is a line between truth and error, and we may find it, too, if we proceed diligently and honestly in the serious search for it.

While meditating on this most interesting subject, we were struck with the sound sense and truth of the following impressive passage from an eminent Roman Catholic divine, which we shall give our readers verbatim, as expressing our own ideas more effectively than any language we could use ourselves, and we earnestly invite their most serious attention to it:—

"It is obvious to common sense, that, in order to find out any hidden thing, or to do any difficult thing, we must first discover, and then follow, a proper rule or method for such purpose. If we get hold of a wrong clue, we shall never extricate ourselves from a labyrinth. If we do not take the right road to any distant place, it cannot be expected that we should arrive at it. The importance of adopting a right rule or method for discovering religious truth, must be admitted by all thinking Christians; as it is evident that a right rule alone can conduct them to truth, and that a false rule is liable to conduct them into all sorts of errors. Yet, how few are there who follow a rational rule or method for the discovery of the true religion! In their other affairs, mankind are anxious to find, and careful to follow, a safe and adequate rule of acting: but how few are found equally anxious and careful, in the most important of all their affairs!

"Some persons choose their religion as they do their clothes, by the mere rule of their fancy. They are pleased, for example, with the talents of a preacher, and presently adopt his creed. Many others adhere to their religious system merely because they were educated in it, and because it was that of their parents and family, which, if it were a reasonable rule of acting, would equally excuse Jews, Turks, and Pagans for persisting in their respective impiety, and would impeach the preaching of Christ and his apostles. Others, again, glory in their religion, because it is the one established in this their country, so renowned for science, literature, and arms: not reflecting that the polished and conquering nations of antiquity—the Egyptians, Assyrians, Persians, Greeks, and Romans—were left, by the inscrutible judgments of God, in darkness and the shadow of death, while a poor, oppressed, and despised people, on the banks of the Jordan, were the only depositary of Divine truth, and the sole truly enlightened nation. But the greater part, even of Christians, of every denomination, making the business of eternity subservient to that of time, profess the religion which best accords with the rule of their interest, their prejudice, or their convenience. Thus, guided by mere fancy, or bewildered in the mists of prejudice, or blinded by worldly considerations, they know not whither they go.—John xii. 35. They may fondly flatter themselves that they are walking in the way of truth and life: but there is a way that seemeth right to a man, the ends whereof lead to death.—Prov. xvi. 25. They may persuade themselves that they adopt a sufficiently rational rule for discovering religious truth, that they have sufficient and safe grounds for the religion they profess: but the rule they adopt is but the rule of their own self-love; the grounds of their religion may be but the delusions of their own insincerity. In the meantime, they reflect not, or scarcely reflect, that the matter is of infinite consequence, that, in adopting a rule of faith, their immortal souls are at stake; that the religion chosen by this rule is connected with their eternal interests."*

It is hard to make those see who have determined to close their eyes, or to see only through the eyes of another; but we have ample means of knowing that it is not so with all. Fellow-countrymen, have you courage to examine and think for yourselves, in a matter where your immortal souls are indeed at stake, and where, if you follow mere fancy, or allow yourselves to be bewildered by the mists of educational prejudice, or blinded by worldly considerations, you may at last find yourselves, when it is too late, in the way that leads to death? Brother laymen, will you aid in the struggle to cast off a yoke which is too heavy for you to bear, or will you tamely bow your necks to the despots of Rome, who would subjugate all mankind to blind obedience to their tyrannical will? We trust the day is approaching when you will take the written Word of the living God as your guide, and disenthral yourselves from an ignominious and servile obedience to an Italian priest; and then may our beloved country be again what once she was—

"Great, glorious, and free—
First flower of the earth—first gem of the sea."

THE TOUCHSTONE.

OBJECTION 22.—Most Protestants are of opinion that children may be saved without baptism; and that persons grown up may be saved, though they neither are baptized nor desire to be baptized, but even refuse it, as Quakers.

Their Bible tells them, in plain terms (John iii. 5)—Except a man be born of water and of the spirit, he cannot enter the kingdom of God.

REPLY.—It is rather bold to say this of "most Protestants," since it is well known that all Protestants (except the Quakers) do baptize; which they certainly would not, if they regarded it as a matter of no consequence.

But, at all events, this objection does not affect the Church of England, which, in her Catechism, pronounces baptism to be "generally necessary to salvation."

OBJECTION 23.—Protestants deny that the grace of the Holy Ghost is given by the imposition of the bishop's hands in confirmation.

Their Bible teaches that it is (Acts viii. 15. 17), where Peter and John confirmed the Samaritans. They prayed for them that they might receive the Holy Ghost. Then laid they their hands on them, and they received the Holy Ghost.

REPLY.—If you read the Confirmation Service of the Church of England you will see that that rite is there represented as a means of grace. But, as for the "Holy Ghost," in the sense in which it is spoken of in the 8th of Acts (that is, the miraculous gifts, such as the gift of tongues, the gift of prophecy, and many others which the apostles conferred by the imposition of their hands—Acts xix. 6), this, it is plain, is not conferred by the imposition of hands of any bishop—Protestant or Roman Catholic—in these days.

OBJECTION 24.—Protestants deny that the blessed Sacrament, which Christ gave at his last supper, was the body and blood of Christ.

Their Bible affirms it in Christ's own express words (Matt. xxvi. 26, 28)—This is my body—This is my blood of the New Testament, which is shed for many, for the remission of sins. Luke xxii. 16, 20—This is my body which is given for you—This cup is the New Testament in my blood, which is shed for you. See also to the same effect Mark xiv. 22, 24, and 1 Cor. xi. 24, 25.

REPLY.—Whether the objector has here stated fairly the opinions of the Church of England, he has enabled his readers to judge by what he says in Objection 28—"Their own catechism expressly teaches that the body and blood of Christ are verily and indeed taken and received by the faithful in the Lord's Supper."

As for the words "This is my body," &c., it must be borne in mind that Protestants do not deny the truth of anything that Jesus and his apostles said. The only question between them and Roman Catholics is about the meaning of it—whether such and such passages are to be understood literally, or figuratively.

The disciples did not deny the truth of John the Baptist's words when he called our Lord "the Lamb of God," although they did not believe that He was literally a lamb; nor did they deny the truth of our Saviour's own words—"I am the true vine," "I am the door," "I am the good shepherd," &c.—although they did not understand Him to mean that He was a literal tree, bearing real leaves and literal bunches of grapes, or that He was an actual door, or that his occupation was keeping actual sheep, &c.

Protestants, then, do not deny the truth of the words used by our Saviour at the institution of the Eucharist, although they are content to understand them in the same sense in which they must have been understood by the apostles to whom they were addressed. For the apostles, who had not been perplexed when they heard our Lord speak of himself as a door, a shepherd, a vine, &c., would certainly not understand at the time that, by the words, "This is my body," our Saviour meant to convey that He was holding his own body in his own hands, and eating it in their company. And if they subsequently received any further revelation, informing them that they had been before mistaken in the meaning which they had attached to the words of institution, it is strange that they should never have recorded so very wonderful a revelation.

And Roman Catholics themselves must maintain that the words of institution cannot be understood absolutely literally; since, if we understand these words in their most literal sense, we must believe that it is the cup, and not the wine in it, which is changed into blood.

OBJECTION 25.—Protestants deny that the bread which Christ gave was his flesh, the same which he gave for the life of the world.

Their Bible affirms it (John vi. 51)—The bread that I will give is my flesh, which I will give for the life of the world.

OBJECTION 26.—Protestants deny that Christ's flesh is meat indeed, and his blood drink indeed.

Their Bible expressly affirms it (John iv. 55)—My flesh is meat indeed, and my blood is drink indeed.

REPLY.—Before Roman Catholics assert that the Protestant opinions concerning the Eucharist are condemned by the 6th of John, they ought at least to agree among themselves whether this chapter relates to the Eucharist at all. We have already quoted (see vol. i., pp. 34, 46) high Roman Catholic authorities who hold that it did not, as well as the admission of the Council of Trent (session 21, c. i.), that this was a point on which the Fathers differed.

OBJECTION 27.—Protestants are apt to say, with the unbelieving Jews (John vi. 52)—How can this man give us his flesh to eat? and (verse 60), This is a hard saying, and who can hear it?

Christ, in their own Bible, assures them (John iv. 53, 54, 56)—Verily, verily, I say unto you, except ye eat the flesh of the Son of man, and drink his blood, ye have no life in you. Whoso eateth my flesh and drinketh my blood hath eternal life, and I will raise him up at the last day. He that eateth my flesh, and drinketh my blood, dwelleth in me, and I in him.

REPLY.—The eating Christ's flesh and drinking his blood, spoken of in this text, is described as such that he who eateth "hath eternal life," but he who eateth not hath "no life in him." Protestants, therefore, conclude that it does not mean the mere receiving of the Eucharist, since it is acknowledged that many receive the Eucharist who do not obtain eternal life, but, on the contrary, thereby increase their condemnation. But if Roman Catholics suppose the verse to refer to the Eucharist, why do they withhold the cup from the laity, since it says, "Except ye eat the flesh of the Son of man and drink his blood ye have no life in you?"

OBJECTION 28.—Protestants deny that the cup of blessing which we bless is the communion of the blood of Christ; or that the bread which we break in the blessed sacrament is the communion of the body of Christ.

Their Bible expressly affirms it (1 Cor. x. 16)—The cup of blessing which we bless, is it not the communion of the blood of Christ? The bread which we break, is it not the communion of the body of Christ? And what makes them more inexcusable in denying it is, that their own catechism expressly teaches them, that the body and blood of Christ are verily and indeed taken and received by the faithful in the Lord's Supper.

REPLY.—The objector has here answered himself by showing that the Church of England does not contradict the assertion of St. Paul, but makes a statement in strict accordance with it. And Protestants appeal to this very passage as one of the proofs against transubstantiation, since Paul here expressly calls the consecrated elements BREAD.

OBJECTION 29.—Protestants teach, that to the unworthy communicant the sacrament is no more than bare bread and wine, and by no means the body and blood of Christ.

Their Bible assures them of the contrary, when it tells them (1 Cor. xi. 27, 29) that the unworthy communicant is guilty of the body and blood of our Lord; and that he receives damnation to himself, not discerning the body of our Lord. For how should he be guilty of the body and blood of our Lord if what he took were no more than bread and wine? And how hard a case would it be that he should be damned for not discerning the body of our Lord, which, in the opinion of these gentlemen, is not at all there?

REPLY.—The objector here is guilty of practising a remarkable artifice. He leaves out half the text, and says "the unworthy communicant" is guilty of the body and blood of our Lord. He evidently wished to keep out of sight that St. Paul wrote, "Whosoever shall eat this BREAD or drink this cup of the Lord unworthily, shall be guilty of the body and blood of the Lord." If Paul had held Romish views he should have written, "Whosoever shall eat the body and drink the blood of the Lord unworthily, shall be guilty," &c. But then he would have contradicted the verse cited in Objection 28—"Whoso eateth my flesh and drinketh my blood hath eternal life."

Every one must perceive that, by "discerning the Lord's body," Paul could not have meant discerning it by the bodily senses, since even Roman Catholics admit that a consecrated and an unconsecrated wafer are perfectly undistinguishable by the senses. Protestants do not believe, nor do they suppose Paul to have meant, that a man would be condemned for eating, without any reverence, a piece of consecrated bread which had come in his way by some accident, without his knowing anything of its consecration. But Paul is evidently speaking of those Corinthians who came together to celebrate the Lord's Supper, and yet ate and drank irreverently, as at an ordinary meal, without considering the solemnity of the Service and the great event it was intended to commemorate. Persons who do so, Protestants consider as guilty of a great sin, and they do not consider them as in any way partakers of Christ; because they consider this partaking as a benefit and blessing reserved for those who have faith in Christ and true devotion. Augustine, whom the Roman Catholics venerate as a saint, expressly declared this, and denies that the body and blood of Christ are in any sense received by the irreligious.

But they can have better assurance than any Roman Catholic can have, that, if they are truly devout believers, they are partakers of Christ in the sense which He himself meant when they reverently celebrate the Eucharist; for it is expressly declared by the Council of Trent, and in other authoritative documents of the Church of Rome, then the inward intention of the priest is essential to the true consecration, as well as the pronouncing of the words. If, therefore, a priest should chance to be an infidel in his heart, which is but too possible, (and no human being can be certain of the contrary), the wafer remains mere bread; and no Roman Catholic, therefore, can be at all certain that he is partaking in any way of Christ's body, or that he is not worshipping a piece of mere bread.

OBJECTION 30.—Protestants, to excuse their unbelief of the real presence of the body and blood of Christ in the blessed sacrament, pretend that it is impossible his body and blood should be in so small a space, or in more places than one at the same time.

Their Bible assures them, that with God all things are possible (Matt. xix. 26), even for a camel to go through the eye of a needle.—Verse 24. With men this is impossible, says our Saviour, but not with God; for with God all things are possible.—Mark x. 27. Nor is it harder with God for one body to be at once in two places, than for two bodies to be in one place, as when our Saviour came in to his disciples, the doors being shut.—John xx. 19, 26.

Reply.—Any Protestants who should refuse to believe anything that is clearly revealed by the Most High, because they cannot understand how it is possible, would certainly be very presumptuous. But it is surely no more than reasonable to require particularly strong proof of anything which at least seems contradictory, and which is not confirmed either by our own senses or by any one's else.

When Jesus appeared "in the midst of the disciples," the "doors being shut," they could not, of course, tell whether the door had been miraculously opened and shut again without their seeing or observing it, or in what other way their Master had entered; but their own senses witnessed that he actually was there in his own natural body; and we believe this on their testimony. This is, at least, a very different thing—supposing both to be true—from believing the body of our Lord to be, at the same time, in heaven and on a thousand different altars on earth.

Objection 31.—Protestants maintain that there is a necessity of receiving the sacrament in both kinds in order to life everlasting.

Their own Bible expressly promises eternal life to them that receive in one kind only.—John vi. 58. He that eateth of this bread shall live for ever. And verse 57—He that eateth me, even he shall live by me.

Reply.—Neither Protestants nor Roman Catholics can suppose that a man's salvation can be secured by his merely receiving the sacrament, either in one kind or in both. None of them, therefore, can believe that this was our Lord's meaning. It is plain, therefore, to all—Protestants and Roman Catholics—that He must have meant more than this, when He speaks of "eating of Him." He must have meant to include faith in Him, and love for Him, shown in "keeping his commandments" (see John xiv. 15)—in short, the whole Christian life.

But most Protestants think it presumptuous to depart from the mode of celebrating the Lord's Supper which was used (as all admit) by the apostles, and by all the early Christians, for many ages. And Roman Catholics would probably think the same, if they were aware not only of this fact, but also that one of the earlier Popes pronounced it sacrilege to administer the bread without the cup to any of the communicants.

Objection 32.—Protestants deny that there is any true and proper sacrifice in the church of Christ, to be offered in all places to the name of God.

Their Bible affirms it (Mal. i. 10, 11), where, rejecting the Jewish sacrifices, God declares his acceptance of that sacrifice, or pure offering, which should be made to Him in every place among the Gentiles. I have no pleasure in you, saith the Lord of Hosts, neither will I accept an offering at your hand. For from the rising of the sun even unto the going down of the same, my name shall be great among the Gentiles, and in every place incense shall be offered unto my name and a pure offering. Which cannot be understood of the sacrifice of the cross, which was offered but once, and in one place, and that among the Jews, not among the Gentiles.

Reply.—This is a mistake. All Christians, of whatever denomination, hold that sacrifices are to be offered up to God continually. The only question is, what the sacrifices should be.

1. The offering of slain beasts, which was an ordinance of the Jewish law, all Christians are agreed to reject, as not belonging to the Gospel dispensation.

2. The offering up of ourselves, as a kind of sacrifice to God, we find expressly enjoined in the christian Scriptures—"I beseech you," says the Apostle Paul (Rom. xii.), "that ye present your bodies a living sacrifice, holy, acceptable unto God."

3. The sacrifice of Christ's body, for the redemption of the world, is very expressly, and strongly, and frequently spoken of in Scripture as having taken place "once for all," and as not being to be repeated, but only commemorated; and its perfection and sufficiency are inferred in Scripture, from its not being repeated, and from there being "no more sacrifice for sin" needed or allowed.

4. The offering of incense, in a literal sense, is nowhere alluded to in the christian Scriptures, and seems to have been quite unknown in the early christian Church.

DID OUR SAVIOUR INSTITUTE SEVEN SACRAMENTS?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

Sir—In looking over Dr. J. Butler's Catechism, the other day, my eye caught the following question and answer:—"How many sacraments are there? A. Seven." What! thought I, seven sacraments! How is this? I read in the New Testament of only two—Baptism and the Lord's Supper. These I know, and can prove, were instituted by Christ himself, and left obligations on his Church. Being at a loss to know where the Church of Rome got the other five, I again looked at Dr. Butler's Catechism.

I thought to myself, since a sacrament must be ordained by Christ himself, surely Dr. B. will give us his very words; nothing else will satisfy me. Well, judge of my surprise, instead of referring me to the Scriptures written by the Apostles, and giving me chapter and verse, Dr. B. refers me to the Council of Trent, SS. 7, can. 1—that is, Dr. Butler says there are seven sacraments, because the Council of Trent says so.

Not being satisfied with this, and being curious to get all the proof the Church of Rome is able to advance on the point, I turned to the decrees of the Council of Trent. Here is the Canon referred to—"Whosoever shall affirm that the Sacraments of the New Law were not all instituted by Christ Jesus our Lord, or that they are more or fewer than seven, let him be accursed."

Now, the inquiry looked more serious. To be eternally cursed is awful even to think of. I then became doubly anxious to find out on what grounds the Council affirmed that "the sacraments were neither more nor fewer than seven." As yet not a particle of Scripture had been quoted in proof.

Thinking that the legates, the patriarchs, the bishops, and the divines (who drew up and sanctioned the canon referred to, as deciding the point) had, when discussing the subject, given Scriptural proof in its support, I took up the history of the Council, and examined the speeches of the Fathers; but still without success. It is true some divines argued that seven is a perfect number—that there are seven days in the week—seven excellent virtues—seven deadly sins—and seven planets—and so concluded that there must also be seven sacraments. Such reasoning was irresistible; with me it had the opposite effect.

I now took up the Catechism of the Council of Trent—that standard authority—out of which the priests are educated at Maynooth. Thinks I to myself, although Dr. Butler or the Fathers at Trent would not satisfy the laity with the verses in the Scripture which prove that our Saviour instituted seven sacraments, surely the priests will be favoured with the Scripture proof. I began to think I was right in my conjecture when I read the following statement in the catechism:—"The Sacraments of the Catholic Church are seven, as is proved from Scripture, from the unbroken traditions of the Fathers, and from the authoritative definitions of Councils."

Now, thought I, we must be near it; Scripture is at last referred to, as proving the point. Let us have the passage; if we have Scripture proof the point is settled: we won't require tradition or the councils, no more than the Almighty Creator required the help of men or angels in creating the world. His word was sufficient to create all things, and so his word written is sufficient to prove that there are seven sacraments.

Well, I looked anxiously through the catechism; I turned over page after page, to find out the particular book, chapter, and verse so confidently referred to, but I searched in vain. No Scripture proof is given; a witness is mentioned, but the witness is not brought forward; his testimony is not given. The natural conclusion is, that he has nothing favourable to say for the parties who keep him back.

Whilst looking for the Scripture proof, I met a note in the catechism, referring me to "C. of Trent 887, Can. 1; and to the Council of Florence."

I stopped and considered the references; I found that I had examined the first already without success; but, on looking at the second, a gleam of hope passed over my mind. Oh, thought I, the Council of Florence was held A.D. 1442, and is earlier authority than any yet examined; perhaps it has given the Scripture proof. I turned to the decree; it simply states—"the Sacraments of the New Law are seven." How provoking! I exclaimed; still no Scripture. All the authorities referred to state, that there are seven sacraments instituted by Christ; but none of them prove the fact by the only witnesses who can prove it—the Apostles or the Evangelists.

But, some Roman Catholic layman will say, why did you not examine Peter Dens on the subject? he is high authority at Maynooth. Well, so I did, but with no better success, as will appear by the following quotation from his work:—"The number seven (says Dens) is insinuated in various places in Scripture, thus, in Prov. 9.—'Wisdom hath built her house (that is, the Church), and hath cut out her seven pillars'—to wit, the seven sacraments, which as so many pillars sustain the Church. Thus (he adds) in like manner, in Exod. xxv., by the seven lights which were in one candlestick, this is insinuated, for the seven sacraments are so many lights which illumine the Church."—Den's Theol. Num. Sacr. So, after all, according to Dens, we have nothing but "insinuations," taken from the Old Testament, to prove that our Saviour instituted seven sacraments.

Dr. Doyle's Christian Doctrine was now put into my hands, that I might examine what he says, and the proofs which he brings forward. I found that he, like the rest, asserts that "there are seven sacraments, and refers his readers to the C. of Trent, SS. 7, Can. 1." Finding this authority referred to so often, and remembering that it pronounces a curse on all who affirm the contrary, it seemed to me that the supporters of the doctrine of seven sacraments relied more on the terror to be excited through fear of a curse, to establish her point, than on Scriptural authority.

But as cursing had no effect on me, I still searched for the Scripture proofs, and the next book I read was Dr. Doyle's, and I was greatly pleased with his answer to the question—"Where did Christ give us a command to baptize? A. In St. Matt. xxviii. 20." I liked that; it was Scripture authority. Thinks I to myself perhaps the doctor gives the Scripture proofs for his statement, that there are seven sacraments. I looked first at the chapter on Confirmation, and read—"Q. When did Christ ordain this sacrament? A. The time is not certain; but divines, most probably, hold it was instituted at Christ's last supper, or between his resurrection and ascension." I turned then to the chapter on Extreme Unction, and read—"Q. When did Christ institute it? A. The time is uncertain; some think it was instituted at the Last Supper," &c. Further on I read—"Q. When was matrimony made a Sacrament of the New Law? A. Where and when Christ instituted this sacrament is uncertain," &c.

If I wanted anything to convince me that there was no Scripture authority for the doctrine of seven sacraments Dr. Doyle's admissions, just quoted, would be sufficient. With all his learning he could not find or quote a passage of Scripture on the subject.

Lieberman, a Roman divine, instead of searching for Scripture, is content with saying—"The Church says it;" which, after all, comes only to this—you must believe there are seven sacraments, because the Church of Rome says it is proved by Scripture, whether it is so or not.

I was now convinced that our Saviour did not institute seven sacraments; and, on looking into history, I there found that Peter Lombard, a writer of the 12th century, was the first to reckon seven sacraments, and that this invention gained ground in the subsequent centuries until, at last, it took its present form. TO THE EDITOR OF THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

Sir—Engaged in the disquisition of truth, and especially with an adversary pledged, as you are, to a full, fair, candid, and impartial investigation of arguments, I shall premise no apologies for offering a few remarks on some of the leading articles of your journal. By the bye, I have a great antipathy to dishonest and disingenuous argumentation, though such sophisticating may give a temporary triumph over an inferior antagonist; but we shall only thus impose on ourselves and others. Truth does not need such subterfuges—"Nec defensoribus istis. Magna est veritas et prevalebit."

In the September number of your periodical you say, respecting the visibility of the Church of Christ, that it was always visible. Let me require of you to point out the locus of its existence in the days of Berengarius. He was bound, of course, to hear the church (Mat. xviii. 17), to obey his prelates and follow their faith.—Heb. xiii. 7, 17. Did he then, and who were these prelates? Will you, Mr. Editor, be able to overleap that obstacle? We find churches, councils, bishops, ecclesiastics and friends exhorting him to obedience, and he would not. Were they or he the Church of Christ? "Utram horum mavis accipe." If he was the church, he recanted, and abjured all his Protestantism towards the close of life. Where was the church then, as well as before he began to broach his new dogmas, about the year 1040? Now, sir, I have you impaled (as they say) on the horns of a dilemma. You have chosen the other alternative; for you say, in reply to objections nine and ten of the "Touchstone," "that the Christian Church" (that is, the churches in communion with Rome, for there were no other, except you make Berenger the church) had never wholly revolted, that God's Spirit never abandoned her, that God had not cast her off, that the fundamentals of Christianity were preserved in that church termed (by modern Protestant controversialists) "the mother of harlots and abominations, the scarlet Lady, drunken with the blood of the saints and martyrs of Jesus, the mystery of iniquity, the man of sin, whom the Lord shall destroy with the spirit of his mouth." In conclusion, the 19th article of your church defines the visible Church of Christ to be "a congregation of faithful men (mind that), in which the pure Word of God is preached, and the sacraments duly administered, according to Christ's ordinance."

For as much as you will signally fail to point out, at the period I have selected, any such congregation, however small, with which you can consistently identify yourself; and inasmuch as this scarlet Lady of ours, this mother of whores, had been sunk in gross and abominable idolatry for 800 years and more, I assert that, according to your principles, the pure Word of God could not have been preached or the sacraments duly administered, that there was no visible Church of Christ, that the gates of hell must have prevailed against it, that our dear and blessed Redeemer could not, upon your principles, be the true Messiah, and that your system leads to absolute infidelity. There is a climax for you, Mr. Editor. If you affect to despise or attempt to evade these arguments, I will be at liberty to construe such conduct into inability; but if, without turning to the right hand, or to the left, you grapple manfully with them, you shall hear from me again. In the meantime,

I remain, with Christian charity,

PHILALETHES.

P.S.—To the second portion of my letter I would more particularly direct your attention—namely, the visibility of the church.

We have not published the whole of the above letter, for this reason—we have already stated to our correspondents, that it is essential that each letter addressed to us should be confined to some one subject. The limits of our paper render it necessary to adhere to this rule. We, therefore, publish "Philalethes's" account of himself, and that part of his letter which he especially calls on us to answer. The part which we have omitted relates to a quite different subject, the passage in the Book of Maccabees, and contains nothing which we have not answered already. We therefore apply ourselves, as "Philalethes" himself requires, to what he says of the visibility of the church.

Proofs from Scripture are entitled to the greatest attention from us. "Philalethes" quotes Matt. xviii., 17; but, if he will look at the place in his Douay Bible, he will see that it relates merely to offences of one man against another man—"If thy brother shall offend against thee." It is of that case only that our Saviour says—"Hear the Church," for the church should strive to reconcile brethren, and bring them into peace and love with each other.

"Philalethes" quotes also Hebrews xiii. 7 and 17—"Obey your prelates, and follow their faith." Now, here we must insist on coming to an understanding with "Philalethes" on the real meaning of this precept. Does it mean that whatever faith the prelates we happen to be under may choose to adopt, that we are bound to follow his faith? Or, is it to be understood with the limitation which St. Paul elsewhere lays upon our following himself—"Wherefore I beseech you be ye followers of me, as I also am of Christ."—1 Cor. iv. 16. But we are not to follow even Paul, except as he followed Christ, for he says—"Though WE or an angel from heaven preach a gospel to you besides that which we have preached to you, let him be anathema."—Galatians, i. 8.

We call upon "Philalethes" to say whether he does or does not admit that a difference must be made between the "faith of the church" and the opinions and doctrines of particular bishops and doctors. To help him to answer this we give him an instance:—

Azorius, one of the greatest doctors of the Church of Rome, says—"The image is to be worshipped with the same honour and worship with which we worship those whose image it is." And this was not merely a singular opinion of his own, for he says further—"This is the constant sense of the divines."—Instit. Moral. par. 1, Lib. 9, c. 6. And we could give a long list of the most celebrated divines in the Church of Rome who have said the same. We could even go farther, for the pontifical published by authority of Pope Clement VIII. contains these words—"The legate's cross must be on the right hand, because latria, or Divine honour, is due to it."—Edit. Roman, p. 672. And Almaine says—"The images of the Trinity and of the cross are to be adored with the worship of latria."

Is "Philalethes" a "worshipper of images?" We trust he is not. But if we should charge him with it, on the ground that a multitude of the greatest doctors and teachers of the Church of Rome have actually taught it, and that he, as a Roman Catholic, is bound to follow their faith, how would he answer us? Would he not say that these things were the errors of individuals, and not the doctrines and faith of the church? Would he not say this, even of that worship of the legate's cross which was sanctioned by Pope Clement VIII.?

Well, then, we ask, How are we to distinguish that this doctrine is really an error of individuals, and not the faith of the Roman Catholic Church? What answer will he give to this? Will he say that he knows it, because this doctrine was never decreed by a general council? He CANNOT say this, because this very doctrine was actually decreed by the second Council of Nice, in the year 787, which all Roman Catholics hold to be a general council. These are the words of the council—"These precious and venerable images, as is aforesaid, we honour and salute, and honouring, WE ADORE THEM*—that is to say, the image of the humanity of the great God, and of our Saviour, Jesus Christ, and of our holy and undefiled lady, the Mother of God . . . also the images of the saints and incorporeal angels," &c., &c.—Concilia Generalia, Labbe and Cossart, vol. vii., p. 332.

* "Thou shalt not adore them"—God's commandment in the Douay Bible.—Exodus xx. 5.

Now, how will "Philalethes" show us that "adoring images" is not a doctrine of the Catholic Church, but only an error of particular doctors and bishops, and councils? Can he make any answer now but this, that there never was any such thing in any of the Catholic creeds, in which the church taught and declared her faith?

We think this answer a very good one: only we are puzzled to understand how any one who holds the Creed of Pope Pius IV. can venture to give such an answer; for one of the articles of that creed is as follows—"All other things delivered, defined, and decreed by the general councils, I, without doubt, receive and profess." How can any one who professes this refuse to "adore images?" We submit this to "Philalethes's" consideration.

But now to apply this principle to the visibility of the church in the time of Berengarius—that is, in the eleventh century. We look to the creeds of the Catholic Church in that age, and we do not find in any of them the doctrine which the Pope and some bishops sought to force on Berengarius. We, therefore, conclude that the doctrine in question was not any part of the faith of the church, but only a private opinion of that Pope and those bishops.

We find that "the church" then held precisely the same creeds which the Church of England and Ireland holds now. These creeds were the public authorized testimony of the church, as a church, to what she held as the Catholic faith. Any errors then prevailing among particular bishops were not in the creeds of the church, and, therefore, were not the faith of the church; and, therefore, notwithstanding the errors of individual bishops, we have no difficulty in acknowledging at that time both the faith and the visibility of the church, while condemning and rejecting the errors which were held by individuals.

We have shown that this principle—"that the faith of the church is delivered in the public creeds of the church, and in them alone"—is the only one that can at once enable us to be Catholics, and yet preserve us from being "worshippers of images." On that great principle we, who hold to the ancient Catholic creeds, as the declaration of our faith, have no difficulty in showing the perpetuity and visibility of the Church of Christ.

But can those who hold the Creed of Pope Pius IV. show the perpetuity and visibility of the church on the same principle? It is clear that they cannot; for if the creed of Pope Pius be, as it professes, "the Catholic faith, without which no one can be saved," then, surely, it was necessary that there should have been in every age a visible church professing that creed. Surely "Philalethes" must know that no church on earth even professed that compilation of Pope Pius as its creed until the Roman Church did so in 1563. If that creed be indeed "the Catholic faith," where was the visibility of a church professing it for 1500 years?

We trust "Philalethes" will give a candid consideration to a principle which will enable him to hold the perpetuity and visibility of the church, without being involved in "worshipping images" and other such things; in other words, a principle which will enable him to be a true Catholic, following the apostles, bishops, and martyrs "as they followed Christ," and not otherwise.

We shall be glad to hear from "Philalethes" again, provided he will confine each letter to one subject. And we would suggest to him to write less boastfully: we always try to avoid vain boasting ourselves, and our correspondents would do well to follow our example in this.

We have to thank "Philalethes" for his private letter, in which he gives us his name, and informs us that he was educated for the priesthood, giving us, at the same time, sufficient reference to vouch for his statement. The fact of his education, of course, renders him a desirable correspondent for us.

THE SIN OF JEROBOAM.

MR. EDITOR—Reading in your last number (December) of the CATHOLIC LAYMAN the letters of your correspondents, "Petitor Fontium" and "A Retired East Indian," on the subject of the Roman Catholic view of the second commandment and practice of image worship, it occurred to me it might be useful towards the farther elucidation of the important question, whether the Church of Rome in that view and practice be opposed to the Bible or not, to follow out and add something to the Scriptural evidence adduced by your latter correspondent. He very justly argues, that the golden calves, made by Aaron, were intended to be representations of Jehovah—the God of Israel—from the words addressed by him to the people, in the ceremony of exhibiting the images to their view—"These be thy gods, O Israel, which brought thee up out of the land of Egypt," plainly implying it was no new object of worship he was setting up, but only a visible representation of Jehovah, whom they had chosen to be their God, and "who had brought them up out of the land of Egypt;" and also from the still plainer words—"To-morrow is a feast to the Lord," meaning thereby the feast of the dedication of that image to his honour. Yet, we know that Aaron and the people were guilty of a grievous sin in making and bowing before this image, though intended by them to be a representation of the true God; and St. Paul charges them with idolatry—1 Cor. x. 7. (I quote from the Douay Bible)—"Neither become ye idolators, as some of them. As it is written, The people sat down to eat and drink, and rose up to play." From this passage in that Bible there is a reference to Exod. xxxii. 6, showing that the translators or commentators were fully aware that the Apostle alluded to Aaron's sin.

Again, in Deut. iv. 15, 16 (Douay version), the Israelites are exhorted thus—"Keep, therefore, your souls carefully. You saw not any similitude in the day that the Lord God spoke to you in Horeb from the midst of the fire, lest, perhaps, being deceived, you might make you a graven similitude." Thus it appears, while they were allowed to hear the voice of the true God, they were not permitted to see a similitude of him, lest they might be tempted to make a copy, or a graven image of Jehovah, according to the similitude, for religious use and adoration.

The next proof is taken from the sin of Jeroboam, of whom it is said—"He made Israel to sin." In the Douay Bible (3 Kings xii. 28, 30) the following account is given of it:—"And finding out a device"—that is, to prevent any of the ten tribes going up to Jerusalem to worship, according to their previous custom, and of the political effects of which he was much afraid—"he made two golden calves, and said to them, Go ye up no more to Jerusalem; behold thy gods, O Israel, who brought thee out of the land of Egypt. And he set the one in Bethel, and the other in Dan, and this thing became an occasion of sin, for the people went to adore the calf as far as Dan."

There is a note at the bottom of the page, on the first of these verses, in the following words—"'Tis likely, by making his god in this form, he mimicked the Egyptians, among whom he had sojourned, who worshipped their Apis and Osiris under the form of a bullock." But I would venture to suggest, Is it not more "likely" that he imitated Aaron, since not only the material and form were precisely the same, but the words of proclamation also? In the above note, though it is not expressly said that Jeroboam set up false gods as objects of adoration, yet the impression left on the mind of the reader is, perhaps, that he did. However this be, it is very material to our argument to determine the precise nature of Jeroboam's sin. Accordingly we turn to 3 Kings xv. 31 (Douay Bible), and find it declared that "it was not enough for him [that is, for Achab] to walk in the sins of Jeroboam, the son of Nabat, but he also took to wife Jezebel, the daughter of Ethbaal, King of the Zidonians, and he went and served Baal." From this passage it appears that Achab's sin was different from, and much worse than Jeroboam's. We are also plainly told what Achab's sin was—that it was serving the false god, Baal. What, then, was Jeroboam's? Was it, too, the worship of a false god? If so, where was the difference between them? Could the worship of one false god be so different from, and so much worse than that of another, as to call for the strong reprehension of the sacred writer? The doctrine of Holy Scripture is not so. There the pretended deities are put all upon the same level, and their worshippers are characterized as alike contemptible and wicked—"They that make them are like unto them, and so are all they that put their trust in them."

But if this be disputed, there is further evidence sufficient to settle the question, and determine unanswerably the precise nature of Jeroboam's sin. This proof is taken from the case of Jehu, another of the kings of the ten tribes. From his history we learn that he was specially appointed by Jehovah to punish the house of Achab for their sin in serving Baal—See 4 Kings ix. 6, 7. In the same chapter there is an account of his commencing the execution of the sacred task thus intrusted to him. In the following chapter (15, 16 verses) is related the meeting of Jonadab, the son of Rechab, with Jehu, while engaged in his enterprize, and Jehu's inviting him to come up into his chariot, and saying to him, "Come, see my zeal for the Lord." The succeeding verses, which it would occupy too much space to quote in full, tell us that "Jehu slew all that were left of Achab in Samaria," and describe minutely, also, how he destroyed the worshippers of Baal, which is summed up thus in 28th verse—"So Jehu destroyed Baal out of Israel." He is commended for his courage and faithfulness in fulfilling the commission intrusted to him, and promises are given of the continuance of his descendants on the throne of Israel for several generations. Most unquestionably Jehu is described as the champion of the true God—Jehovah, the God of Israel, against the false God, Baal. Nevertheless, what is said of him in the 29th verse? "But yet he (Jehu) departed not from the sins of Jeroboam, the son of Nabat, who made Israel to sin, nor did he forsake the golden calves that were in Bethel and in Dan."

The conclusion, then, is inevitable, that Jehu's and, consequently, Jeroboam's sin consisted not in worshipping false gods, but in making and venerating images of the Lord. It appears to me to be rigidly demonstrated, and it follows as clearly that the Church of Rome, in sanctioning the use and veneration of images of the true God, is guilty of the sin of Jeroboam; that the strong presumption further is, that what Protestants call the second commandment is directed against and condemns that sin: therefore, that the Romish division of the commandments is erroneous, and the Protestant the right and just one.

A Lover of Truth.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

Dear Sir—I live in the west of the county Waterford, near the town of Youghal, where Father Foley kept what the Protestants called a "religious theatre" some time ago, but, like many other undertakings, it did not tell well, times being bad, and the people too fond of cash (small blame to them; 'tisn't gut very easy).

Well, Mr. Editor, I must tell you there was in this neighbourhood, some time ago, a clergyman of the Protestant Church (Mr. Aldworth)—and sure they are calling it a Catholic Church now—and a civil gentleman he was; but, however, like the readers in Kilcommon, he alarmed the priests with what are called "controversy lectures."

Well, as we expected, the priests determined not to let him have "all the game to himself," so they began to lecture in the chapel, and one of them (Father Smiddy) said they made thirty converts, though we never saw them, and he told Mr. Aldworth so in a letter he wrote to him. But what I want, Mr. Editor, is your opinion on a part of his letter to Mr. Aldworth, and to know from you why the people are not allowed to exercise their judgment in the same way, and under the same circumstances, that Father Smiddy says he would exercise his own; and why a priest should be the first man to prevent us.

I now give you the part of his letter in question:—

"Let me also inform you"—to Mr. Aldworth—"that, within the last year, at least thirty persons have fled to the rock of Catholicity from the shifting sands of Protestantism. Can you boast of anything like this? Thanks again to God, the work of conversion is going on rapidly in Youghal. Without presuming to dictate to any one, I must say that, if I saw the steady and thinking individuals of the crew thus deserting my ship, I should very minutely sound the planks and examine her condition, no matter by what human authority she was warranted safe."

Well, Mr. Editor, I was listening to a lecture delivered in Ardmore school—where St. Declan lived and preached—by a Protestant clergyman, and he said that, in his opinion, 34,000 of the people of Ireland had gone to church; and I'm told that reading the Douay Bible made them do so, and that puzzles me right and left. I don't know what to say to it; 'tis like beating a man with his own stick; and, Mr. Editor, if this is the case, I think the sooner we examine our vessel the better; and, I'm told, the boys in America are doing something like it, and, in my humble judgment, a good many of them are taking the sea-store which your paper says St. Chrysostom recommended so many years ago; and maybe its the ignorance is dying out "of the boys instead of the faith." I'm told they are at liberty to think as they like in America, and, I think, we ought to be allowed to do so here, too; and sure, if a gentleman is kind enough to read the Douay Bible to a person, 'tisnt like liberty to send a bellman after him, as I'm told the priests do in Meath, and in some other parts down, and, I'm thinking, it might serve their cause after—for, as Jem Carty says, it may have the same effect on the readers as it has on a swarm of bees; shouting and bell-ringing will make them pitch and begin to work, instead of driving them away; and, I'm beginning to think (and more of the boys, too) if the church is infallible, it don't want the support of a bellman at any rate. I hope, Mr. Editor, you will pardon me for trespassing on you; but your kindness in printing Pat Murray's letter and T. M'D's made me apply to you for a little information.

I am, Mr. Editor,
Your humble servant,
Jeremiah O'Reily.

Clashmore, county Waterford.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

Sir—I have heard say from my neighbour, Pat Murray, and from other honest people too, that ye are a kind man, that will not grudge a bit of advice to a poor man in a nonplush. Sir, it was only last October that my poor Frank was taken from me with the fever. A better boy never lived. From the time that he was the hith of my knee, his mother nor I never had to say a cross word to him; and, sir, it is hard to lose him now, when he was beginnin' to be a support and a comfort to us; but it was the Lord took him, and blessed be his will. Well, sir, we gave him a dacent berrin', and its we weren't stingy to the priest either; for I'd scorn to save money that could be either a credit or a profit to poor Frank. And we were wishin', last month, to have more masses said for him; for though there couldn't be a better Christian nor Frank, nor one that made a happier end, I know it's only saints and holy bishops that can expect to go strait to heaven without passin' through purgatory. So, sir, I went up to the master, Mr. Carter, to borry a pound; for with all we had spent in the berrin' we were hard put to it, and the master is a good and a kind man, and I didn't mind askin' him. And, when I tohld him what made me want the money, ses he to me—"Mike," ses he, "I don't think you're wise in the way you're spendin' your money; for," ses he, "didn't you tell me that your son died trustin' in the Lord Jesus Christ to save him; and don't you think he is able to save us from hell or purgatery?" "He is, sir," said I; "but shure we're all sinners, and sin must be punished." "That it must," says he; "but didn't the Lord Jesus bear the punishment of our sins on the cross, and would God be so unfair as, after he had borne the punishment, to take it agen out of his people, and to be angry with the people he died for?" So, Mr. Editor, though I didn't half like taking it on me to instruct the master, yet as ye couldn't expect a Protestant like him to know the Catholic doctrine as well as one that had been taught by the priest like me, "Sir," ses I, "you're under a great mistake; if God sends souls to purgatery it's not that he hasn't forgiven them, or that he's angry with them, but, sir, the priest tould me that it's in the Bible that nothing defiled can enter into the kingdom of heaven; or if it's not in the Bible, it stands to reason anyhow. Sure if ye were to ask my little Paudheen into yer house, his mother wouldn't let him into yer drawin'-room before he was washed from top to toe, and if she sent him up dirty yer honour would be right to turn him out again; and so it stands to reason, too, that a sowl is not let into heaven until all the sin is burnt out of it, and till there's not as much left as would darken the white of your eye." So, Mr. Editor, I thought the master saw the sense of that, and he stood, for a while, as if he was considering; and at last, "Mike," ses he, "does yer little Paddy ever cry when he's being washed?" "Troth he does, sir," ses I, "whenever his mother tries him that way." "Well," says he, "and if I was to invite him to my drawin'-room, as you say, would you mind his cryin' a little, or would you have him washed till he was quite clean?" "Ah, then, your honour," ses I, "I wish you saw him when his mother gets hould of him; troth he might roar as he liked, but whether he liked it or not, she would not let him out of her clutches till she had made him fit to be seen." "Why, then, Mike," says the master, "here's the money; but I advise ye to consider what ye do with it; for," ses he, "it's no pleasure to God to put Frank to pain, and ye may depend on it he won't send him to purgatery if it's not good for him, and sure he would know better than you. And if all the sin isn't burned out of him yet, it's better for him to bear a little pain till it is, than let him go into heaven with it in him. Sure," says he, "ye might as well let yer little Paddy come into my room with a dirty face, just because he did not like havin' it washed."

So, Mr. Editor, I have been thinking since over what the master sed, and talking it over with my wife, and we were never worse in want of a friend's advice. For though it's the hardest winter we have had this many a long year, and though the money would come handy to us, I'd rather pawn the last stitch of clothes we had, and go without a stick to warm ourselves, sooner nor Frank shuld want anything that nd do him good. But I've been thinking that maybe Frank would not be obliged to us if we got him out of purgatery before the Lord's time to take him out. For sure he would not like it if, when he got into heaven, the other sowls looked down on him, and said—"There's the fellow that his friends got in here before he was half cleaned, and with half his sins not burned out of him." So, sir, a word of advice will much oblige

Your humble servant to command,
Mike Dolan, of Westmeath.

[We tell Mr. Dolan candidly that if a man does not forsake his sins in this world, we don't know of any way for his getting rid of them in the next. However, we are quite sure of this, that if God has provided any such way it would be a very unfriendly thing to prevent a man's having the full benefit of it. And since Mr. Dolan says that his son died trusting in his Saviour, we advise him to leave him in his hands, assured that he will not make him suffer more pain than is for his good.—Ed. C. L.]

FARM OPERATIONS FOR JANUARY.

Any winter ploughing remaining undone should be put out of hands without loss of time, that the land may receive the ameliorating influence of the winter's frosts and thaws as much as possible, taking advantage when the land is dry, but avoid ploughing when the land is saturated with wet. All stubble ploughing ought to be deep, certainly not less than seven inches, and, if possible, ten inches. To turn over the latter-mentioned depth, it will be necessary to yoke three horses in the plough. Shallow ploughing is useless; and good after-crops can never be raised when this practice is followed. Attend closely to the draining and subsoiling of all such portions of the farm as require those primary, vital operations.

Wheat.—The very severe weather, which has continued with little intermission for many weeks, has very much retarded wheat sowing, and in many districts where it has been sown the grain has rotted in the ground. As wheat may be sown with every chance of success during the early part of this month, if the land be found sufficiently dry, we would earnestly urge farmers to make every exertion to get in the usual breadth, taking care, as the season advances, to increase the quantity of seed.

Bere may still be sown in early and dry soils, as a grain crop, and in almost all soils for a soiling crop.

Rye may also be sown, on cold, backward soils, or mountain land, for either a grain crop or soiling.

Spring Vetches may be sown towards the end of the month, if the weather be open and dry.

Peas can be sown from the middle of the month, if the land be light and tolerably dry, with or without manure.

Beans may be sown on strong land, if not too wet, they require a liberal dressing of manure if sown on stubble land.

Plant out Roots for Seed.—This will be a good time to select and plant out the roots of turnips, mangels, parsnips, and carrots for the production of seed. Prepare a deep, rich, friable soil, well manured, in a fully exposed, unsheltered aspect, away from hedges, trees, or walls; select the largest, cleanest, and best formed roots, and plant in trenches—turnips and mangles, three feet trench from trench, and the roots two feet apart in the trench; parsnips, three feet by one-and-a-half feet apart; and carrots, two and-a-half feet by one foot; and then cover the entire of the bulbs. It will be better to choose a stronger soil for those roots to seed in than that they grow in the last season. If more convenient, the roots may be left to seed in the land they grew in, without disturbing them; but in this case, it will be necessary to remove every second row, and every second root in the row; let the intervals be well cleaned afterwards, and the roots to remain be well earthed up. Cultivate but one variety of the same species on the same farm, otherwise the seed will be impure, and not to be relied on.

Grass Lands, whether intended for meadow or grazing stock, should be well top-dressed with rich composts, with as little delay now as possible; and all should be cleared of stock. As soon as the top-dressing is sufficiently dry, bush-harrow and roll.

Water Meadows require constant attention this month, remove every obstruction to the free flow of the water in the various canals and ducts, and keep the water constantly and evenly flowing. Change the water from one field to another once a week or ten days, during mild weather; but in the case of frost keep it still running as the tender grass suddenly exposed to keen winds or frost would be greatly injured.

Stall-fed Cattle should now be putting up flesh rapidly, and as soon as ripe should be disposed of.

Cattle of all sorts should be kept clean and comfortable, for no animal will thrive well, no matter how abundant its keep, wanting these essentials. Attention to these requisites, with moderate rations of good and wholesome food, will keep stores of all kinds, and milch cows, in a healthy and thriving condition, and free from black-leg and other diseases. Feed milch cows so as to keep them in vigorous health—neither too fat nor too lean—by moderate supplies of succulent food—sweet hay and fresh straw. Give no frozen turnips, and let each animal have free access to salt.

Ewes require like treatment; let them have dry lying, shelter, and a moderate supply of wholesome, nutritious food; avoid giving frozen turnips, but let them have free access to good hay and salt.

Fatting Wethers should have a liberal supply of good hay with their turnips and oil-cake or corn. Dry lying, and access to hay and salt, are the best preservatives against rot.

Pigs of all sorts should be well and liberally fed; and all not put up for fatting should have plenty of exercise; those fatting should have a liberal supply of grain, for a month at least before being slaughtered.

Manure.—Let the accumulation of manure be constantly attended to. Leaving the manure strewed about and ungathered, exposed to constant rains, which wash away, and drying winds, to evaporate its most valuable properties, should not be tolerated; let, therefore, no time elapse before it is gathered up and stored, in good-sized middens, or removed to those portions of the farm where it is intended for application to the different root crops, &c., mixed with light, dry, rich earth, banked up, and well covered at both top and sides, to preserve it from the action of the weather. Let the liquid manure be attended to and well husbanded; empty the tanks frequently, and top-dress meadows and grass lands with it, or pour it over the dung-heaps.

Odds and Ends.—Keep the thrashers busy, so as to supply the cattle with straw; attend to the repairs of fences and the formation of new ones. In all open, dry weather keep the plough at work, and in times of frost lead and carry out manure to the land it is intended to be used on; repair roads; quarry and convey limestone to the kiln, with fuel for burning it; scour out ponds and ditches; level old fences, mixing lime with the surplus earth; repair implements.

SOCIETY FOR PROTECTING THE RIGHTS OF CONSCIENCE IN IRELAND.

President:

REV. CADWALLADER WOLSELEY.

Treasurer:

WILLIAM HOGAN, ESQ.

Office, 133, Stephen's-green, Dublin.

Bankers:

Messrs. BOYLE, PIM & Co., College-green, Dublin.

IT is now well known that the free exercise of liberty of conscience is prevented in Ireland, not only by acts of violence in some places, but by a general and wide-spread persecution, the object of which is to deprive of all means of support, for themselves and their families, those who seek instruction from the clergy, attend the Church, or allow their children to go to the schools connected with it.

The committee of this society have, with the small amount of funds, hitherto intrusted to their care, given assistance, in eighteen different places, to employ those who thus suffer persecution for conscience sake; they now find that their funds are exhausted and that the number of claims on them increases every day. They are, therefore, compelled to seek public assistance, and to call on all the friends of religious freedom to aid them in their struggle against persecution. They stand totally unconnected with other societies, but feel that the importance of their peculiar object cannot be over-estimated.

Any information which may be required respecting the society can be obtained on application to the Rev. Cadwallader Wolseley, the honorary secretary, 133, Stephen's-green, Dublin.

THE CONFESSORS OF FLORENCE.

In the nineteenth century of the Christian era, in the year of our Lord 1851, Francesco Madiai and his wife were arrested in Florence, on the charge that they having themselves apostatized from the Catholic religion and professed an heretical confession, called evangelical, were also guilty of impiety in seeking by the distribution of tracts, and by other similar means, to propagate the same opinions amongst others; and it was upon this latter charge of proselytism that the public prosecution relied as bringing them within the criminal code of Tuscany. On this charge they were arrested. Pending the trial both were shut up in prison. After nine months' imprisonment the trial came on. At the trial, the Madiai admitted the truth of some of the charges brought against them. They confessed that they did accord more authority to the Bible than to the Church of Rome; that they had sought to instruct others in those truths of the Gospel which had brought comfort to their own souls; and finally that they had held meetings at their own house, for purposes of prayer and examination of Scripture.

The court, in its sentence of condemnation, resting on the proofs and admission of such meetings having been held, particularly on one stated to have been held on the 17th August, 1851, at which three persons, a child of 15 years, and the Madiai, were surprised in the house of the latter, reading the Bible translated by Diodati, each one having a copy under his eye, and further alleging that tracts had been distributed by the Madiai at various times, then proceeded to condemn the husband to upwards of four years' seclusion in the prison of the Volterra, and the wife to nearly four years' imprisonment in the prison at Lucca. Those punishments they are now undergoing.

In the first century of the Christian era a certain Jew, of the name of Paul, traversed the whole circuit of the Roman Empire, preaching, throughout all its cities, that the gods whom the people worshipped, and whose worship was established by law, were no gods, but wood and stone; endeavouring to persuade all who would listen to him to apostatize from that religion in which they had been brought up, holding, even at Rome, and when under the guard of soldiers, meetings at his own lodgings, at which he "expounded and testified of the kingdom of God, persuading those who came to him concerning Jesus, both out of the law of Moses and the prophets." This course he pursued for a number of years, accused by the Jews "as a pestilent fellow, and a mover of sedition among all the Jews, and a ringleader of the sect of the Christians." He confessed openly "that after the way they called heresy so worshipped he the God of his fathers, believing all things which were written in the law and the prophets." Dragged before the tribunal of the Roman governors upon those charges, even Festus, the corrupt proconsul, could find no fault in all these things, and would have discharged him ultimately, if he had not appealed unto Cæsar.

What crime have the Madiai committed that Paul was not guilty of?

We confess we are unwilling to treat this remarkable case on the narrow grounds of comparison between the tolerant principles professed by the reformed Churches and the intolerant ones sanctioned by the Church of Rome. The issue in question is a wider one. Are the Madiai Christians or not? Are they, according to the evidence afforded to us, believers in those doctrines for the truth of which Stephen, and Paul, and Peter, and James laid down their lives, and suffered all things that they might win Christ? If they are Christians, what, then, are their persecutors, and with whom ought all who profess Christianity to sympathise and unite?

Is an undoubting trust and faith in Christ as a Saviour, a firm reliance on his mediation, a test of Christianity? Listen, then, to Rosa Madiai, writing to her husband—"Courage, dearest. The Holy Spirit has enabled us to bear witness that this Christ, laden with opprobrium and trampled under foot, is our King and our Saviour, and we, through the effect of his light and his power, have taken up the defence of the cross of Christ, bearing his shame, in order that we may one day share in his holiness and glory." Is submission to the will of God in all our trials, meekness and long-suffering under oppression and wrong, evidence of a desire to imitate the example of him who, in his last agony in the garden, prayed—"Father, if it be possible, let this cup pass from me: nevertheless not as I will, but as thou wilt?" Hear the same Rosa Madiai—"We have been cast down, but not conquered, and I hope that, through the merits of Christ, the Father has accepted our witness, and will enable us to drink, even to the last drop, the portion of that bitter cup which he has prepared for us, and to drink it with thanksgiving." Words not used in the day of prosperity and when troubles are but prospective, but proceeding from one already experiencing the bitterness of the loss of all worldly happiness.

Do we reckon it a proof of the faith of Peter and the other apostles that, when beaten with scourges, they went on their way, rejoicing that they were counted worthy to suffer shame for the name of Christ? In the same spirit can Rosa Madiai write to her husband—"Be not afraid: God, who made the chains of St. Peter to fall off, and open to him the gates of the prison, will certainly not forget us. Be of good courage, and let us commit ourselves entirely into the hands of God. Bear up, so that I shall behold you joyous, as I hope you will see the effects of the same grace in me." Does Christ himself promise that "every one that hath forsaken houses, or brethren, or sister, or fathers, or mothers, or wife, or children, for his name's sake, shall inherit everlasting life?" Who shall exclude from that glorious promise her who, in writing to her husband, says—"Thou knowest if I have loved thee, but how much more now that we have together fought for the great King?" and who, notwithstanding that love, has submitted to separation and imprisonment—to the tedium of prolonged confinement—to the hardship of prison discipline.

Remember that the past lives of these persons have been in conformity with these sentiments. Against them even the unscrupulous malignity of their enemies has raised no charge of moral delinquency; even the public prosecutor in his speech declared—"That the acts of goodness, natural probity, and benevolence that were urged on behalf of Madame Madiai in arrest of judgment might cause one to grieve more over her separation from Catholicism, but could not free her from the present accusation."

We ask, then, our readers, do they believe the Madiai to be Christians or not? Try it by another test. Suppose the trial and imprisonment of the Madiai had taken place in Constantinople, and not in Florence; the Grand Seignior the sovereign, and not the Grand Duke; the Mahometan Muftis the accusers, and not the Romish priests; the charges brought forward the same as those made against the Madiai; the evidence of Christian principle and Christian practice such as we have stated. What view would Christian Europe take of the persecution? Would we stop to inquire whether the victims of the Mahometan persecution acknowledged the supremacy of the Pope or not? Would we ask in what Church baptized? And if the Madiai, on the facts before us, would be martyrs at Constantinople, what are they at Florence? If the charges on which they are found guilty are worthy of punishment, how can Rome herself justify her missions to the heathen nations? If their condemnation be just, then the condemnation of Christ by the Jews is worthy of all commendation. He denounced the consecrated priesthood of Aaron as blind leaders of the blind; he declared that by their traditions they made the Word of God of none effect. They built the tombs of the prophets, and in so doing condemned the conduct of their fathers who persecuted the prophets; yet they imitated the example of their fathers, and slew him of whom the prophets spake. And may not the same be said now of the Church of Rome? She appeals to Peter and Paul, and the other Apostles, as the founders of her spiritual authority, and yet exceeds heathen Rome in the severity of her persecution of those against whom no charge can be brought, save such as was brought against them. Let us not forget that the strength which has enabled this poor Italian courier and his wife to resist the authority of an unjust sentence, and to suffer under the rigour of persecution, is the same which, eighteen centuries ago, founded our Church, and, three centuries ago, reformed it, and in each case changed the face of the world.

Nor is this warning to ourselves without its necessity. There is not a single member of the reformed Churches, here or abroad, who, if he acts up to his profession, would not be bound to do as the Madiai have done. If the Madiai are justly condemned, we, too, are obnoxious to the same condemnation. The power may be wanting at present for its active operation. Are we sure that the will is absent?

An appeal has been made, by an eminent nobleman in England, the Earl of Carlisle, to the Roman Catholic citizens of this empire, "to address the voice of remonstrance to their spiritual superiors, to rescue them from the intolerable reproach this persecution must bring upon them." To that appeal a Roman Catholic gentleman, the late member for Youghal, Mr. Chisholm Anstey, has replied that that appeal is useless. He tells us that nearly every member of the Roman Catholic body is persuaded that it is the bounden duty of the State to coerce heretics by temporal penalties, and, if need be, to extirpate them by the sword.

Again we ask our Roman Catholic readers, is this so or not? Do they sympathize with the Madiai or with their persecutors? If with the latter, what is the nature of that religion which condemns to imprisonment and death those who, in their life and in their trials, exhibit the same Christian patience, the same earnest spirit, the same unwearied trust that, in the first ages of the Christian Church, overturned the idolatrous worship of heathen Rome, and extended the away of Christian doctrine and Christian knowledge to the furthest limits of the world?

We regret that want of space prevents us from reprinting the letters of the Earl of Carlisle and Mr. Anstey, which well deserve to be recorded.

DIALOGUE ON THE CONSTRAINED CELIBACY IN THE CHURCH OF ROME, BETWEEN TWO ITALIAN GENTLEMEN.

Salviano—True, dear friend, I have married a wife, and I have not done so without good reason. Matrimony is the fountain of the human race, the seedplot of the Church, a balm for our cares, a comfort in our afflictions, and the object of Divine blessings. God himself instituted it after the creation of the world: Increase and multiply, said God to our first parents, and replenish the earth. Nay, marriage is, to true Christians, the type of a very great mystery—namely, the intimate union of Christ and his Church.

Eustachio—And I tell you that you have done wrong to enter into this state; nor do I say so without very good reason. Marriage is, in fact, without contradiction, a carnal state; contrary to one who desires to be perfect, and very unsuitable to one who wishes to serve God. Moreover, it is filthiness in clergymen, a crime in priests, impurity in saints. He who is in the married state is in the flesh, and he that is in the flesh cannot please God.

Salviano—Oh, this is fine talk! You, Romanists, are certainly extraordinary people: at one time you say that marriage is a sacrament, at another you call it filthiness. Truly, I know not how you reconcile these opinions—that marriage is a sacrament of the Church, and that it is filthiness for the men of the Church; that it is a sacrament for the laity, and a sacrilege for the priests. You say that all the sacraments of the Church are holy. How, then, can marriage, which is a holy thing, defile those who aspire to holiness? Dear friend, you wish to be a good Catholic, and yet you put forward the arguments of heretics condemned by your own Church. You maintain, in fact, with the heretics of former times, that to be in the flesh means to be married; and we, with St. Clement, of Alexandria, reply to you that S. Paul says also to the married—"Ye are not in the flesh, but in the Spirit." The married, if they are regenerate, are not in the flesh; therefore, being in the flesh does not at all mean living in the married state. The expressions, to walk according to the flesh, to be in the flesh, to do the work of the flesh, do not mean, according to St. Paul, to have a wife and children; but they do mean to have a corrupt nature and to bring forth sin. Did you ever read that the Apostles, when they forbid the works of the flesh, forbid marriage? St. Paul gives us a very long list of the works of the flesh, amongst which you certainly will not find marriage; but you will find adultery, fornication, and uncleanness. Marriage comes from God, and cannot make those that are married displeasing in his sight. According to your opinion, the patriarchs were in the flesh, the priests could not serve God, the prophets were profane, because some of all these were married. Therefore, Enoch, though he had the privilege of being exempted from death, did not please God; nor did Noah, who was a preacher of righteousness; nor Abraham, the father of the faithful; nor Moses, the giver of the law; nor Samuel, a Nazarite of God; nor Ezekiel, a prophet of the Most High. In short, according to your opinion, all married persons go to hell, since you maintain that those who are married live in the flesh, and he who lives in the flesh is condemned. Listen to the words of St. Paul—"If ye live after the flesh ye shall die," and you know well that here the Apostle speaks of eternal death. In the Old Testament marriage was consistent with the sacred office; so that the priests who performed the holy rites took wives; even the high priest, though he alone was permitted to enter the holy of holies, might marry a wife, provided she was not a widow, nor a divorced woman, nor profane, nor an harlot; but he was to take a virgin of his own people to wife.—Levit. xxi, 12. If marriage was permitted to the priests of the synagogue, I know not why it should be forbidden to the ministers of the Church.

Eustachio—Do you, then, think that whatever was permitted to the priests of the Old Testament is suitable to those of the New?

Salviano—Why not? If matrimony were a carnal state, how would God have permitted it to those ministers to whom was prescribed a special purity of body; to those who were defiled by only touching a dead body; to those ministers who were obliged to purify themselves so frequently with water, that they might not be unclean? Let us speak seriously. You say that that is not lawful now to ministers which was formerly lawful to the priests. If so, you are bound undoubtedly, to prove that Jesus Christ has repealed that ancient law, and enacted a new one in its stead. Come, then. How do you prove that marriage is forbidden to the pastors of the Church of God? On the contrary, according to the teaching of St. Paul—"A bishop must be blameless, the husband of one wife, vigilant, sober, of good behaviour," &c. "One that ruleth well his own house, having his children in subjection with all gravity. For if a man know not how to rule his own house, how shall he take care of the Church of God? Likewise must the deacons be grave, not double-tongued. Not given to much wine. Not greedy of filthy lucre. Even so must their wives be grave, not slanderers; sober, faithful in all things. Let the deacons be the husbands of one wife, ruling their children and their own houses well."—1 Timothy, iii., 2. 4, 5, 8, 11, 12. The rules given by you to the clergy are opposed to these ordinances, given by St. Paul to Timothy and Titus.

Eustachio—That he should be husband of one wife means that he should be clergyman of one parish—bishop of only one bishopric.

Salviano—Truly this is a bold assertion! In this manner you wish to allegorize and get rid of the force of so convincing an argument; but consider that your allegory is opposed to the text, in which, if you look into it closely, you will see that St. Paul distinguishes between the wife of the bishop and the Church. He speaks of the children of the bishop, distinguishing them from spiritual children. He speaks of the household of the bishop, distinguishing it clearly from the household of God. Do not you see that the Apostle argues from the less to the greater, and that this is his meaning? If the bishop does not know how to rule his own house, how shall he be fit to rule the Church of God? If he has not the qualities fitting him to govern his own wife, his own children, his own household, how shall he be capable of ruling well the Church of Christ and its ministers? It is true that St. Paul does not oblige every priest to marry; but he orders him to do so if he cannot contain, and to have but one wife, and not more at the same time, as the Jews used to do. It is in this way that we understand him; and if you Romanists were candid, you, too, would be obliged to take the same meaning from his words.

Eustachio—When the Apostle says that he should be the husband of one wife he means it of the past, and not of the present. Besides which, the law of St. Paul was only for the rising Church, in which it would have been difficult to find bishops, if married men had not been admitted to the bishopric.

Salviano—Are you joking, or are you in earnest? How can St. Paul mean it of the past, if he says it of the present? He must be the husband of one wife. If to be the husband of one wife mean to have been the husband of one wife, then to be blameless will also mean to have been blameless—to be sober will mean to have been sober. Do you think it, then, enough for a shepherd of souls to have been blameless—to have been sober—to have been vigilant, although he be none of these at present? Tell me, do you understand of the past also what St. Paul says of the wives of the deacons, that they must be grave, not false accusers, sober, faithful in all things? If you understand this, also, of the past, you must affirm that he was giving instructions for the wives whom the deacons had had, but who were then either divorced or dead. Our sun, my friend, shines brightly, and in vain do you try to cloud it over. And why say that the law of St. Paul was only given for a time? How do you prove that God gave another law afterwards? Every profane person might in this manner cast aside all the precepts of God. No, no—St. Paul does not mean it of the past. I might confound you by bringing up a host of expositors, from among those whom the Church of Rome venerates as saints: for instance, St. John Chrysostom, St Jerome, and others, who have never dreamed that the Apostle, in speaking of the wives of the bishops, meant to speak of the past; but what would be the use of this, when the text of St. Paul is so plain it itself?

Eustachio—Have you anything else to bring forward from your St. Paul?

Salviano—Yes. St. Paul is mine; and if he were among you on the earth he would run the risk of being excommunicated by you for having proclaimed the ordinances of God, and maintained them against those of your Church. Yes, this St. Paul is ours, and it is he who says—"To avoid fornication let every man have his own wife, and let every woman have her own husband"—1 Cor. vii. 2. When St. Paul says every man, every woman, surely he does not except the bishops, the priests, the monks, or the nuns. No, marriage is honourable in all—in bishops, friars, and nuns, as well as in the laity.

Eustachio—Now I have caught you. Here St. Paul is not yours, indeed. These words, in all, are not by any means to be understood of all persons; in fact, if they were to be understood so, marriage would be lawful between father and daughter, or between brother and sister. No, sir, the sacred text means marriage is honourable in all things, and not in all persons; and here St. Paul is not on your side, or, at least, he is not certainly against us.

Salviano—The words, in all, are perfectly clear in the Greek text (εν πασι), and you deceive yourself when you say that the word all does not indicate persons but things: as if St. Paul had said marriage is honourable in all things; but it is clear as the daylight that the word "all" is put in opposition to fornicators and adulterers; and on account of this contrast it cannot point out any other than persons who marry, that they may not live in such sin. The true sense, then, of this great declaration is, that marriage is honourable in all who, according to nature and the Divine law, may be joined together: whether they be ecclesiastics or secular persons it matters not. The marriage of a father with his daughter, of a brother with his sister, is incestuous, and nature and the law condemn such unions, whence they are not understood by St. Paul in the word all. Nature, therefore, and the Divine law, on the one hand, oblige your clergy who cannot contain to marry. You, on the other hand, forbid them to do so. And do not you perceive that this is the character of those teachers who "In the last times shall depart from the faith, giving heed to seducing spirits and doctrines of devils, speaking lies in hypocrisy, having their conscience seared with a hot iron, forbidding to marry?" &c.—1 Tim. iv. 1, 2, 3. I know well that there are some among you who apply these prophecies to our reformers; but with what appearance of truth? With what conscience do you do this? Which of them forbid marriage? But your doctrines are so far from being taught by Christian reformers, that they are always condemned by them.

Eustachio—I think that in this case both sides are in error; our people wrong yours if they make this application of the text. Your people, on the other hand, wrong ours by saying that St. Paul spoke in this prophecy of those who forbid the clergy to marry. In fact, we do not forbid marriage; we only say that those who do not wish or cannot remain without wives should not be made priests. St. Paul, in this passage, foretells the heresy of the Tacians, the Marcionites, and the Manicheans, who condemned marriage as a thing evil in itself and proceeding from the devil.

Salviano—So you do not forbid marriage? then why do you speak of it as a carnal state? Why do you call it uncleanness? Why, in defence of this your new law, do you fight with the weapons of the heretics of other times? You do not wish to be either Tacians or Manicheans, yet you bring against us the stale arguments adopted by them against your Church. We shall see from it in what manner your people forbid marriage. I shall now only observe, that you argue badly in saying St. Paul speaks of these heretics, therefore he does not speak of us, as if this special application must hinder a more general one. The Apostle points out not only the above-mentioned heretics who condemned marriage as a thing evil in itself, but also those who considered it contrary to the state of perfection, as you yourselves do. I will tell you two things, to which if you will attend, I think you will change your opinion. The first is, that the apostle, having said, in the foregoing chapter, that the bishop should be the husband of one wife, comes now to speak of the teachers who broach a doctrine contrary to his, and plainly points out those who forbid bishops and other ecclesiastics to marry, tolerating in them base and evil habits rather than grant to them liberty to live in the holy state of matrimony. The second is, that St. Paul speaks of the teachers of the last times—"Now the Spirit speaketh expressly that in the latter times some shall depart from the faith." These last times are not the whole period of the New Testament dispensation. The Apostle distinguishes them clearly and expressly from those in which he lived—in a word, these latter times, according to Anselm, Liranus, and Bellarmine are the times of Antichrist. Now, according to you, Antichrist was not in the time of the Tacians, the Marcionites, and the Manicheans: how, then, can the Apostle speak precisely of these? It is evident, therefore, that these false teachers, foreseen by St. Paul, were to arise afterwards—that is, in after times of the last days.

Eustachio—But you maintain that he who has not the gift of continency is indispensably obliged to marry. Is there, then, no other remedy? May not he who does not possess this gift obtain it from God by tears and prayers? Does not our Father grant us whatever we ask him in the name of his only begotten Son? I think that he that is obliged, by a solemn vow, not to marry, may, by fastings and penances, quench his evil desires.

Salviano—All have not the gift of continency. "I would that all men were even as myself," says St. Paul, "but every man hath his proper gift of God, one after this manner, and another after that."—1 Cor. vii. 7. The Apostle does not command that he who has not the gift of continency should ask it of God, or procure it to himself by fastings or by penances; it does not even come into his mind to give to the incontinent the counsels given by the Roman councillors or lawgivers; on the contrary, he says—"If they cannot contain, let them marry, for it is better to marry than to burn." Our heavenly Father does give us whatsoever we ask him in the name of his blessed Son; but this must be understood of the things necessary to salvation. Now, if it is necessary to salvation not to marry, it follows that all married people are to be damned. We deceive ourselves if we presume to obtain by discipline that which St. Jerome did not obtain; we may read, however, how he grieves about this in an epistle to Eusochius. He therefore who, macerating himself with discipline, still feels the lust of the flesh, is called to the holy state of matrimony; and if he does not obey this call, he rebels against God and against nature. Continency is rare. Read what Gregory the Great says of it—"De Cura Pastorium," third part, 30th chapter. In short, no one can bind himself by vow to a thing which is in the power of another. He who makes a vow to be always continent, with chastity of body and mind, resembles one who should make a vow always to be in his right senses.

Eustachio—I wish to know from you if the Apostles had wives.

Salviano—Certainly, some of them had, and they had them when they were called to the apostleship, and even while they were exercising the apostolic functions. St. Peter had a mother-in-law, and consequently a wife—Matt. viii. 14. St. Ambrose says that all the apostles, except St. John, were married, and, according to St. Clement of Alexandria, St Peter had children. Philip the Evangelist had four daughters that prophesied. It is said that St. Luke lived eighty-four years in the married state; and St. Peter, according to your legend, had a daughter called Petronilla. Were the apostles then in the flesh? were they also displeasing to God?

Eustachio—Some apostles, it is true, had wives when they were called to the apostleship; but then they left their houses, and possessions, and wives to follow Christ. This is a truth which you cannot deny, whilst it is so evident in the Scriptures. James and John left their father to follow Jesus when he called them. "We," said St. Peter, "have forsaken all and followed thee."—Mat. xix. 27. It is true that he had a daughter, Petronilla; but that happened before he was called to the apostleship.

Salviano—Oh, how you deceive yourself, my friend; you think that the apostles left their wives for ever! If we are to believe the fabulous accounts, either tacitly or expressly approved by your Church, the person married at the marriage of Cana was St. John the Evangelist. Do you think that this man having seen the miracle that Jesus wrought under those circumstances, left his wife entirely, and for ever, to follow the Redeemer? Did Jesus Christ come to separate on earth those whom his Father had joined together in heaven? Did he come to upset the ordinances of God and of nature, to break the closest of all unions, to induce the husband to violate his matrimonial pledge? Oh, no. On the contrary, the divine Redeemer, by his most holy doctrine, abrogated the ancient law, or, rather, the corrupt custom of the Jews, declaring to their face that it was not lawful for them to put away their wives except for adultery. Now, according to your opinion, the practice of Jesus differed from his theory, if he obliged his disciples to forsake their wives; but if he had done so, what would not his inveterate enemies, whow ere the close observers of all his doings, have said of him who denies that, when necessity demands it, we ought to give up everything, even life itself? Justice demands that we should leave the earth for him who, for our sakes, came down from heaven. Parents, wives, possessions are to be forsaken when they stand in the way of our salvation—when these transitory things may prove an obstacle to the pursuit of eternal things; but you consider those to be angels on earth who, having left their wives without necessity, devote themselves to the monastic life. I say, without necessity, because a believer may be saved without being a monk. You say that a young girl gains much merit who, having forsaken her parents, takes refuge in a nunnery. The monastic life is a human invention, nor can you deny it. The Church of Jesus Christ did without these things for more than three centuries, nor is there a trace of such a kind of life to be found in the Holy Scriptures. Marriage, however, is a Divine ordinance. God will not have man to put asunder those whom he hath joined together. God and nature dictate that children should take care of their parents when they are old; nevertheless, in your opinion, they may break the laws of God and nature, to follow the inventions of men. The husband may forsake his wife, or the daughter her mother, to lead a monastic life. The poor, afflicted mother may crave assistance from her daughter; she may show her white hair, her withered and trembling hands, the bosom on which she was nursed, and, in spite of all that, her daughter may behave like one that is blind and deaf, and betake herself to a cloister. Now, don't you see that the very thought of this, in every heart that is under the fear of God, excites horror, and that it is repugnant to nature, and contrary to His law? Ah, undeceive yourself! The daughter may—nay, she ought, to forsake her mother, if she should ask her to do what is ungodly, if she should command her to do things contrary to the commands of God. Yes, then, but only then, is the daughter obliged to leave her mother, and to refuse her obedience. True it is, and all agree about it, that if the mother disobeys God, the daughter ought not to obey her will. But if, on the other hand, the mother permits her daughter to serve Christ in her own house; if she brings her up virtuously; if she exhorts her to the fear of God; if she guides her to salvation, then the mother is as Christian as the abbess, and her house is far more holy than the nunnery. Oh, how many young persons, who are lost in these places, would be saved in their own houses. And although daughters may be saved in the house of a virtuous and pious mother, without going into a cloister, nevertheless, according to your fine rules, they do better to become nuns, in spite of their mothers. Don't you perceive that you transgress the holy law of God by your traditions? You warmly maintain that Peter's daughter, Petronilla, was born before he was called to the apostleship. Pray, how do you know this? Petronilla is a name derived from Peter; and everyone knows that the Apostle received this name at the very time when he was chosen to the apostleship; therefore, he had this daughter after he became an Apostle; and as he received the name of Peter, so he called his daughter Petronilla. In fact, it is not true that the Apostles forsook their wives entirely, and this is clear in St. Paul—"Have not we power," saith he, "to lead about a sister, a wife, as well as other apostles, and as the brethren of the Lord and Cephas?'

Eustachio—You must not suppose that these women were the wives of the Apostles; quite the contrary: they were rich women, who accompanied the Apostles in their journeys, and supplied all their wants.

Salviano—And who can have persuaded you that the holy Apostles, having forsaken their lawful wives, led about with them other women? That would not only have been an inconvenience to them, but a scandal; and the Jews, as well as the Gentiles, would surely have viewed it in a very bad light. Besides which, the Apostles would have little business with such company, in the long journeys that they were obliged to make. Pray, do not deceive yourself. These women could not have been rich, since St. Paul said that he did not bring a woman with him, that he might not burden the Corinthians. Give yourself the trouble to read the entire chapter, and you will be persuaded of this. What burden could it have been to the Corinthians, if Paul had brought with him a rich lady? It would have been beneficial to them rather than hurtful, if this woman had provided the Apostle with all that he required. You are in error, and your error arises from the transposition of the words. In the Greek text, it is not a woman, a sister, but a sister, a woman (or wife), from which we may see plainly, that the word sister points out the sex of the person, and her religious communion. The word woman would then be superfluous, if it did not denote something further. And what can it denote, if not the bond of marriage? The Apostle, by saying sister, speaks of one who was a woman and a Christian; and by using the word woman, he means one who was united in marriage to one of the Apostles. Tertullian, Clement of Alexandria, and Pope Leo IX. are of this opinion; we may add that which Ecchius relates about St. Peter—"This great hero, seeing his wife led to martyrdom, was much rejoiced, and, calling her by name, said, 'Oh, remember the Lord!'"

THE MORTMAIN QUESTION.

We mentioned in our last number our intention of calling the attention of our readers to the extraordinary influence which many of the Romish doctrines exercise in pouring wealth into the coffers of the Roman Catholic church, and the unscrupulous use which is made of that influence by her clergy. We shall select for our first instance the well-known case of Metaris v. Wiseman, as one powerfully illustrating, not merely the opportunities which the Romish system opens for undue influence, but as also exhibiting, in a remarkable point of view, the extent to which zeal in the promotion of their objects blinds the eyes of her votaries to the plainest principles of professional honour, and to the most obvious dictates of honesty. The facts of that case, as elicited by the Mortmain Committee of the House of Commons, and published by the order of that House, were as follows.—

"Matharin Carrè, a French teacher, had by his profession, and the exercise of all those penurious arts by which avarice accumulates wealth, put together money to the amount of £10,000. This wealth was vested in the public funds, in two specific sums of £7,000 and £3,000. At the close of February, 1847, this old miser, supposed to be about 77 years of age, was taken suddenly ill. A French Roman Catholic doctor, of the name of Gasquet, was sent for; and finding him very ill, told him it was impossible for him to live, and that he had better send for a priest. The old man answered, "Very well," but took no more notice of it. No priest was sent for by him. A few days afterwards (it would appear on Sunday, the 28th February) Gasquet again saw him, and observed—"He ought to have port wine and arrowroot; but, poor man, it is impossible he can have them." The landlord, in whose house Carrè dwelt, hearing this, said immediately that Carrè was very rich, and was able to have anything he liked. On the same day, after morning mass, Gasquet goes to Mr. Holdstock, the priest in direction of the schools of St. Aloysius, at Somerstown, and tells him that there was a man of large fortune dying in a garret, in a neighbouring street, that he would not recover, and that he had better go and see him. Mr. Holdstock lost no time; went to see him the afternoon of that same day, Sunday, and on that occasion took instructions for his will from this old man, whom he had never seen before, and who had not even sent for him. The paper on which those instructions were taken was lost or mislaid; but their alleged purport was in conformity with the will subsequently prepared. That same evening Mr. Holdstock sent for Mr. John Athanasius Cooke, a member of the Chancery bar in England. Mr. Cooke had been a convert, and at the time was an attendant at Mr. Holdstock's chapel; and though he had never seen Carrè, nor had ever received instructions from him, he at once took upon himself to prepare a will, by which the sum of £7,000 was bequeathed to the Somerstown schools, and the sum of £3,000 was distributed among Carrè's relations in France, in the very same proportions in which the statute of distributions would have given it to them, without the intervention of a will at all. And of that will Dr. Griffiths, the Roman Catholic bishop of London district, and Mr. J. A. Cooke, were appointed trustees, and Mr. J. A. Cooke executor.

With this will in his pocket, and accompanied by Mr. Holdstock, Mr. Cooke went to old Carrè on the following day (Monday); and during their visit a call at Carrè's lodgings was made by two women—one of them Mr. Holdstock's housekeeper, the other a neighbouring schoolmistress. These women (evidently intended to act as witnesses, though entirely unacquainted with Carrè) were however, dismissed on this occasion, as Carrè refused to sign the will. It then occurred to Mr. Cooke as the will was not proceeded with, that there might be an improvement in the management of the matter; and accordingly he suggested the execution of a deed, with a power of attorney, to transfer the £7,000 into the names of Carrè, Mr. Cooke, and Dr. Griffiths, the Roman Catholic bishop, and at the same time a will to be made, disposing of the remaining £3,000 amongst the next of kin.

The manifest object of this scheme was not merely to save legacy duty, but to conceal from the relatives altogether the amount of the property, and lead them to suppose that the will was conversant will all that he possessed.

These documents were also prepared by Mr. Cooke; and on the Thursday following Mr. Cooke, accompanied, as before, by Mr. Holdstock, and attended by the schoolmistress and a Mr. Hay, a clerk in the banking-house of the Messrs. Wright, the Roman Catholic bankers, proceeded to old Carrè's lodgings. The description of what passed there is certainly striking. On arriving they were told that Mr. Carrè was too ill to see them—"Very ill, and did not wish to see them." The priest said he was not to be treated in that manner, and rushed up to the bed-room of the dying man, and shortly afterwards called up the rest. All the witnesses agree in stating that the only words used by Carrè were, "You may leave these papers." Mr. Cooke, on hearing this, took his hat, and was about to leave the room. Not so the priest, who desired him to sit still; and then, approaching the old man, spoke something to him in French. Whatever he said, the result was, that the priest, leaning over the "flap of a box" (in which the old miser had for years slept), held him up by the back, put a pen into his hand, and the documents were then executed: by the one conveying away £7,000 of his property to men he had never seen or known before, and by the other making two men, neither of whom he knew, the distributors of the remaining £3,000, among his next of kin. Nor was this all: the deed reserved to old Carrè the usual power of appointment over the fund, by deed, in a certain manner; and of course, under such circumstances, the custody of the deed ought to have remained with the party having such power, for otherwise the exercise of the power would, to a great extent, if not entirely, be at the discretion of the person in whose custody the deed was, and this seems to have been the idea of Carrè; for having signed the documents, he said to Cooke—"Now you may leave them." Not so, thought Mr. Cooke, and he insisted that the possession of the deed should remain with himself. The reasons and excuses assigned by Mr. Cooke for thus proceeding are certainly most contradictory; and though too long for insertion, we venture to say that the perusal of his evidence on this subject affords one of the most striking instances that has ever come before the public of the extent to which zeal in the service of the Church can pervert the human intellect, and blind its votary to the plainest principle of professional honour and integrity.

The possession of the deed thus secured, the next step to be taken was to effect an immediate transfer into the names of the trustees appointed by the deed. The execution of the deed and will was on Thursday; and on the following morning, Friday, the power of attorney was lodged at the bank. On Saturday, although, as Mr. Cooke says, he "did not know Carrè was worse," still, having been at early mass on that morning, "he had a strong feeling on his mind that he ought to transfer the stock that day." Accordingly, he is at the broker's office before the office is open; he pays "an expedition fee" at the bank. The transfer is completed certainly before half-past one o'clock. Returning home in a cab, he calls at poor Carrè's house; the landlord runs down stairs, and says—"He is gone, sir." "Gone—do you mean dead?" returns Cooke. "Yes." He then anxiously ascertains that he had died at ten minutes past four. Had his death been sooner, or the transfer been later, the arrangements would have been all defeated. Now, however, Mr. Cooke thought all was right. His duty to the Church was fully discharged, and accordingly he forthwith proceeds to lodge the deed with Dr. Griffiths, his co-trustee, and the Roman Catholic bishop of the London district, who receives it without surprise, and as if already acquainted with its contents.

Such are the leading facts of this extraordinary case, as detailed in the affidavits and examinations in the Court of Chancery, and subsequently given in evidence before the Committee of the House of Commons; and up to the point to which we have now brought our readers it might be said that this was nothing more than the ordinary case of undue influence exercised over a dying man by an officious priest and a meddling lawyer, and their individual misconduct would afford no legitimate ground of charge against clerical influence. We shall now state the subsequent history of this case, in order to enable our readers to judge whether our charge against the system is well founded. The whole of the above facts were indisputably established, both in the Chancery suit and before the Committee; and consequently brought prominently before the notice of Cardinal

Wiseman, and the other leading authorities of the Romish Church. And though neither he nor Dr. Griffiths had originally any concern in the concoction of the instruments, yet undoubtedly it was in their power, when made aware of the mode in which this affair had been conducted, to have renounced, on the part of the church to which they belonged, any benefit from a gift obtained in such a manner. And surely if parties, when made conversant of a fraud, consent to profit by it, they are morally responsible, and must be held to have sanctioned the conduct of those who have been active in its perpetration. The suit in Chancery instituted against Dr. Wiseman, after being opposed in every stage with all the vigour that the ability of able advocates could bring to bear on it, was finally terminated by a compromise, which, in effect, admitted the truth of the allegations, and which, though it left the Roman Catholic Church in possession of a portion of their prey, yet, by the compulsory restitution of the larger part, showed to the world their own conviction of the nature and character of the whole transaction. Nor was this willingness to bargain even for a portion of the money so tainted the only circumstance to connect the Roman Catholic clergy, as a body, with this transaction. It further appears that the plaintiff, Metairie, who had ventured to appeal to the courts of justice in such a case, was forced, in consequence of his doing so, to leave France altogether, and come and reside in England. In his evidence, he states—"That after the hearing of the suit, as all the inhabitants of my country were Roman Catholics, I was ill looked upon, and I found I should have no work. I was so badly treated in my country (Bretagne) that two boys of mine, who were at school, were expelled; the priest spoke to the teacher, and the teacher sent them away. I wished to know why they were sent away? I asked the master; he began to cry, and said it was not in his power."

"Had you any other reason for leaving the country besides the circumstance of your children being obliged to leave the school?"

"I was afraid of the priests; the priests are so powerful in that country. They called me a bad man, and, as I went along the streets, the people pointed at me and my wife, and looked at me, and turned away from me."

"They treated you as a very bad man."

"Yes; not only the priests, but the nobility and rich persons of the country are all on the side of the priests."

With the foregoing facts before us, we confidently ask any impartial reader, have we or have we not a sufficient ground on which to rest our charge, that the Roman Catholic system has a tendency to sanction practices, the aim, end, and object of which are to increase the wealth of their various institutions, at the expense of the fair and legitimate claims of others, and to extract from the weakness or fears of dying sinners the property they themselves can no longer enjoy?

Has Mr. Holdstock, the concoctor of the transaction, by which the coffers of the Church were to be so largely augmented, ever received reproof from his spiritual superiors; or have they, when the facts were brought prominently before them, repudiated or disowned in any way his proceedings? And if so, have we not a right to assume that his conduct was sanctioned and approved by those whom we may with justice regard as the best exponents of Roman Catholic teaching and doctine?

TALK OF THE ROAD—NO. IX.

"Well, Pat, I thought long to see you, to get the news of Kilcommon; how is it at all?"

"Well, it's bad enough, Jem, and it's good enough, too."

"And how's that, Pat?" said Jem; "tell us all about it."

"Well, it's bad enough with Father John, stirring up all the blackguards; you never saw the like; any decent man would be ashamed of it; but Father John is ashamed of nothing. The readers was covered with mud, and half kilt with stones a dozen times; but some of the boys got put up for that, so matters is easier that way now, at least in the town; but if the readers go out into the country parts, there's enough to set on them as if they were mad dogs; but that is not the worst; it's the bad words of a deal of these people that makes me think worse of the teaching the people has been getting than anything. Oh, the shockinist words that you hear them crying out after the readers, and Mr. Owens, and the new clergyman that's come on the mission, through the streets. Now you would be ashamed to think that the worst of the bad women on the street could say such words; and all decent people, women and children, has to listen to them."

"And doesn't Father John stop that, anyway?" said Jem.

"Never a word he said against it yet," said Pat, "nor won't, I know. But I'm not come to the worst yet: it is the songs—oh! them songs—it would make a bad woman ashamed to hear some of them sung in the streets; and there isn't man, woman, or child in Kilcommon that doesn't know that it's Father John gets them songs out. And then to hear them songs about Mrs. Owens; it's the biggest shame that ever came upon Kilcommon; and when I met Mr. Owens the other day I was ashamed to look at him. 'And what's the matter with you to-day, Pat?' says he: and when he worked it out of me, I had to say, 'Deed, I'm ashamed to look at your reverence about Mrs. Owens,' says I. 'Oh, is that it?' says he. 'Well,' says he, 'don't mind about Mrs. Owens, says he, or me, says he; for it doesn't hurt us, says he; and we expected that, says he: because in every place where a clergyman goes to show the Douay Bible to Roman Catholics, says he, the priests always get the blackguards to insult his wife and daughters that way, says he; because they think we can't stand that, says he; but they're wrong, says he; for we know that there's a blessing to them that suffer shame for the name of Christ; and he will help us to bear that, and more, for the sake of souls. We know it's the priests' way of managing religious controversy, says he, and the only way they have any chance at, says he; and so we made up our minds to all that before we begun, says he; so don't mind about us. But it makes me ashamed for my country, says he, and it makes me blush for the name of Irishman, to think they can be taught to insult a modest woman with filthy songs.' So I thought when he had done, that it was better for him that bore it than for them that taught it."*

"Well, now tell us how it's good enough" said Jem.

"Well, I will," said Pat; "sure Mr. Owens and the missioner—that's the Rev. Mr. Burke that's come—has opened what they call a controversial class: it's a meeting where everybody may come and talk, and argue, and question as much as they like, and Mr. Owens and Mr. Burke to answer them all.

"Well, and does any Catholics go?" says Jem.

"A deal of them," says Pat.

"And how do they behave there?" said Jem.

"Oh, quite decent and proper," said Pat; "for no one goes there that Father John can stop; and though there's some that's mighty earnest for their own way, and thinks they can puzzle any clergyman at all, yet they're not under Father John's thumb, or they wouldn't be there; so they argue quite fair and clever; and Mr. Burke and Mr. Owens answers them so fair and so kind, that they're well pleased, even when they're beat; and it's the pleasantest and the hamperedest plan at all."

"And what do they talk about?" says Jem.

"Why, the last night," said Pat, "they were talking about mortal and venial sin. And first Mr. Owens says, says he, 'Is there anything in the Douay Bible, says he, to show that there is any such difference as mortal and venial in the nature of sinful actions?' 'Sure there is,' says Phil Dooley, who is a mighty good scholar, and has bought a Douay Bible to bring with him. 'And where is it?" says Mr. Owens. So Phil Dooley opened his Bible and read—'He that knoweth his brother to sin a sin which is not to death, let him ask, and life shall be given to him who sinneth not to death. There is a sin unto death.'—I John v. 16. So Phil looked quite satisfied, and was going to shut the book."

"Stop a minute," said Mr. Burke; "just read the note on that in the Douay Bible."

So Phil read—"It is hard to determine what St. John here calls a sin which is not to death, and a sin which is unto death. The difference CANNOT be the same as betwixt sins that are called venial and mortal."

"That will do," said Mr. Burke. "I thought the Church of Rome had the true interpretation of Scripture, but it seems they find it hard to interpret this; but they are agreed with us that this verse does not mean the difference between mortal and venial sin, and that is enough for what we are at to-night. But can any one show anything else about it in the Douay Bible?" says he.

And no one had anything to say.

"No wonder," said Mr. Owens, "for there is nothing in the Douay Bible about it; but can any one tell me how they learned anything about it, when it's not in the Bible?"

"Sure I learned it in the catechism," said Peter Foley.

"And what catechism did you learn?" said Mr. Owens.

"Plunket's Catechism," said Peter Foley.

"How many chief kinds are there of mortal sin?" said Mr. Owens.

"Seven, called capital sins," said Peter Foley.

"Which are the seven called capital sins?" said Mr. Owens.

"Pride, covetousness, lust, anger, gluttony, sloth," said Peter Foley.†

"Turn to Apocalypse, ch. xxi., last half of the 8th verse," said Mr. Owens.

So Foley read—"All liars, they shall have their portion in the pool burning with fire and brimstone."

"Is lying a mortal sin?" said Mr. Owens.

"Well, it must be," said Foley, "if liars will go to hell."

"Which of the seven mortal sins is it?" said Mr. Owens.

"Well, it's not among them in the catechism," said Foley.

"Is idolatry a mortal sin?" said Mr. Owens.

"Surely it is," said Foley.

"Which of the seven is it?" said Mr. Owens.

"Well, it's not among them either," said Foley.

"Well," said Mr. Owens, "it seems dangerous to trust in that catechism, for fear we might come under the judgment of God, for mortal sins that are not among the seven. Now," says Mr. Owens, "can you tell me, out of the catechism, what is venial sin?"

"A less offence to God, which does not deprive us of sanctifying grace nor deserve hell,"* said Foley.

"And can you tell me, out of the catechism, what sort of things are venial sins?" said Mr. Owens.

"No," says Foley, "that's not in it," says he.

"Well I think it might," said Mr. Owens, "if it's of such consequence to know the differ."

"I can tell it, your reverence, for it's in mine," said Peter Dooley.

"Oh, you learned Dr. Doyle's Catechism, or the Christian Doctrine," said Mr. Owens.

"I did, your reverence," says Peter, "and here it is—A venial sin, for example, a vain word, an officious, jesting lie; the theft of a pin or an apple."

"Does the Douay Bible tell us that vain words are venial sins?" says Mr. Owens.

"It does not, your reverence," says I, "for the Douay Bible tells us, in Matthew xii. 36, that Christ himself said—'I say unto you, that every idle word that man shall speak, they shall render an account for it in the day of judgment.'"

"Very good," says Mr. Owens. "Now take the next. Does the Douay Bible say that any lies are venial sins?"

"Well, we had that already," said Peter Dooley—"'ALL LIARS shall have their portion in the pool burning with fire and brimstone;' that, surely, is hell: so there is no use in saying that any liars are only guilty of venial sin."

"Now, take the third," says Mr. Owens. "Does the Douay Bible say that stealing apples is a venial sin?"

"Well," says Daly, the schoolmaster, "if it wasn't Eve taking an apple, or the likes, that brought sin and death into the world?"

"Quite right," says Mr. Owens, "and now," says he, "look to your catechisms, and look to your own souls, if you trust to catechisms, that tell you these three things are venial sins, that cannot break charity between God and man, when the Douay Bible tells you that these three things bring men under death, judgment, and hell."

And with that Mr. Burke says—"One word, boys, before we stop. What is sin?" Well, now, doesn't it seem a mighty easy question? and yet, no one had an answer! So Mr. Burke opened the Douay Bible, at 1 John, chap. iii., verse 4, and read—"Whosoever committeth sin committeth also iniquity; and sin is iniquity." "Now," says he, "can a man commit sin at all without committing iniquity?" So he put it all round to the boys, and all allowed that was plain, for "Whosoever committeth sin committeth also iniquity." "Well," says Mr. Burke, "if a man commits a venial sin, does he commit sin or not? So all the boys allowed that he does. "And does he commit iniquity?" says Mr. Burke. So they allowed that, too. "And will any man tell me that iniquity does not break charity between God and man?" says Mr. Burke. So some one answered him that, for Habaccuc the prophet says to God—"Thy eyes are too pure to behold evil, and thou canst not look on iniquity."—Chap. i. 13. "So," says Mr. Burke, "if venial sin is not iniquity, it is not sin at all; and if it is sin, it is iniquity, and God is too pure to look on it, and it puts us out of the favour of God; and so your catechism is wrong. All sin is iniquity, and is hateful to God, and there is no remedy for any sin but the one: 'The blood of Jesus Christ cleanseth from all sin.'"

"So the boys went away for that night," said Pat.

"And it's I that will be there some night, I hope," says Jem.

So if we hear of Pat and Jem being there again, we will tell all we hear.

* We know the names of the parties, and the facts; and we, too, blush to say, that every fact that Pat here states about this system of insult to females is strictly true, and has actually happened.—ED. C. L.

BAPTISM OF A BELL.

TRANSLATED FROM THE FRENCH.

THE following account of the baptism of a bell appeared, in the course of last summer, in a number of the Chretien Belge, and I take the liberty of sending the enclosed translation for insertion in the CATHOLIC LAYMAN, as I think it is a subject which has been seldom noticed:—

"3rd July, 1852.

"DEAR BROTHER—A few days ago our whole parish was in a state of excitement. We had just heard that a new bell, of which we had long felt the need, had arrived in our village, and that on the next day it was to be baptized; and as few of the people had ever seen a ceremony of the kind, every one seemed resolved to attend; and as I wished to judge by personal observation of the true character of such a proceeding, I determed also to be present; so when I saw the four priests arriving I followed with the crowd.

"The bell was suspended at about the height of a man from the ground, and was modestly robed in white muslin, ornamented with bows of ribbon; it was immediately surrounded by the four officiating priests, and behind these the spectators ranged themselves.

"The dean began at once to chaunt, in a nasal and lazy tone of voice, the 51st psalm—'Miserere me,' the other priests responding to him; they appeared to perambulate the bell, and prayed the 'Lord to have mercy on it'—that he would 'wash it thoroughly from its iniquity'—that he would pardon it 'though shapen in iniquity'—that he would 'create in it a clean heart'—that he would 'restore to it the joy of his salvation.' Such are the expressions of the psalm. Happily none of the persons present (myself excepted) understood one word of all this—(such at least was the conclusion forced upon me by the listless expression of their countenances); and now I seemed in some degree to understand why Rome insists upon speaking Latin to the faithful. She thus induces them to accept, as acts of piety, things which, if spoken in good plain French, would appear no better than words of profane folly.

"As soon as the recitation of the Miserere was over a priest washed the bell, and wiped it very carefully both within and without, whilst the other priests continued to chaunt in Latin, in the same monotonous manner. Then the dean made the sign of the cross, in several places, all round the bell, and pronounced a Latin formula, of which this is a translation—'Be thou consecrated in the name of the Father, and the Son, and the Holy Ghost, and to the honour of the Blessed Mary, always a virgin." After this came the confirmation; and here a little incident occurred which amused the audience. The bit of cotton wool required to wipe up the sacred oil being wanting, one of the spectators hastily took off his hat and tore off as much of the beaver as was required for the completion of the ceremony. The blessed bell had still to inhale the perfume of the incense, which a child, belonging to the choir, waived up and down before it. It must also resound to the nine strokes given to it, at three separate intervals, by its godfather and godmother! and then, finally, it must listen to the litanies of the Virgin, after which the dean declared the ceremony was completed, and pronounced, with an air of satisfaction, and in the vulgar tongue, these words—'May you all hear this bell for many years."

"The spectators, who had scarcely succeeded in remaining serious, whilst the service was going on, now gave full way to their mirth, and retired laughing and ridiculing the whole affair! And this is what Rome calls a religious ceremony.

"For myself, I left the place full of indignation. The priest of our parish is a young man, and but lately entered on his sacerdotal office; and I had observed, that during the service his features expressed deep seriousness and some degree of emotion, whilst the countenances of the others remained unmoved and listless. After having reflected upon this, I decided upon making an appeal to his conscience, and with this view I addressed to him the following letter:—

"'Monsieur Le Cure—Curiosity induced me to be present, the other day, at the baptism of the new bell for this Parish; it was the first time I had ever had an opportunity of witnessing such a ceremony, and I wished to judge, by personal observation, how far it agreed with what I had read on the subject; and now I feel as it were my duty to tell you how much I was shocked at what I then saw and heard. My common sense and my conscience were alike outraged at such a profanation of sacred things. To baptize a piece of metal—what folly! To apply to a bell the magnificent words of the "Miserere"—to ask for it a "clean heart and right spirit"—what a detestable mockery!! Sir, I cannot imagine how a serious-minded man, such as I wish to consider you, could celebrate, without shame and remorse, such a mystery of iniquity. If you could have perceived the irreverent attitudes of your people during this solemn farce—if you could have marked, as I did, their ill-concealed laughter, heard their jocose remarks, you would no longer mistake the tendency of such deplorable ceremonies. It is thus that men are turned into profane mockers. How easily might the defenders of Paganism have retorted the sarcasms of Justin, of Tertullian, of Origen, and of others, if they could have pointed to the practice of such gross absurdities among the Christians. When the ceremony was over your brethren may have laughed at the miserable folly which they had just enacted. And I know enough of the Roman clergy to be aware how many of them view their mysteries in private; but you, sir, are still young, your conscience has not yet been seared by the prolonged practice of such Roman puerilities! I beseech you, therefore, to make use of the Gospel—test and judge of the tree by its fruit—and ask yourself, as in the presence of that God who shall be so soon our judge, whether a Church which commands observances so manifestly impious and absurd, can, in very deed, be the bride and faithful spouse of our Lord Jesus Christ? Do not shut your eyes, under the pretext that others must answer for you; for it is written—Every man must bear his own burden. If your Church should be deceiving herself, then you who belong to her, and uphold her errors—you, I say, shall perish with her.

"I beseech you, dear sir, to see nothing in this letter (perhaps severe), but the expression of the affectionate compassion which has dictated it. I feel called upon to warn you, before it be too late, of the danger you are incurring. May God grant that these few lines may find an entrance into your heart. I desire most sincerely that it may be so, but whatever may be the result,

"I am, yours faithfully,

"D. J., Minister of the Gospel."

"I am ignorant of what effect this warning may have produced; but I leave the result to him who has said—"Cast thy bread upon the waters, for thou shalt find it after many days.'—Eccles. xi. 1.

"A few words, and I have done. I remarked, that in consecrating this bell they had asked God to make it a means 'to excite the piety of the faithful;' to 'draw down blessings upon the fields;' to 'break the force of tempests, and to disperse the lightnings.' It is not very easy to imagine what may be the connection between the sound of a bell and the exercise of Christian piety, or the blessing of God upon the fields; but the petition, with regard to the thunder and lightning is in manifest contradiction to the physical laws which regulate this phenomenon.

"Every person of edutation knows that the vibration of a metallic substance would rather tend to hasten than to avert such an explosion—so much so, that in some places magistrates prohibit the ringing of church bells during the prevalence of storms. Unfortunately for the infallible Church, she composed this portion of her liturgy at a period when the universal ignorance of physical science may have accounted for thus consecrating a popular superstition; but now, as she will not acknowledge herself in error on a single point, she is compelled to shut her eyes to the light, and to persevere in asking from God, in Latin! things which she dare not express to her fellowmen in French!! A priest must occasionally feel sorely perplexed, when he finds himself constrained to offer up prayers which he knows contain a tissue of absurdities. I am somewhat curious to know how intelligent Romanists reconcile such facts with a belief in the infallibility of their Church. It is quite evident that the baptism of bells can have no rational significance in a Christian point of view. It is impossible to give it a place in a religion whose chief characteristic is, that it is "spirit and truth;" and it is equally difficult to assign it a place upon the score of common sense, as it is opposed to the true nature of things.

"Nevertheless, if the antiquity of an error render it acceptable, we may concede to this our own show of respect, and perhaps this is what the Church of Rome feels. In truth, the baptism of bells is more ancient than the Apostles, and may be traced up to their heathen cotemporaries; but as bells were unknown at that period, they made use of trumpets, which they consecrated and purified with the "Lustral water' (the holy water of the Pagans). The day of such a consecration was termed 'Tubilustrium,' as may be seen in the fifth book of Ovid Fastorum, 725. When the Church became lukewarm and worldly, she sought to make converts from among the heathen, by borrowing from them their idolatrous rites, and adapting them as much as possible to her own use. This was done at first in simplicity, and without suspecting how grievously it must undermine true piety.

"Among some others, equally absurd, the baptism of bells formed a place, and it will probably retain it as long as the Church of Rome endures; for she has adopted for her motto the famous saying of the Jesuit—'Let her be as she is, or let her not be at all!'

"But let us, my brethren, give our God 'no rest' until we have 'destroyed the covering cast over the people'—until he have bestowed upon us the power to bear a faithful testimony to this "corrupt and perverse generation,' so that 'perhaps we may have some.' I should be only too happy if these few remarks might contribute to such an end.

"Believe me to be, &c.,

"D. J., Minister."

THE RULE OF FAITH.

II. The second argument adduced by Roman Catholic divines in support of Tradition is this, that without it the canonicity and inspiration of the books of Scripture cannot be established; in other words the authority of the Church is necessary, in order to determine what is genuine Scripture (22). In order to render this proof as complete as possible, modern theologians of the Romish communion maintain further, that the books of the New Testament were not generally received as inspired by the Christian Church till the fourth century after Christ (23); and that the Roman Church then, by its plenary authority, determined which books were canonical Scripture and which were not. So that during the first three centuries immediately subsequent to the Apostolic age there was no distinct knowledge of what was Scripture and what was not; which, of course, could not have been permitted by God if the written Word were intended to be the sole and sufficient Rule of Christian Faith. The inconsistency of Protestants is also triumphantly held up to ridicule, who, whilst they profess to appeal solely to Scripture, are not able to tell what Scripture is without the aid of the very Tradition which they ostentatiously reject. Now, this famous argument, which is styled by Eckius (Enchirid, p. 7) "Achilles pro Catholicis," plausible as it may appear, admits an easy answer. The Church of England admits—nay, appeals to, the testimony, not indeed of the Roman Church, but of the Church universal, from the first age of Christianity to the present hour, as a proof of the canonicity and inspiration of the Scriptures. "In the name of the Holy Scriptures," she says in her Sixth Article, "we do understand those canonical books of the Old and New Testament, of whose authority was never any doubt in the Church" (24). We have an unbroken chain of incontrovertible evidence, ascending to the very age in which the New Testament Scriptures (with which we are now specially concerned) were penned, that the word contained in them was received by the Catholic Church, "not as the word of men, but (as it is indeed) the word of God" (25). The testimony of the primitive Church upon this point is as conclusive evidence of the Divine origin of Scripture as any human testimony can well be conceived to be. The case stands thus: We have a number of writings professing to be inspired (26). These writings contain accounts of miracles stated to have been wrought by their authors—that is, their authors are represented as performing the very acts by which Divine inspiration is proved—"God also bearing them witness by signs, and wonders, and divers miracles, and distributions of the Holy Ghost;"—Heb. ii. 4. These writings were received as inspired, and publicly read as such, by large congregations of persons living at that very time, and in those very places, in which those proofs of inspiration are affirmed to have been given by the authors (27). The reception and canonization of these writings by the whole or greater part of the Church (28), under such circumstances, is, therefore, justly regarded by the Church of England as one of the most irrefragable proofs of their inspiration. This historical testimony is, for the most part, similar to that by which we prove

(22) This is the form into which the argument is generally thrown by the more moderate divines of the Romish communion. The ultramontane writers, however take more decided ground and assert that the canon of Scripture rests entirely on the authority of the Church of Rome. "The Church (of Rome) can give canonical authority," says Pighius (Hier. lib. 3), "to books which have no such authority from themselves or their authors." Stapleton asserts the same, Rel. Contr. 5. qu 2. art. 4. And the Romish professor Peronne thus writes (Prel. Theol. ii. p. 1051-2, Ed. Paris)—"The Roman Church, being the mother and mistress of Churches, had power to constitute the true canon of Scripture." This notion originated as early as the eleventh century. One of the dictates of Pope Gregory VII. is, that "No book or chapter is to be regarded as canonical without the Pope's authority." See Baron Ann. Eccl ad A. D. 1076.

(23) See, e. g., Milner, End of Controv., Letter xi. Newman, Development, p. 160, descends a century lower. "On what ground do we receive the canon as it comes to us but on the authority of the Church of the fourth and fifth centuries. The Church of that era decided—not merely bore testimony, but passed a judgment on former testimony—decided that certain books were of authority." Mr. Newman's special object in maintaining this doctrine is plain; for if the Scriptures were not acknowledged to be the genuine Word of God till the fourth century after Christ, it would be a remarkable instance of a new law of faith and practice emerging long after the Apostolic age. And we should be unable to assign any limit to the process of development, both dogmatical and practical, with so striking an example of it before us as the divinization of books more than three centuries after their composition.

(24) The importance of the testimony of the primitive Church, in establishing the genuineness and authenticity of the Books of Scripture, is also fully recognised by the ablest divines of the Church of England. It will be enough to name Hooker, Whitaker, Field, Laud, Chillingworth, Lardner, Paley, Marsh, &c.

(25) The reception of the New Testament Scriptures as the Word of God by the primitive Church is guaranteed by irrefragable proofs. We have not only a continued succession of writers, by whom various portions are quoted but we have catalogues of the entire, drawn up by individuals (who derived their knowledge from their forefathers), and confirmed by Councils. The constancy of martyrs—the fury of persecutors—the fraud of heretics—all tend to establish the fact, that these Scriptures were regarded as the genuine Word of God.

(26) 1 Cor. ii. 4 13; vii. 40; xiv. 36 37. 1 Th. i. 5; ii. 13. Gal. i. 11. 12 compared with 2 Tim. iii. 16. Eph. iii. 3. 1 Pet. i. 12; iv. 11. 2 Pet. iii. 2. Apoc. iii. 6.

(27) The Gospels of St. Mark and St. Luke form no real exception to this, as the primitive Church generally believed the former to have been written under the direction of St. Peter, and the latter under that of St. Paul.

(28) Some books of the New Testament—the Epistle to the Hebrews, the Epistle of James, 2 Peter, 2 and 3 John, Jude, and the Apocalypse—though generally received, were not universally recognised as canonical so late as the time of the historian Eusebius—i.e., the beginning of the fourth century.—Euseb. E. H. iii. 3, 25. He calls them ἀντιλεγόμενα, or "spoken against," in contradistinction to the ὁμολογούμενα or "universally received." The fact of some few persons entertaining doubts respecting the genuineness of the books just mentioned is so far from weakening our belief in the canon, that it rather confirms it, because it proves what extreme caution was exercised in admitting writings into it the genuineness of every ancient book, only far more complete and convincing. But whilst we do not hesitate to confess that we have received the Scriptures from God through the ministry of his one Catholic and Apostolic Church, and that she bears invaluable testimony to their authenticity, we are equally resolute in maintaining that the Scriptures are not the Word of the Church, but the Word of God, and that they owe their authority not to her, but to Him. We acknowledge her to be the "witness and keeper of Holy Writ," but we deny her to be its "judge." Again, however valuable the testimony of the Church may be, it is not the only evidence of the authenticity and genuineness of the New Testament Scriptures. We are not entirely dependant, as the Roman Catholic argument assumes, on the Church for our knowledge of what is Scripture. There is a wholly independent head of proof, which, the more it is examined, becomes more copious, complete, and convincing—we mean the internal evidence furnished by the writings themselves. The more we study and examine them, the more we are convinced—by the harmony of their parts with each other and with the old Testament, by the majestic simplicity of their composition, by the Divine purity and sublimity of their doctrines, by the loveliness and noble comprehensiveness of their morality, to which we may add the wonderful effects which they have produced on the condition of the world, and the series of providential interferences by which they have been preserved and diffused—that the Scriptures are not the words of man, but of God, and that they are the full and sufficient deposit of that Divine revelation to which the Church owes her existence, and on which she depends for her preservation. Led by the Church, in the first instance, to the Scriptures, we examine them for ourselves, and we say to her as the Samaritans said to the woman—"We now believe, not (no longer, οὐκέτι) for thy saying, for we ourselves have heard him, and know that this is, indeed, the Saviour of the world."—John iv. 42. We believe, in accordance with our Lord's words—"If any man will do the will of him, he shall know of the doctrine whether it be of God" (John vii. 17)—that to the humble and sober-minded individual Christian no proof of the Divine origin of the Scriptures will be more convincing than the inward testimony of the Holy Spirit whose word they are (29).

III. But it is maintained, in the third place, that, even though Scripture were allowed to contain all things necessary for salvation, yet, as it is difficult, obscure, and likely to be misunderstood (30), therefore (unless we are prepared to admit that God designed his Word to be an endless source of doubt and disputation) Tradition is requisite to determine its meaning; or, as it has been otherwise expressed, in order that the Scriptures should be a revelation to us, there is need of an authorized, visible, living, infallible interpreter and guide, scil. the Catholic Church (31). "Between Scripture and the individual reader of it there yawns," says an eminent Roman Catholic theologian (32), "an immense abyss." In proof of the difficulty and obscurity of Scripture we are reminded of the profoundly mysterious truths which it reveals, and of the numerous sources of error connected with the mode in which they are transmitted (33). The authority of Scripture itself is appealed to on the point—e.g., the statement of St Peter respecting the Epistles of St. Paul (1 Peter iii. 16); the fact of our blessed Lord opening the understanding of the disciples, that they might understand those Scriptures relating to himself, which he had just appealed to (Luke xxiv. 44, 45); and such passages in the Old Testament as Ps. cxviii. (Eng. Ver. cxix.) 34. The Fathers also are cited in support of the same position (34). Thus, passages from Irenæus, Cyprian, and Augustine are brought forward, in which the origin and growth of heresies are ascribed to false interpretations of the Scriptures (35). And, lastly, we are pressed with an argum. ad hominem, derived from the admission of Protestants themselves, respecting the great difficulties of the written Word. Now, in reply to all this we answer in general, that we do not deny, but freely admit, that Holy Scripture contains many things both difficult and obscure, and that unless it be studied in a spirit of docility and prayerfulness, of sobriety and caution, it may lead, as it unfortunately has too often led, into dangerous and fatal errors. We admit that the exposure of Christians to these dangers, and the necessity for constant watchfulness, in order to escape them, is far from what we would naturally wish, and from what we would, at first sight, think probable in a revelation from God. But upon a little reflection we find that God has not, in the most essential matters connected with our present life and temporal well-being, seen fit to protect us from the risk of falling into dangerous and even fatal mistakes; but that, on the contrary, caution, prudence, and circumspection are, in general, absolutely necessary to ensure our worldly prosperity and comfort. It is not difficult, moreover, to see that the very same line of argument which would prove the necessity of an infallible expositor of all the difficulties of Scripture would equally prove that no such difficulties could exist at all; just as the assumed necessity of a universal and infallible remedy for all diseases would lead to the conclusion that no such thing as disease ought to exist. Nothing can be more hazardous than arguing from our own notions of what ought to be, to the necessity of the Most High acting in such or such a manner; because the direct tendency of such speculations is not only to make a man an infidel, as respects the peculiar doctrines of Christianity, but to lead him, if he consistently follows out his principles, to downright Atheism. Our general answer, then, to the presumed necessity of an infallible interpretation of Scripture—whether in the form of Divine unwritten Tradition, or of the inherent infallibility of the existing Catholic Church—is this, that even though the difficulties of Scripture were tenfold what they are, it would be in the highest degree presumptuous and hazardous for us to conclude, that the permission of such difficulties and apparent imperfections in revelation is inconsistent with God's character, or with his purposes in reference to mankind; and that He must, accordingly, have provided some remedy for them, some infallible tribunal by which all perplexing questions might be resolved.

But, in fact, when we examine more closely into the alleged difficulties and obscurities of Scripture, we find that they are of such a nature that they do not concern our practice, or the duties which we owe either to God or to each other. The side of Christianity which looks towards us, and with which alone we are properly concerned, is plain and easy of comprehension to every honest and humble inquirer after truth. Love to God, faith in our Lord Jesus Christ, as the one perfect and sufficient atonement for the sins of the world, and in the Eternal Spirit, as the sanctifier of all them that believe in Jesus; this, with purity of life, and love to our neighbour, stands inscribed so plainly on the page of Scripture that he who runs may read. The Church of England accordingly invites her children to a sober and humble study of the Scriptures, in order to find in them a full authority for all she teaches in her Catechism and other elementary guides to the knowledge of the truth. The writings of the Fathers, again, are replete with passages in which the plainness and simplicity of Holy Scripture (under this aspect) are declared. Thus Augustine says—"God hath made the Scriptures to stoop to the capacity of babes and sucklings." (36). Chrysostom says—"For what necessity is there of a discourse? All things are plain and simple in the holy Scriptures; all things necessary are evident" (37). And again—"The Apostles and Prophets have acted entirely differently [from the Philosophers]; for they, as the common teachers of the world, have made everything proceeding from them plain and evident to all, in order that each person, even by himself, may be able to learn what is said of it from the mere reading of it (38).

The acknowledged difficulties of Scripture, again, are of various kinds, for none of which, however, is the interposition of an infallible interpreter needed. There are, in the first place, difficulties connected with the triune nature of God; with the incarnation of the Redeemer; with the origin of evil, &c., considered as speculative truths. Difficulties of this kind transcend the power of our faculties even to comprehend, so that no interpreter of Scripture, however infallible, could possibly remove them. These, and such like, are "secret things, which belong unto the Lord our God" (Deut. xxix. 29), and, in respect to us, are "occasions of humility, arguments of forbearance and mutual toleration, and an endearment of reverence and adoration" (39). There are, in the second place, difficulties and obscurities in Scripture which only need for their removal a careful study of the Divine Oracles, and a comparison of Scripture with Scripture (40). Every difficulty removed in this way enlarges our conception of, and strengthens our faith in, the wisdom and perfection of the great scheme of providence and grace revealed in the Bible, and is, therefore, at once a delightful and most profitable occupation of the mind. But no infallible interpreter, other than Scripture itself, is here required. To this class of difficulties, likewise, numerous passages in the writings of the Fathers refer. Thus Clemens Alexandrinus, speaking of the true mode of ascertaining the sense of Scripture, says—"The truth is discovered also by confirming each of the points, which are demonstrated in accordance with the Scriptures, by similar Scriptures (41). And Augustine uses the following remarkable words—"Magnificently, therefore, and wholesomely, has the Holy Spirit so fashioned the sacred Scriptures, that by the more open passages provision is made for our hunger, and by the more obscure a feeling of satiety is prevented. For nothing almost is drawn forth from these more obscure places, which may not be found most plainly spoken elsewhere" (42). Exactly to the same effect writes Irenæus, c. Hær. lib. ii., c. 47; as also Basil, Ascet., Quæst. 267. There are, lastly, difficulties and obscurities which depend for their explanation upon various branches of human learning—such as skill in the original languages in which the Sacred Books are written, knowledge of the contemporary history, acquaintance with ecclesiastical archæology, and with the customs, modes of thought, &c., of those by whom the various parts of Scripture were written, and of those to whom they were addressed. All this requires not the interposition of an infallible judge, but the researches of properly qualified scholars. Every advance thus made in the sound criticism and interpretation of the Bible is an addition to our theological knowledge, and as such is calculated to exercise, through the teaching of the authorized ministers of the Church, a useful influence upon the general religious education of the community. Accordingly, the Church of England cultivates the use of all such aids for the explanation of Scripture. She takes pains to provide a learned clergy for the instruction of her poorer and more ignorant members. She does not encourage every uneducated person to search out for himself, unaided and unguided, a system of theology. In this department of biblical inquiry, the study of the ancient Fathers and Doctors of the Church is particularly valuable: since, living in times so much nearer to the Apostolic age, they had sources of information, upon many points connected with the sense of Scripture, open to them which have since disappeared in the lapse of centuries. It is to this kind of interpretation (Hermeneutical Tradition, as it has been termed), and not to any supposed Divine Tradition, supplemental to Scripture, and handed down in the Church, that such Patristic passages as the following relate:—"There are also many books written by our sainted masters, which, if any one will read over, he shall learn in a certain way the interpretation of the Scriptures, and obtain the knowledge of truth which he desires" (43). "Who that is mode-

(29) Some Protestants have been content to rest the authority of the Scriptures of the New Testament solely on the internal evidence, especially on the witness which the spirit bears with our own spirits that they are the Word of God. The framers of the Belgic and Gallic confessions were of this opinion. The Church of England, aware of the danger of making our own private persuasions the sole standard of inspired truth, and bearing in mind that there is scarcely any religion in the world which has not its own sacred books, which its votaries receive as inspired, has wisely insisted on the importance of the external evidence.

(30) Chemnitz (Exam. Conc. Trid., p. 13) says, that Eckius, Emser, and the first writers against the Reformation did not refuse to argue from Scripture; but Pighius, finding this detrimental to his cause, invented the mode of arguing from the insufficiency, obscurity, and ambiguity of Scripture for the absolute necessity of unwritten Tradition; in which he was followed by all the Roman theologians.

(33) For example, the variations of texts and versions are urged by Roman Catholic divines as an argument to prove the necessity of relying entirely on the existing Church for the meaning of Scripture. The full wing is the reply to these objections, as employed by infidels, given by the famous Bossuet—"Will any one say that it is not certain that from all these versions, and from all these texts, there will always result the same laws, the same miracles, the same prophecies, the same history, the same body of doctrine, and, in short, the same substance? What more do we want than this immovable basis of the sacred books, and what more could we demand from Divine Providence?—Bossuet, Hist. Univ., t. ii. p. 193. The same answer will serve against the same objections, when urged by Roman Catholics.

Bellarmine (de V.D. iii. 2) attempts to evade the force of this passage by the remark, that Augustine uses the word fere, "almost." But, admitting this qualification, Augustine elsewhere (Contr. Donat. Ep., vel de Unit. Eccles. § 47. t. ix. 371) says that such obscure, ambiguous, or figurative passages are those which any person may interpret according to his own sense (quæ quisque sicut voluerit interpretetur secundum sensum suum). rately sane does not easily understand that the exposition of the Scriptures is to be sought for from those who profess to be the teachers of them?"(44) So, in like manner, the ancient Fathers and Doctors are continually appealed to and cited in the writings of the standard divines of the Church of England, as well as in the Book of Homilies which she has authorised; not, indeed, as an authority co-ordinate with Holy Scripture, but as a help to determine the right interpretation thereof in passages which need illustration in any of the points of view above noticed (45).

It is not necessary to consider in detail the proofs alleged by Roman Catholics in reference to the difficulties and obscurities of Scripture. The general answer above given is quite sufficient to obviate any objection to the Protestant Rule of Faith derived from this source. We will, however, conclude this article with a remark on the passage of St. Peter, above referred to—2 Pet., iii., 16. If there was then, or if it were intended that there should subsequently be, an infallible authority, to which the faithful might appeal, in order to clear up those things "hard to be understood, which the unlearned and unstable wrest to their own destruction," surely here was a most fitting place to mention it; especially as, according to the Roman Catholic theory, the successors of St. Peter himself (the writer of these words) were to be the chief, if not the sole, depositaries of this infallible authority. But the Apostle does not give the remotest hint of any such thing. The only safeguard from error which he points out is one which not only every man may obtain without the interposition of any human agency external to himself, but which excludes the very possibility of such interposition—"You, therefore, brethren, knowing these things before, take heed lest, being led aside by the error of the unwise, you fall from your own steadfastness. But grow in grace, and in the knowledge of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ."—Verses 17, 18. The safeguard recommended by St. Peter is cautious vigilance, with growth in grace and in the knowledge of Christ; not an appeal to a visible, living, infallible interpreter. The consideration of the remaining arguments in favour of a double Rule of Faith we must reserve to a future occasion.

The Catholic Layman.

DUBLIN, FEBRUARY, 1853.

CIVIL AND RELIGIOUS LIBERTY.

THERE is nothing more deservedly precious to mankind than liberty. We do not understand by liberty, as some do, the power of tyrannizing over others. We mean that well-regulated liberty which secures to every man the right of independent action, while respecting the rights of others; the right of every man to think, uncontrolled by others; the right of every man to have a free conscience towards God. This is our notion of "civil and religious liberty."

In proportion as this is valuable to men, they ought to stand on their guard against all who claim a right to deprive them of this liberty.

We do not consider it a question whether the Pope possesses power to deprive men of civil and religious liberty. We are sure that all our Roman Catholic readers hold, as we do ourselves, that the Pope has no such power. We think it false and unjust to say that Roman Catholics are slaves, or that they are ready to yield up their civil and religious liberty to the Pope. So far as they submit to the Pope, out of conviction, they are acting freely; and we have no right to suppose that they are ready to submit to him farther than conviction leads them.

But it is often made a question whether the Pope claims for himself a power of forcing the actions and the consciences of men, against their own convictions. If he do make such a claim, all who value civil and religious liberty should stand on their guard against it.

Whether the Pope do really make such a claim, is a question that should be calmly and candidly considered; and we propose dispassionately to review what is said on both sides.

One side points to the Bull in which Pope Pius V. excommunicated and deposed Queen Elizabeth of England. We have only room to quote one sentence—"We likewise declare the said Elizabeth deprived of the pretended right to the kingdom above mentioned, and of all dominion, dignity, and privileges whatsoever; and that all the nobility and subjects of the said realm, who have sworn to her in any manner whatsoever, are for ever absolved from any such oath, and from all obligation of fidelity and allegiance. . . . We likewise command all the nobility, subjects, and others above mentioned, that they do not presume to obey her orders, commands, or laws, for the future; and those who act otherwise are involved in the same sentence of excommunication."—Sanders de Schismate Anglicano, p 423. Now, whereas the Pope, in his Bull, claims to do this in virtue of the authority committed to to him by God, these persons consider this a clear claim on his part to overthrow men's civil rights and liberties.

These persons also appeal to the canon law (Decret. Greg. IX., book V., title VII., ch. 13), which gives the Pope power to compel all temporal princes to take an oath to exterminate heretics from their dominions. They appeal to Roman Catholic historians, that this was actually carried into effect by the extermination of a hundred thousand Albigenses and Waldenses in various countries; they appeal to the fact, that this law stands yet unrepealed, in the canon law of Rome, at this day; and they observe, which is certainly of great importance, that this is not only a part of their law, but it is actually a decree of a Pope (Innocent III.), and also a general council (Lateran IV.), acting together with the Pope: and since all Roman Catholics hold a decree of a Pope and a general council together to be infallible, they hold that this decree, being infallible, must also be unchangeable.

Now, these are weighty arguments; for all the facts stated here are certainly true. Yet, we ought candidly to consider what Roman Catholics say on the other side. And we believe their answer is generally this:—"That Roman Catholics, at the present day, do not admit or believe in any such power of the Pope; that if Pope Pius IX. should now attempt to treat Queen Victoria as Pius V. treated Queen Elizabeth, they would think themselves bound to disobey the Pope, and obey the Queen; and in like manner they say, if he should now order them to exterminate heretics, they should think themselves bound to disobey him. They say that their own conscience tells them that these things are wrong, and that they would not believe that such things are right, even on infallible authority.

Now, we are satisfied that this is generally true of Roman Catholics at the present day, though it was not so formerly; and we are quite sure that it is true of all our readers. We only ask those who say this to observe, that since Popes and general councils have claimed to possess spiritual authority from God to do these things, it is clear that their claim to spiritual authority is not to be admitted, unless it can stand the test of truth and reason. And, to be consistent, they should admit no such claim, unless it can stand this test. It is clear that Popes and general councils are not sufficient witnesses themselves for the extent of their own powers. Infallible as they may be, they may claim, and have claimed, powers that were never given to them—powers that it is blasphemous and wicked to claim, as being given to them by God.

But all this, while it is a very sufficient answer as to what Roman Catholics believe, is no answer as to what the Pope claims. So, then, Roman Catholics only say that the Pope does not, in fact, now claim any power of interfering with men's civil and religious liberty. We have never heard Roman Catholics offer any proof of this—they only say it; and, with all respect to them, we think it possible that they may be mistaken. If they could show us that any Pope has ever disclaimed the power which his predecessors claimed and exercised, this would be conclusive with us; but we do not know of any such disclaimer having been produced, though, certainly, it is called for, while the Pope's canon law stands as it does.

Now, we have met with a document lately which seems to us to settle the question. It is an "allocution" by the present Pope, given in Consistory, dated September 27, 1852, published in the Tablet newspaper of November 6. It relates to the affairs of the republic of New Grenada, on the isthmus which connects North and South America. The following extracts will show what kind of laws the Pope complains of. The Pope says that the Holy See had strongly remonstrated against a proposed law, "that emigrants to that country might have the public exercise of their worship, whatever it was; and, disapproving of the above decrees, has again and again insisted, that they should never be ratified." And a little further on he says—"Nor must we pass over in silence that, by the new constitution of that republic, enacted, in these recent times, among other things, the RIGHT ALSO OF FREE EDUCATION is defended, and liberty of all kinds is given unto all, so that each person may even PRINT AND PUBLISH HIS THOUGHTS, and all kinds of monstrous portents of opinion, AND PROFESS PRIVATELY AND PUBLICLY WHATEVER WORSHIP HE PLEASES." And on this the Pope observes, to the college of Cardinals whom he addressed—"You assuredly see, venerable brothers, how horrible and sacrilegious a war is proclaimed against the Catholic Church, by the rulers of the republic of New Grenada."

So, if the civil government of a country establishes by law the great bulwarks of civil and religious liberty, FREEDOM OF EDUCATION, LIBERTY OF THE PRESS, and the RIGHT OF WORSHIP according to each man's conscience, the Pope considers that "a sacrilegious war" against his authority!

And mark how he fights in such a war. Towards the end of the allocution he says—"We, raising, with Apostolic liberty, our pastoral voice in this your most illustrious assembly, do censure, condemn, and DECLARE UTTERLY NULL AND VOID all the aforesaid decrees, which have been there enacted by the civil power.

That is, when the civil power in a country passes laws that education and the press shall be free, and every man shall be left to worship God according to his own conscience, the Pope claims a right to repeal those laws by his own pastoral authority.

(44) Quis, enim mediocriter sanus non facile intelliget Scripturarum expositionem iis petendam esse, qui earum doctores esse profitentur?—August. de Morib. Eccles. cap. I.

(45) In the Code of Canons passed by the English Convocation, in 1571, the following rule is prescribed to the clergy, in reference to their sermons, from which it appears how highly our Church estimates the value of Christian antiquity as an auxiliary in the interpretation of Scripture:—"But especially they [preachers] shall take heed that they deliver nothing from the pulpit, to be religiously held and believed by the people, but what is agreeable to the doctrine of the Old or New Testament, and which the Catholic Fathers and ancient bishops have collected out of that very doctrine."—Cardwell, Synodal. I 126.

This is decisive as to what pastoral authority the Pope claims. If he do not try to exercise it in this country at present, it is not because he thinks it wrong for him to claim it, but only because it might not be prudent; but, through Dr. Cullen and the Synod of Thurles, he may prepare the way for it; for, of course, the Pope thinks that he ought to have the same "pastoral authority" in Ireland that he exercises in New Grenada.

We submit this to the consideration of Irish Roman Catholics, who are sincerely attached to civil and religious liberty. When the Synod of Thurles, and the Roman Catholic priests and bishops, claim to have to themselves the management of education, under the direction of the Pope, let Roman Catholics remember how the Pope undertakes to abolish, in New Grenada, the constitution of that country, and the law of that land, by which "the right of free education is defended."

THE TOUCHSTONE.

OBJECTION 33.—Protestants deny that the pastors of the church have received from Christ the power of remitting or retaining sins, according to the state and disposition of the penitent.

Their Bible expressly affirms it (John xx. 21, 22, 23), where Christ tells his disciples—As my Father hath sent me, even so I send you—Receive ye the Holy Ghost: whosoever sins ye remit, they are remitted unto them; and whosoever sins ye retain, they are retained. Hence their Common Prayer Book expressly acknowledges, in the Form of Absolution, prescribed in the Order for the Visitation of the Sick, that our Lord Jesus Christ has left power to his church to absolve all sinners who truly repent and believe in him.

REPLY.—It is generally agreed among Christians, of all denominations, that Christ's ministers are authorised and bound to proclaim that (as is expressed in the Church of England Prayer-Book) "God pardoneth and absolveth all that truly repent, and unfeignedly believe his holy Gospel." And it is also universally admitted that pardon is not promised to the ungodly and impenitent, whatever they may profess with their lips. Now, to know with perfect certainty which class each particular person belongs to—the sincere or the insincere—is plainly impossible, except to one who should possess the power of reading men's hearts, so as to judge of their most secret thoughts. And this power does not seem to have been bestowed even on the Apostles. For they seem not to have been aware (see Acts viii.) that Simon the sorcerer was "in the bond of iniquity," till he had betrayed his own corruption of heart. And, certainly, Christian pastors of these days possess no such power of reading men's thoughts. They can only, therefore, declare with complete certainty the general promise of divine pardon to all the penitent. And when any minister pronounces absolution on any particular person, he must be understood to speak not absolutely, but conditionally—i. e., on the supposition of the person's having in his heart that faith and penitence which he professes. To pardon the impenitent is what God has not promised to do, nor authorized any one to do.

All this relates, you will observe, to sins against God. As for any wrong done by one man to another, the person wronged has, of course, a right to forgive it absolutely. And Christians are exhorted to forgive injuries—meaning, of course, so far as regards the injuries done to themselves; for no one can have any right to pardon an offence done to another. So, also, a Church can pardon any offence done to that Church, as a society; and so may a State, or any other community, pardon a wrong done to that community. And when any act is done, which is both an offence against the church and also against an individual, and, moreover, a sin against God also, the individual has the power to forgive, as far as he individually is concerned; but he has no power to forgive the offence against the church unless the church authorises him to do so; and the church, again, has power to forgive the wrong done to the church; but sin against God, no man, and no body of men, can have any right to forgive, unless they can show that God has conferred on them that power along with what is essential to the right exercise of it—the gift of "discerning spirits," reading men's inward thoughts, and judging with certainty as to their sincerity.

OBJECTION 34.—Protestants deny that a special confession of sins is prescribed in Scripture, or was practised by the primitive Christians in the Apostles' time.

Their Bible confutes both these assertions; the former (James v. 16)—Confess your faults one to another—that is, to the priests, or elders of the church, of whom the Apostle was speaking in the foregoing verses. The latter (Acts xix. 18)—Many that believed came and confessed, and showed their deeds.

REPLY.—The passage here cited proves the very contrary of the conclusion it is brought to establish. For the very circumstance that the Apostle had just before been speaking of the Elders [the Christian Ministers] shows that he could not have been here alluding to a special confession of sins by the people to the elders; else he would have said—"confess your sins to them;" or "confess your sins to those elders;" instead of which he says—"confess your sins one to another," which would just as much imply confessing to a layman as to a minister.

So also that passage in the Acts not only says nothing of private confession to any priest, but plainly shows that no such thing was enjoined to Christians; else it would not have been said that "many" believers made such a confession, but that all of them necessarily did so.

The passage seems to indicate that some of the converts had, in their heathen life, committed grievous sins; and that these came forward, on becoming Christians, to proclaim openly, before the whole congregation, their repentance and abhorrence of such sins.

As for the Apostle James's exhortation, it is given in general terms, and is left to be applied by each man according to the best of his conscientious judgment. For neither Protestants nor Roman Catholics understand, by confessing sins "one to another," that every one is to make a special confession of every one of his sins to everybody he meets.

1. But most Protestants would admit that one who is conscious of having wronged his neighbour ought to acknowledge to him that he has done so, and ask his pardon.

2. That it will often be useful to ask the advice of a sensible and pious friend, as to the best mode of breaking through some sinful habit, or of repairing some injury we may have done, or the like. And

3. That it may sometimes be advisable to warn a child, or a friend, against some temptation he may be exposed to, by telling him of the sin into which it may have formerly led ourselves.

But as for "special confession" to a priest, as a duty regularly required of every Christian, Protestants plainly see that if any such thing had been known in the times of the Apostles, it would have been clearly and expressly laid down, and strongly insisted on in their writings; and in these there is not even the least hint of it to be found.

OBJECTION 35.—Protestants deny that the church has received a power from Christ to grant indulgences or pardons, for releasing of punishment due to sin.

Their Bible affirms it (Matt. xvi. 19)—I will give unto thee the keys of the kingdom of heaven: and whatsoever thou shalt bind on earth shall be bound in heaven: and whatsoever thou shalt loose on earth shall be loosed in heaven. Hence St. Paul (2 Cor. ii. 10) granted an indulgence to the incestuous Corinthian, forgiving him, as he expresses it, in the person of Christ.

REPLY.—Sins against God can be forgiven, it is plain, by God alone. And his pardon of all true penitents who trust in Christ is proclaimed by all Protestant ministers. But they have not the power of so reading men's hearts as to know, with complete certainty, who are true penitents and sincere believers. Nor did even the Apostles possess this power; else they would have known the real character of Simon the sorcerer (see Acts viii.) before he betrayed his own wickedness.

But offences against a Church, that Church has (as we have said above) power to punish and to pardon. And, accordingly, every Protestant Church claims the right to exclude from the Lord's table, or to expel altogether from the community, those who scandalise the congregation by gross wickedness of life; and again, on their submitting and reforming their life, to re-admit them.

This you may see (among other places) in the Rubric prefixed to the communion service of the Church of England.*

* "So many as intend to be partakers of the Holy Communion shall signify their names to the Curate, at least some time the day before; and if any of them be an open and notorious evil doer, or have done any wrong to his neighbour by word or deed, so that the congregation be thereby offended, the curate having knowledge thereof, shall call and advertise him, that in any wise he presume not to come to the Lord's table, until he hath openly declared himself to have truly repented, and amended his former naughty life, that the congregation may thereby be satisfied, which before were offended; and that he hath recompensed the parties to whom he hath done wrong, or at least declare himself to be in full purpose so to do, as soon as he conveniently may.

"The same order shall the curate use with those betwixt whom he perceiveth malice and hatred to reign, not suffering them to be partakers of the Lord's table, until he know them to be reconciled. And if any of the parties so at variance be content to forgive, from the bottom of his heart, all that the other hath trespassed against him, and to make amends, for that he himself hath offended; and the other party will not be persuaded to a godly unity, but remain still in his forwardness and malice, the minister, in that case, ought to admit the penitent person to the Holy Communion, and not him that is obstinate. Provided that every minister so repelling any, as is specified in this or the next precedent paragraph of this Rubric, shall be obliged to give an account of the same to the ordinary within fourteen days after at the farthest. And the ordinary shall proceed against those offending according to the Canon.—Book of Common Prayer."

But as for punishments or pardons in the next world, these must, of course, be left altogether in the hands of the ALL-WISE, who alone can read men's hearts. As for "binding" and "loosing," these were, and, indeed, still are, the words in common use among the Jews to denote the establishing, and the annulling, of any regulation or ordinance.

And, accordingly, the Church of England exercises the right of making, and of altering, from time to time, regulations for the conducting of divine worship, for the admitting of ministers, &c. But she does not presumptuously take upon her to set forth any doctrines not contained in Scripture (such as purgatory, or the invocation of departed saints, &c.), nor to introduce any practices contrary to Scripture, such as altering the original institution of the Lord's Supper, by administering the bread without the wine, &c.

OBJECTION 36.—Protestants reject extreme unction—that is, the anointing of the sick; and deny that there is any promise of grace in Scripture to those that receive it.

Their Bible, in plain and express terms, recommends this sacrament, with a promise of grace to such as receive it (St. James v., 14, 15)—Is any sick among you, let him call for the elders of the church, and let them pray over him, anointing him with oil in the name of the Lord; and the prayer of faith shall save the sick, and the Lord shall raise him up; and, if he have committed sins, they shall be forgiven him.

REPLY.—Protestants, it is true, do not pretend to the gift of miraculously healing the sick, which is evidently what the Apostle is speaking of. No more do the Roman Catholic priests; for they administer their "extreme unction" without any hope of being able to "raise up" the sick man; and, indeed, only when they believe him to be past recovery.

But in the days of the Apostles there were many who had the gift of miraculously curing the sick; and among other sick persons thus cured there were, doubtless, some of those who had been afflicted with sickness as an extraordinary and special chastisement for certain sins.—See 1 Cor., v., 5, and xi., 3.

As for the so-called sacrament of unction, as practised in the Church of Rome, for the supposed benefit of the dying, there is no trace in Scripture of any such thing.*

OBJECTION 37.—Protestants deny that there is any grace given by the imposition, or laying on of the bishop's hands in holy orders.

Their Bible declares that there is, in the words of St. Paul to Timothy whom he had ordained (2 Tim. i. 6)—Stir up the gift of God which is in thee, by the putting on of my hands.

REPLY.—It is very strange that any writer should either be so ignorant himself, or should so calculate on the ignorance of his readers, as to put forth such a statement. Any Roman Catholic who may wish to know how much truth there is in it, has only to attend and witness the public ordination of ministers in any Protestant Church; or to read for himself the Ordination Service in the Prayer-book of the Church of England.

OBJECTION 38.—Protestants commonly teach that priests, and other religious persons that have vowed continency, may nevertheless marry, as Luther and the first reformers did; and that it is not damnable to them to break their faith given to God.

Their Bible tells them that to break such a vow, made to God, is sinful and damnable (Deut. xxiii., 21, 22, 23)—When thou shalt vow a vow unto the Lord thy God, thou shalt not be slack to pay it; for the Lord thy God will surely require it of thee, and it would be sin in thee. But, if thou shalt forbear to vow, it shall be no sin in thee. That which is gone out of thy lips, thou shalt keep and perform. And 1 Tim., v., 11, 12, where St. Paul, speaking of widows that are for marrying, after having made such a vow, says they have damnation, because they have cast off their first faith.

REPLY.—Whatever may be thought of the lawfulness or propriety of vows under the Christian dispensation, yet, probably, all persons, of whatever persuasion, will admit that a vow, contract, or engagement, of whatever kind, is not binding on a person who has been tricked into it by false representations, as to the very matter relating to that engagement.

If, for instance, some one is induced to promise to vote, or to act in a certain way, by being assured that such is the desire of his father, or some one else whom he highly venerates; and if he afterwards discovers, and can prove, that this assurance is false, and that the reverse is the fact, most people would allow that such a promise is not binding.

So, also, if any one has been brought up in ignorance of what Scripture contains, and in a belief of what is contrary to Scripture, and has been thus seduced into making some rash vow, and afterwards finds that he has been imposed on, and that it will be more conducive to his leading a Christian life to depart from that engagement than to keep to it, in such a case he ought not to be blamed for living such a kind of life as he may judge to be the most acceptable to God.

Suppose, for instance, a man had been brought up in the belief that celibacy is an eminent Christian virtue, and that he had never read Paul's warning against false teachers, "forbidding to marry;" and suppose he had been taught, either that the Apostle Peter was unmarried, or that he lived separate from his wife, and afterwards should have learned that he made her the companion of his travels, and that Paul claimed a right for himself and Barnabas to do the same, if they thought fit (1 Cor. ix. 5, 6); and that so far from prescribing celibacy to the clergy, Paul gives particular directions as to their wives: suppose any one had been deluded into taking a vow of celibacy by such false representations as the above, if, on having his eyes opened to the truth, he threw off that vow, the blame, whatever there might be in the whole transaction, would be entirely with those who had deceived him.

OBJECTION 39.—Protestants reprehend the Catholic Church for receiving none to Holy Orders but those that voluntarily embrace and promise a life of continency, that they may the more wholly devote themselves to the service of God, free from the distraction of a married life.

Their Bible, on the contrary, gives us to understand that this is highly commendable: because, he that is unmarried careth for the things that belong to the Lord, how he may please the Lord. But he that is married careth for the things that are of the world, how he may please his wife.—1 Cor. vii. 32, 33.

REPLY.—Whatever the Apostle does mean in this passage, it is, at least, quite clear what he does not mean. He certainly did not mean to forbid the clergy to marry, or to recommend them to make a vow of celibacy: else he would grossly contradict himself. For when he is writing to Timothy, and giving him very particular directions as to his choice of ministers, he is so far from charging him to select single men, or even to give them a preference, that he gives express directions respecting their wives and children.—See 1 Tim. iii. 2, 4, 11.

Much must depend on the kind of woman chosen for a wife. If every married man were sure to be drawn off by his wife from "caring for the things of the Lord," this would be a reason, not why the clergy alone, but why all Christians should remain single; for the Apostle is not speaking, in the passage before us, of the clergy, but of men in general. And when writing to Timothy he evidently supposes that a clergyman's wife may be, and ought to be, such a one as to prove a help rather than a hindrance in his Christian duties.

Much must depend, also, on the circumstances in which a man is placed. If he has reason to expect very fierce persecutions (as may, perhaps, have been the case with the Corinthians St. Paul was writing to), a wife and children would be likely to add to his "trouble in the flesh," which the Apostle was desirous to "spare them."—See 1 Cor. vii., 28.

And, again, if any one is about to undertake the task—as Paul and Barnabas did—of travelling from place to place to preach the Gospel, with a prospect of being frequently imprisoned, beaten, and stoned (see Acts xiv. 19) he would be wise to remain, as they did, unmarried.

If, for these, or any other good reasons, any man—clergyman or layman—is convinced that he can serve God better in a single life, for him it is plainly unnecessary that he should be bound by any prohibition or vow. And he will have this great advantage, that every one will understand his remaining single to be his own constant choice, and that he is not bound by some vow hastily made, and which, perhaps, he afterwards repents. Now, no Roman Catholic clergyman can be safe from suspicions of this kind; because it is known that, willingly or unwillingly, he must remain single. It is well known how much scandal has thence arisen.

And Protestants hold that it is "tempting God" to "put a yoke on men's necks," which it is plain the Apostle Paul never contemplated.

ON IMAGE WORSHIP AND MIRACLES.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

SIR,—As you have frequently professed, through the columns of your journal, the utmost willingness to correct any misstatements which you might advance, I need make no further apology for offering a few remarks on two of the most ridiculous and unfounded charges against the Roman Catholic religion, which form prominent topics for your discussion. If your object be to revile and sneer at the religion which I profess, it is an idle task to refute any slander you may think fit to promulgate: but if you wish to appeal to the understanding of sensible men on the principles of truth and reason, it seems to me most strange that any man, possessed with the smallest degree of either, should charge a large body of Christians, as enlightened and well educated as himself, with image worship, or any other species of idolatry, and who persists in the most sanctimonious manner in using arguments from Scripture, tradition, and reason, to dissuade them from practices which they as sanctimoniously disavow, repudiate, and abhor.

In a quotation of the November number of your journal of the conversation of the Tinnevelly gentleman, and in your letter, in the December journal, from a retired East Indian, you attempt to show a similarity between the Catholic respect for images and Brahmin worship. You will, probably, agree with me, that in the worship which the Greeks and Romans gave to the statues consecrated to their deities, they believed that the spirit of God dwelt in them, and that the Bramins have a similar belief. But what Roman Catholic was ever known to believe that any spirit dwelt within the Crucifixion, or the Image of the Blessed Virgin, or that these representations have any power beyond any other figures of wood or stone? So particular are we to prevent the most simple-minded from erring in this particular, that one of the first things which Roman Catholic children learn in their catechism is, that these pictures and images are not to be prayed to, as they have neither life nor sense. But, it may be asked, of what use are those images and pictures, and why keep them in our churches? I have an indistinct recollection of a sentiment addressed by Cicero to Cataline, which is apposite to this subject. He tells him that "he is surprised that whilst gazing on the pictures and statues of his ancestors within his house, he is not inspired with noble thoughts, in being reminded of their virtues." Surely, not less should the representation of our crucified Redeemer inspire us with love of him, and the memorials of our saints excite us to emulate their virtues. These representations preach in a language alike intelligible to all—the learned and unlearned, the simple and wise—they elevate the mind, and stimulate devotion. And how often to the expiring sinner, when the terror of death, and torture of disease, have bewildered his senses and overpowered his faculties, does the sight of the cross recall his recollection to the duties of religion, and bring his departing soul to resignation and trust in the crucified Redeemer? If your interpretation of the first clause of the commandment, "Thou shall not make unto thee any graven image, or likeness," is in itself idolatry, you have presented to us an array of deities outnumbering the Pagan mythology in your statues of the Wellingtons, Nelsons, Williams, Georges, and a host of deified other personages; but if it is not idolatry to bestow upon them this tribute of respect, or that the veneration which you display at the inauguration of their statues, or the obeisance which is made before the empty throne, or the national flag, is not image worship, then do I say, that to place in our churches the crucifixion, the image of the Blessed Virgin, the image of St. Francis Xavier, or of St. Vincent de Paul, is not idolatry, and that it is more rational, and more becoming to a Christian, to respect with this relative respect those who have served God than those who have served the world. Lest you might reject my explanation as not orthodox on Catholic doctrine, I shall quote for you the decision of the Council of Trent—"The images of Christ, of the Virgin Mother of God, and the other saints, are to be kept and retained, particularly in the churches, and due honour and veneration is to be paid to them. Not that we believe there is any divinity or power in them, or that anything is to be asked of them, or that trust is to be placed in them, as the heathens of old trusted in their idols.

The other matter is your extreme gullibility respecting miracles, strikingly illustrated by an anecdote from your East Indian correspondent, of his having seen at Tournay an image of the Blessed Virgin, of which the sextoness told him that it had been collecting the balls of the besiegers until it became black in the face. There is an old proverb that travellers hear and see strange things, and I have no doubt in the Griffin's having heard this strange story, and can fancy the laughter which this wag of a sextoness (who was probably a native of Kerry) has enjoyed at the amazement of "the poor ignorant haythen," to whom she related it, and for whose special edification she made it. There are, no doubt, many similar stories extant, some invented for joke, some for roguery, and some originating in the enthusiastic and overheated imagination of religious fanaticism; but these are not to be attributed to any religion or any section of mankind. We find instances of credulity and imposition in all ages, and in spiritual, as well as temporal matters; knaves praying upon fools; but as to the fact of miracles, you will admit, that the Lord has worked such wonders through the medium of his servants; and that whether we regard his mighty power in causing the waters of the Red Sea to arise at the command of Moses, and afterwards to burst with overwhelming force on the host of Pharaoh or making iron swim upon the stream at the well of Eliseus, nothing is mean or insignificant in Him. We have no reason to suppose that he has ceased in giving such proofs of His power or favour; or can we tell in what way, or by whose hands will miracles be wrought according to His will? Who hath known the mind of the Lord?" Whilst I utterly discard such absurd stories as the pretended miracles to which you refer, no matter how great the number of rogues or fools you name as a proof that they were believed in, yet am I willing to acknowledge the manifestation of God's power in all the ways he may think fit to display it; but I would require the proofs of miracles to be beyond all proofs that would satisfy me on natural occurrences; proofs that must remove every doubt as to the possibility of sense or reason being deceived, and that the miracle should be something worthy of Divine wisdom and beneficence.

On this subject of which I have written, I must conclude by admitting, that there are bad practices amongst ignorant and bad Catholics; and there are forged miracles amongst the wicked and the foolish. Such things were in the Church even in the time of the Apostles. But I do most firmly maintain that no such bad practices or forged miracles are countenanced by the Catholic Church, no more than they were countenanced by the Apostles.

SIDRACH.

We readily insert the letter of our correspondent. We could have wished, indeed, for his own sake, that he had abstained from the use of so many angry words; for we may safely appeal to the judgment of our readers, whether we have ever given insertion, since the commencement of our journal, to a single statement, the object of which was to "revile" or "slander" the faith of our Roman Catholic fellow-countrymen. But, leaving this charge to refute itself, we must express our regret that our correspondent has overlooked a request which we have frequently made, that in the letters addressed to us, only one subject should be discussed at a time. We often find considerable difficulty in giving insertion to communications which run to an undue length; and the two subjects which "Sidrach" has introduced in his letter are obviously of too great importance to be disposed of in a few cursory remarks. Notwithstanding this difficulty, however, we venture to make one or two observations on the letter of our correspondent.

And, in the first place, "Sidrach" has altogether misrepresented the opinions of the Greeks and Romans on the subject of image worship. The enlightened portion of the heathen world by no means believed that the spirit of the God dwelt in the image. They used the image to recall the idea of the Deity more vividly to their minds; and it is very remarkable that the arguments by which they defended the practice of image worship against the early Fathers and apologists for Christianity are precisely those which Roman Catholic writers now use. For example, in the writings of the Platonic philosopher, Maximus Tyrius, we find the following passage* :—"As spoken language has no need of letters, which were devised as helps for human weakness, that by the aid of these signs the words might be recalled to the memory, thus the nature of the gods in no wise stands in need of statues or images; but poor, weak human nature, being separated from the divinity as far as earth is from heaven, has invented these signs, upon which it bestows the divine names and appellations. Those whose memory is so strong that by a vigorous exertion of mind they can reach up to heaven and approach the divinity, have, perhaps, no need of images. But such men are rare, and you may perchance nowhere meet, even in a crowd, with a person always mindful of the deity, and who can dispense with the aid of images." Is not this, in substance, the very argument made use of by our correspondent?

"Sidrach" quotes, in support of his own views, the decree of the Council of Trent, which disavows any belief of a "divinity or power residing in the image itself." Well, the ancient heathen philosophers would have said the very same thing. "A man must be an arrant fool," said Celsus,† "who believes that the stone or the wood, or the gold, is itself a god, or that it is anything else than a mere statue dedicated to the God." But whatever the Council of Trent may say, we beg leave to doubt whether Roman Catholics do not sometimes believe that a divinity or power resides in some statues more than others. If images and pictures are merely to be used as helps to the memory and imagination, according to our correspondent's theory, one image ought to do as well as another; and there would be no sense in a man's making a pilgrimage to offer up his prayers to the winking image of the Virgin Mary at Rimini, or to the image in the Casa Santa at Loretto, when he could find just as good, and, perhaps, as faithful an image nearer home. It is a notorious fact, however, that the contrary doctrine is inculcated in Italy on the very highest ecclesiastical authority; and we cannot see on what grounds these pilgrimages to favourite shrines can be defended, except on the supposition that the material image or picture possesses some special virtue, which is denied to other similar objects. We would be glad to learn "Sidrach's" explanation of this seeming inconsistency.

Even if it were true, however, that the benefits which Images could bestow, in quickening our zeal and devotion, were a thousandfold greater than our correspondent represents, we consider that the plain prohibition of Scripture against any use of images in religious worship ought to be a conclusive argument against their adoption. "Sidrach," indeed, attempts to prove that Protestants act inconsistently in interpreting the commandment—

* Maximi Tyrii Diss. p. 80, Lond. 1740.

† Orig. contra Cels p. 375. Cant. 1668.

"Thou shalt not make unto thee any graven image"—strictly, while they violate it by erecting statues to eminent warriors and others; but this objection scarcely deserves a serious reply. The commandment must be taken as a whole; and the making of a graven image or likeness, which is forbidden in the first clause, is obviously limited by the words immediately following—namely, that it must not be done for the purposes of religious worship. Such is the view which the ancient Fathers uniformly take of the meaning of this commandment. In their arguments with the heathen philosophers they continually assert that the Almighty has condemned all use of images in religious worship as unlawful, whatever plausible reasons may be adduced in its support; and we cannot but lament the perversity which induces the Church of Rome, notwithstanding the plain declarations of both Scripture and primitive antiquity, to cling so pertinaciously to what we conceive to be a very dangerous error.

We have left ourselves space but for a word or two on the second subject in our correspondent's letter—namely, the miracles ascribed to Roman Catholic saints. "Sidrach" charges us with extreme gullibility, but we cannot see upon what grounds. Our East Indian correspondent stated two facts of which he was personally cognizant—namely, that there is a black image of the Virgin to be seen in a church at Tournay, and that the sextoness gave him a particular explanation of the origin of the phenomenon. We ask, what proof is this of gullibility? Our correspondent, we may confidently affirm, did not himself believe the story, nor did we. But "Sidrach," while declaiming loudly against knavery and credulity, does not explain why the priests of the Church of Rome allowed the black image to be erected in the Church of Tournay, unless they wished the people to believe the supposed miracle. The statue clearly could not have been placed there against their will; and unless they were illiterate, they could scarcely have imagined that the Virgin really had a black face. They either believed the miracle themselves, or they wished the people of Tournay to believe it; and in either case we fear that "Sidrach's" charges of knavery and credulity are but too truly applicable somewhere. We gladly concur with him in the very just remarks which he makes on the general character of miraculous interpositions, and the evidence by which they ought to be supported; but we shall hereafter, perhaps, take occasion to examine how far the principles which he so correctly lays down tend to establish or to refute some of the miracles which are sanctioned and acknowledged by the Church of Rome.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

SIR—In your January number, in the article on the "Touchstone," reply to objection 24, the following passage appears:—"And Roman Catholics themselves must maintain that the words of institution cannot be understood absolutely literally; since, if we understand these words in their most literal sense, we must believe that it is the cup, and not the wine in it, which is changed into blood." As you wish your correspondents to confine themselves to a single question in each letter, I shall in this confine myself to a few remarks upon the above passage, and shall not inquire into the truth or validity of the other arguments in the paper on the "Touchstone." It appears to me that, in your other reasons in reply to this objection, you can have but little confidence yourself, when you are compelled in aid of them to resort to such a reason as that contained in the passage I have quoted. In the first place, when you speak of Roman Catholics understanding "the words of institution" in a particular sense, you depart from the question in dispute. The question has no reference to "the words of institution," but to that part of those words which contains the assertion. Your proposition is that the assertion, "this is my blood" must be taken figuratively, because the word "this" relates to an antecedent which is used in a figurative sense. This is your argument put into plain language; and it is no less illogical than would be the general proposition that wherever the subject is a figurative expression, the predicate, or the thing predicated of it, cannot be taken in a literal, but must be taken in a figurative sense.

I will take, as an illustration, a passage from your Protestant version of the psalms:—"Mark the perfect man and behold the upright, for the end of that man is peace." The word "upright," in its primary and literal sense, signifies "straight;" but, like many other words, it has acquired a figurative sense when applied to other than sensible objects, which sense is as well known and as generally received as its primary sense, or perhaps more so. If you asked me whether I understood the words—"the end of that man is peace"—in a literal or a figurative sense, and I answered in a literal sense, you might or might not agree with me; but if I said, I can only understand them in a figurative sense, because if I took them in a literal sense I should also take the word "upright" in the same sense; and then it would follow that none but straight-backed men could hope for this promise of a peaceful end. If you did not laugh at my folly, you would, in your next number, assure your "respected correspondent" that he had been guilty of very bad logic. The word "cup," however, to express the liquor in the cup, is as well known in that sense as in its literal sense. When we say "the kettle boils," though we use a figurative expression, yet we use an expression as well understood as the expression "the water in the kettle boils;" and so, in the 22nd Psalm (Donay version), the words, "the chalice which inebriateth me," is as familiar in its meaning as if it had been said "the liquor in the chalice." Independent of this, there is nothing in the Gospel to show that the word "this," in the words of institution, relates to the cup at all; but, on the contrary, the context shows that the liquor, and not the cup, is spoken of and referred to. Thus, in St. Matt. xxvi. 27, it is said—"And taking the chalice, he gave thanks, and gave to them, saying, drink ye all of this." ἐξ ἁυτου, "out of this." Drink what? Plainly, what was in the cup. And then, v. 27, our Saviour continues—"For this is my blood of the New Testament," &c. What is this? Plainly, what he had spoken of immediately before; what was in the chalice, and what he calls in the next verse—"this fruit of the vine." So, in St. Mark xiv. 23, it is said—"And having taken the chalice, and given thanks, he gave it to them, and they all drank of it;" not of the cup taken literally, which would be nonsense; but of the wine (ἐξ ἁυτου, again), "from," or "out of it." Then follow the words—"And he said to them, This is my blood," &c. So far the word "this" may as well apply to one object as another; it does not, even grammatically, necessarily apply to the cup any more than its contents. There is, however, in Luke xxii. 20, the expression—"This is the chalice, the New Testament in my blood." Here the word "this" plainly relates to "chalice;" but unfortunately for your argument this chalice, taking it literally, is not asserted to be blood, but to be the testament in our Lord's blood. This is all that is to be found in the New Testament on this subject; and I, therefore, assert, that even in its literal sense, the cup or chalice is not asserted to be the blood. I also assert that the use of the name of a vessel to signify the thing contained in the vessel is so familiar in vulgar use, as to have, as it were, lost its figurative form in our minds, and that it cannot, therefore, be spoken of as a figurative expression, in the same manner as Protestants contend that the expression, "this is my blood," must be considered. And, lastly, I assert, that if the word "chalice" were ever so figurative, as here used, and if the word "this" ever so clearly applied to it, it would not follow that the rest of the sentence might not be read in its most literal sense; and that whether our Saviour spoke of the cup or the wine would be a matter of perfect indifference, so far as relates to the question, in what sense the assertion he makes of that object, be it the cup or be it the wine, is to be understood.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,
CATHOLICUS.

Our "respected correspondent," if we may venture to call him so without being taunted with the civility, has quite mistaken our meaning, in supposing that while we urge our friends and opponents to limit their communications to one subject at a time, we desire that they should confine themselves to a small part of a subject, or a single argument on one side or the other of any subject; on the contrary, we cordially desire that those who differ with us should come forward freely and manfully, and grapple with our arguments, and the whole of our arguments, upon every subject we discuss in our pages, and show us where we are in error, if we be so. We shall not be at all slow at admitting no error, either in matter of opinion or argument, if clear reasons be given us that it is an error. In the present case, our correspondent, "Catholicus," has not attempted to grapple with the main and important subject in question, whether our Blessed Lord spoke in a literal or in a figurative sense, when he said—"Take, eat; this is my body," and "This is my blood of the New Testament;" but merely criticizes an isolated argument, that "if we are to understand these words in the most literal sense, we must believe that it is the cup, and not the wine in it, which is changed into blood." "Catholicus" is right in trying this by the rules of common sense; and ought, in order to be consistent, to be equally ready to try the meaning of the words—"Take, eat; this is my body," by the rule of common sense.

We may readily admit (what seems to be the whole drift of his argument) that whatever may be the exact form of words used, if we are quite sure what will be understood by them by the persons addressed, that it is enough; and that must be the true sense, unless the contrary is distinctly stated. When we say "the kettle boils," every one understands us to mean, "the water." When we say, pointing to a map—"This is England, and this is France," no one understands us to mean that England is literally a sheet of paper. And when Jesus, who had a few hours before called himself a shepherd, and a door, and a vine, took bread, and blessed it, and brake it, and gave it to his disciples; and also took the cup, and gave it to them to drink; they certainly could not understand him to mean that he was holding his own body in his own hands, and asking them to drink out of the cup his own blood, which they knew was still in his living body unshed and not in the cup of wine. The natural sense of his words was the figurative; and if the Disciples were mistaken in so understanding him, of which there is no proof whatever, when and where is the mistake explained?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

SIR—A layman often runs the risk of bringing forward as a novelty some combination of facts and arguments that the theologian thinks too familiar to mention. If, however, the information be such as is but little known to the unlearned, then to give it an extended publicity may effect as much practical good as to discover it for the first time. I, therefore, venture to call your attention to a text incessantly paraded as a proof of most various doctrines, and to a commentary on it that is little known, at least among us laymen. I mean the verse, "Thou art Peter, and upon this rock I will build my Church, and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it."—Mat. xvi. 18.

The infallibility of the Church—meaning thereby its ecclesiastics—the infallibility of the Pope, and the necessity for adding the latter to the former, to produce an infallible resultant, are, by turns, proved by this isolated passage. It is quoted by the ignorant, who have no knowledge of Scripture but through such traditional quotations, and with more caution by the skilful controversialist. The Italian, who cannot see the Word of God, and learns his theology from the paintings, sculpture, and decorations of his temples, sees this verse written in gigantic letters of gold, some ten feet long, beneath the majestic dome of the fabric dedicated to the apostle whose successors it is supposed thus to exalt to superhuman power. In short, it meets one so often that it is natural to ask, not only what is its true meaning, but what is the interpretation given by the infallible interpreter, which all Roman Catholics are bound to accept as true. I do not profess to have discovered any such for the entire passage, though at some pains to do so; but I think there is one tolerably distinct upon the most important point—namely, What is the foundation on which the Church is built?

You, sir, may point out what has been said by the Fathers; my researches suffice to show that there is, at least, not that "unanimous consent" the Roman Catholic creed demands. The foundation is variously given—as St. Peter—as St. Peter with the Popes claiming as his successors—as our Lord himself—or as the confession of faith in Christ just made by St. Peter, and which called forth the expression. The second alone supplies Roman Catholics with any peculiar argument in their favour, and to the latter Protestants can offer no objection in point of doctrine, even if they do not quite agree in its correctness. Would it not be strange if this were the very interpretation that Roman Catholics are bound to adopt? I must believe it to be so, until some equally authoritative council shall rescind, or explain so as to annul, the following passage in the celebrated Council of Trent.* After noticing the propriety of opening their proceedings with a solemn confession of faith, it thus proceeds—"Wherefore it has thought good that the symbol of faith, which the Holy Roman Church makes use of, as being that principle wherein all who profess the faith of Christ must necessarily agree, and that firm and ONLY FOUNDATION against which the gates of hell shall never prevail,† be expressed in the very same words in which it is read in all the churches; which is as follows." Here is given the Creed, known as the Nicene, in the words given in the note,‡ and which every Protestant cordially believes, and will readily accept as the foundation of his faith and hopes, as well as of those believers, throughout all times and places, who form the Church to which he claims to belong. The language of the Council is distinct: the reference identifies its object. Those who assert the infallibility of the Council must yield to its decree. If they say I am mistaken in the meaning I put on it, let them point out how and why; I have as much right and capacity to explain its language as they, for in that they claim no infallible assistance. Who shall interpret the interpreters? But, in truth, there is no ambiguity; it is plainly stated, that the only foundation, † "Matt. xvi." The original edition has no marginal references whatsoever to texts of Scripture; but those printed since, under ecclesiastical sanction, have, though it is hardly requisite that so familiar a verse should be thus formally identified.

‡ "I believe in one God, the Father Almighty, maker of heaven and earth, of all things, visible and invisible; and in one Lord Jesus Christ, the only begotten Son of God; and born of the Father before all ages; God of God, light of light, very God of very God; begotten, not made, of one substance with the Father, by whom all things were made; who for us men, and for our salvation, came down from the heavens, and was incarnate by the Holy Ghost of the Virgin Mary, and was made man; crucified also for us under Pontius Pilate, he suffered and was buried; and he rose again on the third day, according to the Scriptures; and he ascended into heaven, sitteth at the right hand of the Father; and again will come with glory to judge the living and the dead; of whose kingdom there shall be no end; and in the Holy Ghost, the Lord and Giver of life, who proceedeth from the Father and Son; who with the Father and the Son together is worshipped and glorified; who spake by the prophets; and one Holy, Catholic, and Apostolic Church. I confess one baptism for the remission of sins; and I look for the resurrection of the dead, and the life of the world to come. Amen."

alluded to in that verse, on which Christ's Church is built, is the profession of faith in Christ, unclogged by any sectarian tenets, and such as every Protestant accepts; and it is, at least, insinuated, that the Church there referred to embraces "ALL who profess the faith of Christ." If so, why do bishops and Popes allow, day after day, a use to be made of this text, to their own exaltation, which they should know, if they would refer to the original archives of their doctrine, is a direct contradiction of their Church's teaching?

FONTIUM PETITOR.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

SIR—Having observed the kind manner in which you answer all communications like the following, I feel no hesitation in sending you this, hoping to find an answer in the columns of your CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

I remain, sir, your humble servant,

J. C.

Into what place did the soul of our Saviour descend immediately after death? David, speaking of Christ, says, "Thou wilt not leave my soul in hell;" and St. Peter, referring to this, says, "whom God hath raised up, having loosed the sorrows of hell, as it was impossible that he should be holden by it." The Creed and the 3rd Article of the Church of England also says, "He descended into hell." Is this understood as the hell of the damned? if so, where did the thief on the cross go, as Christ promised him he should be with him that day in paradise? If there is a third place called Hades, what souls are supposed to be there, or for what purpose? and if Christ went to a place where there were sorrows, what is the meaning of the words, "it is finished?"

A NOVICE.

We are happy to be able to answer our correspondent's question. He has been misled by the Douay translation, in the meaning of the passage which he quotes from St. Peter—"Whom God hath raised up, having loosed the sorrows of hell."—Acts ii. 24. The translation in the authorized version is the correct one—"having loosed the pains of death." The Greek is, λυσας τας ωδινας του θανατου. The words of the Psalm, quoted by St. Peter, in verses 27 and 31, are—εις ἁδου. No scholar will pretend to say that the word θανατου, in verse 24, and the word ἁδου in verses 27 and 31, should all be translated "hell," as in the Douay Bible. The Douay translation had some excuse, because they professed only to translate the Latin Bible, which has the word "infernus" in all these places; but it was the Greek, and not the Latin, that was written by the inspired Evangelist St. Luke. The note in the Douay Bible on verse 31 goes far to correct this mistake, for it thus explains—"having loosed the sorrows of hell"- viz., "having overcome the grievous pains of death, and all the power of hell." In former editions of the Douay Bible, the note on verse 27 stood thus—"As his soul suffered no pains in hell, so neither did his body take any corruption in the grave." Therefore it is clear that no question arises out of verse 24, or, as we believe, out of any other passage of Scripture, concerning Christ having gone "to a place where there were sorrows;" and there is no reason to doubt that the words "it is finished," did mean that the whole of what Christ had to suffer for the redemption of man was finished by his death on the cross.

In reference to the words which David spoke of Christ, "Thou wilt not leave my soul in hell," our correspondent asks—"Into what place did the soul of our Saviour descend immediately after death?" To this we answer, that the Greek word is "Hades;" and we learn from it no more than that word properly expresses. We must always keep in mind, in considering such questions, what St. Augustine observes—"The name of hell is variously put in Scripture, and is in many meanings, according as the sense of the things which are treated of doth require." The proper meaning of the Greek word is "the place which is unseen." The fathers often use it in this general sense for the world of spirits; that world which we cannot see. Thus Andreas Cæsariensis—"Death is the separation of the soul and body; but Hades is a place to us invisible or unseen and unknown, which receiveth our souls when they depart from hence."

We have not room for many more proofs, but there is one passage so appropriate that our correspondent may like to see it. St. Gregory Nyssen has recorded a conversation between him and Macrina, the sister of St. Basil, in which Gregory says—"Where is that name of Hades so much spoken of—which is so much treated of in our common conversation—so much in the writings both of the heathen and our own—into which all men think that the souls are translated from hence as into a certain receptacle? To which Macrina replies—"It appeareth that thou hast not given much heed to my speech, for when I spake of the translation of the soul from that which is seen, unto that which is invisible, I thought I had left nothing behind to be required of Hades. Neither doth that name, wherein souls are said to be, seem to signify any other thing, either in profane writers or in the Holy Scriptures, save only a removing into that which is invisible and unseen."—Greg. Nyssen, in Macriniis, oper. Tom. 3, p. 209. We believe this to be a perfectly correct explanation of the word. We are sure it does not necessarily express the hell of the damned. Our Saviour said to the thief on the cross—"This day shalt thou be with me in paradise." That paradise belongs to the unseen world, and is fitly called "Hades."

It may interest our correspondent and our readers to show them a more profitable view of Christ's going to Hades than controversy commonly suggests. There were numerous heretics in old times, who denied that Christ had a human soul. They said that the Son of God took the body of man, but not the soul of a man. If that were so, then Christ could not have experienced himself the temptations or the spiritual trials of man; for neither God nor the human body is capable of feeling those trials. This denial of Christ being perfect man, "of a reasonable soul, and human flesh subsisting," as well as perfect God, totally destroyed all foundation for the belief in our Saviour's fellow-feeling for us. St. Paul shows us the importance of this doctrine for our comfort and support, when he says—"Wherefore in all things it behoved him to be made like unto his brethren, that he might be a merciful and faithful High Priest in things pertaining to God, to make reconciliation for the sins of the people, for in that he himself hath suffered, being tempted, he is able to succour them that are tempted."—Hebrews ii. 17, 18. What a comfort to be able to say, in all our spiritual trials, as well as all our bodily infirmities, "I know that my Saviour can feel for this, for he felt it all himself!" But the heresy we speak of took away this comfort, for if the man Christ Jesus had not a human soul, he could never have felt the temptations or the trials of the soul. Of course, temptation never led him to sin, but he felt what temptation is; but his soul alone could feel this. Against this heresy the Fathers always argued from this text—"Thou wilt not leave my soul in hell." If Christ went to the place of departed souls, it must have been his soul that went there. Christ is therefore perfect man—"In all things made like unto his brethren." We know then that he can feel for our spiritual trials and that he knows how to succour them. May we learn practically this lesson from his departure to Hades, and it will be more to our real comfort than all our vain inquiries and guesses about the exact particulars of the place he went to.

Notes and Queries.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

SIR—I am anxious to learn by whom the celibacy of the clergy was ordained. Was it by Christ, or by his Apostles, or the Church in after times? Is it the law of God or of men? And what does the Church of Rome say in answer to this question?

I have asked several persons likely to know, and some priests of the Church of Rome; and I cannot get a satisfactory answer. And without an answer to this question I cannot make up my mind on the subject. I have thought that you, perhaps, may be able to give me an answer.

Yours, &c.,

AN INQUIRER.

If some of our Roman Catholic correspondents will give us an answer, as to what their Church holds on this subject, we shall be happy to publish it in our next number.

FARM OPERATIONS FOR FEBRUARY.

(From the Irish Farmers' Gazette.)

Wheat Sowing.—From the extreme wetness of the past season wheat sowing will, in all probability, form the principal operation of this month in the wheat growing districts. Such lands as have been prepared for sowing wheat some months since, and have remained unsown from the wetness of the season, will now require the additional preparation of a good harrowing, as soon as it is dry enough, and will be most appropriately sown under the plough, giving about a three inch furrow. If the land be at all inclined to wet, it will be best to plough it in ridges; but if sufficiently dry, may be ploughed into wide sets: or if intended for laying down with grass and clover seeds, may be ribbed up at 18 inch intervals, sown broadcast, and then harrowed down lengthways with a short-tined harrow. In harrowing the land to be sown under the plough, no more should be harrowed than can be sown and ploughed in the same day, lest rain should come on, when the land would not dry so soon after as if it remained rough. The same rule applies to land to be ribbed, as no more should be harrowed than can be ribbed in a day. We lately gave some general hints as to the kinds most suitable for sowing at this season, to which we may add, that the better the land is prepared the less the quantity of seed that will be necessary, as the depth of cover will be more equal and regular: whereas when the land is roughly and slovenly prepared, a greater quantity of seed will be required, from the quantity likely to be covered so deep as to preclude any chance of its vegetating. The weight per acre, also, must be regulated by the size of the grain, as it will take more of a large-sized grain than a small-sized one, the smaller, provided it be well formed, plump, and sound, making the best according to its variety. Wheat, when sown early in the season, may be sown thin in kind, rich soils, as it stools or tillers abundantly and equally: but as the season advances the quantity of seed should be increased, to prevent tillering, which would then, if encouraged, be unequal in time and growth, and ripen unevenly, some heads being ripe, while others from the same stool would be green. Lime from 30 to 40 barrels, with salt from a half to one ton per Irish acre, or two to four cwt. guano, spread evenly and harrowed in along with the seed, if there should be a doubt of the land being sufficiently rich, will materially assist in producing a good crop, and bring it early to maturity.

Beans should be sown as early as possible in the month, provided the land has been previously well prepared and manured. Drilling at from 2½ to 3 feet intervals, the seed being dropped 4 inches apart, is much the best practice, as it gives sufficient room for horse and hand hoeing. If the land has not been manured in the autumn, a speedy mode of getting in the crop may be put in operation by putting out the manure in equidistant heaps and rows; and as the land is ploughed drop the beans in every third furrow, covering them with the dung: or the dung may be put in first, and the beans on top; the next furrow covers all; the rows will then stand at about 27 inches apart. Beans may also be sown broadcast in well-manured and well-prepared land, and harrowed in The produce is generally excellent; but the land should be clean, as there will be no opportunity for cleaning it while occupied by the crop. The Russian bean is hardy and productive; but the following kinds may be relied on for sowing at this season:—The Heligoland, tick, or Egyptian, for cattle; and the early Mazagan, or long pod, for human use. It will take from 3½ to 4 bushels, according to size, to sow an Irish acre broadcast, or 2 bushels sown in drills. A strong, deep loam is best for beans; and if well manured they make an excellent preparatory crop for wheat.

Peas, if required early, may be sown now: but if not, it may be profitably put off till the end of the month. This crop succeeds best on a lighter and drier soil than beans; and unless the land be very poor, there is no manure required, as, if rich, the crop runs too much to haulm, and will be tardy in podding and late in ripening. They may be sown broadcast, or in drills, at 15 to 18 inch intervals, to allow of hoeing in the early part of the season; but they soon cover the ground, which precludes the possibility of going through them. A few beans may be appropriately mixed with the seed; they serve to support the peas, and keep them off the ground, and when thrashed the beans are easily separated from the peas by a suitable riddle.

Oats.—Black oats may be sown about the middle of the month; but the white varieties are best sown about the beginning of next month.

Parsnips may be sown any time during the month, in previously well-prepared, rich, and deep soils. The land intended for this crop should have been deeply tilled, cleaned, and well manured in the autumn; but if the manuring be put off till the spring, the manure to be applied then should be well decomposed, and intimately mixed with the soil. Sow in drills 28 inches apart, the plants to be afterwards thinned out, that they may not stand nearer than nine inches apart. The varieties most generally sown are the common and the Jersey hollow-crowned. We saw a variety shown, a few years back, at the Royal Horticultural Society's show, called the turnip-rooted which seemed very well adapted for shallow soils; but we have lost sight of it for some time. Though parsnips may be sown now with great advantage, we do not recommend the general crop to be sown, but a limited portion. The sowing of the general crop will be best made early next month.

Fatting Pigs should be well and sufficiently supplied with steamed or boiled turnips, mangels, sugar-beet, parsnips, or carrots. They will thrive on all the above roots, either raw or boiled, except the turnips, which should be cooked; but to produce good pork and bacon, they should also get bean, pea, barley, or oaten meal with the roots. Their troughs should be cleaned out as soon as done feeding, and the refuse given the young and store pigs. All should have free access to fresh water.

Fatting Calves and House-fed Lambs require great care and attention, and should have abundance of good cow's milk, with good, dry, and warm lodging and clean beds. To prevent the milk congulating in the stomach, they should have some chalk and common salt beat up and kneaded together, let to dry, and laid in lumps in their troughs.

Odds and Ends.—Proceed with the draining and subsoiling in hands, to completion, as preparation for and getting in the crops will now require undivided attention. Look to the mouths of the drains, and clear away all stoppages, and remedy and repair all defects. Increase your manure and compost heaps by every means within your power; purchase and carry home the quantity of artificial manures necessary for the season, so as to have them in store when required. Turn over, mix, and pulverize compost heaps. Keep the store stock well supplied with fresh-thrashed, sound straw and turnips; and scour drains, ditches, and water-courses.

WHAT IS A BIGOT?

Those of our readers who take much interest in the great religious controversy which is now carried on in almost every part of Ireland, cannot fail to have noticed in how many cases hard words and hard names are made to take the place of fair and candid arguments. It is unfortunate for the cause of truth that controversy in general, and especially religious controversy, should have such a tendency to excite men's passions and to kindle the flames of angry prejudices in their minds. It is not our present business to inquire into the causes which produce this melancholy result; we merely advert to the fact as one which is not peculiar to our own age or country, but which has existed from the very earliest times. The apostles themselves experienced its ill effects, when their adversaries taunted them as persons "who had turned the world upside down" (Acts xvii. 6); and the orator Tertullus, when accusing St. Paul before the Roman governor, in a grave public trial, could find no more gentle or courteous terms by which to describe him, than that "he was a pestilent fellow, and a mover of sedition throughout all the world, and a ringleader of the sect of the Nazarenes."—Acts xxiv. 5. If the first teachers of the Gospel experienced such contumelious treatment, we need not marvel if those who in our own day attempt to stir up men's minds on the subject of religion meet with the like fate.

Among the harsh terms which are used in the present day, in religious controversy, there is scarcely any epithet which men are more ready to cast against their adversaries than that of bigotry. Nothing is more common than to hear it said—"Oh, such a man is an obstinate, narrow-minded bigot; no person of sense will mind what he says." It often happens that neither the individual who makes the charge nor they who hear it have any clear notion of the real meaning of the word. It is sufficient that both parties are aware that bigotry is a term of reproach, which is all the more effective for being ambiguous, inasmuch as each person can attach to it whatever unfavourable idea he pleases; and thus hostile prejudices are often excited, without any real or substantial grounds.

It may be useful, therefore, both for those who may be tempted to apply this term of reproach to their opponents, and for those who occasionally hear it used against themselves, to consider what is really meant by the term, and to what class of persons it may justly be applied. We do not wish to engage our readers in any antiquarian discussion as to the first origin of the term.* We are content to take its meaning as we find it laid down by Dr. Johnson, who is the highest authority in this matter. He defines bigotry to be "prejudice; unreasonable warmth in favour of party opinions;" and a bigoted man, according to the same author, is one who is "blindly prepossessed in favour of something; irrationally zealous." Bigotry, it is evident from this, is not warmth and zeal in anything; or rather zeal, and warmth, and prepossession are not bigotry; but unreasonable warmth, blind prepossession, irrational zeal, are bigotry; and those only are bigots to whose conduct such epithets can justly be ascribed.

As far as we ourselves are concerned, we shall not seek to disavow either warmth, or zeal, or prepossession. We confess that our minds were long prepossessed in favour of certain important truths before we entered upon the discussions which we have laid before our readers in the pages of this journal. We were prepossessed by a conviction that the Word of God is true; and that any creed or system of opinions which is not in accordance with this Word, and, much more, any system which is contrary to it, is fraught with very great danger to the souls of those who embrace it. This, however, is not bigotry, because it is not blind prepossession. The Bible proves itself to be the Word of God, and there can be nothing more reasonable than to believe that whatsoever is not in accordance with that Word cannot have come from God, for He cannot contradict himself. Neither are we anxious to acquit ourselves of the charge of zeal; for we have learned from St. Paul "to be zealous for that which is good in a good thing always."—Galat. iv. 18. We are zealous that our fellow-countrymen should be set free from the bondage of error and prejudice, and be brought to the knowledge of the truth; but such zeal is not bigotry, inasmuch as it is not irrational. We must further plead guilty to the charge of occasional warmth; but this is not bigotry, unless it be excessive and unreasonable. It would ill become us to say that we are entirely free from prejudice; but we think it would be unfair to bring such a charge against us, unless it can be shown that we have advanced some opinion for which we cannot give a satisfactory reason. As for party opinions, if the phrase is meant for principles founded on the Word of God, we do not disavow being prepossessed in favour of them. In matters of religion, there are, properly speaking, only two parties in the world; and we hope we shall always be found ready to advocate the opinions, or rather the principles, of that party which is on the side of real Christianity; but this is not bigotry, unless it be done with unreasonable warmth and unfair appeals to party prejudices.

Having thus endeavoured to defend ourselves, perhaps needlessly, from the charge of bigotry, it now remains for us to point out the class of persons to whom this term may justly and fairly be applied. That man, then, is a bigot, whose persuasion of the truth of his religion is founded upon prejudice, not upon evidence; who is blindly prepossessed in favour of it, and irrationally zealous in its support and propagation. That man is a bigot, who, without reasoning or inquiry, believes all that his Church teaches, and holds it undoubted that whatever is not taught by his Church must be heresy. Such conduct would be reasonable if it were the result of inquiry and rational conviction; but the man who is prepared to believe anything and everything that he is taught by his religious instructors would be a Mohammedan in Turkey, or a Buddhist in Hindostan, upon exactly the same grounds that he is a Roman Catholic in Italy or Ireland.

We are convinced that the cause of truth will always stand the test of fair and candid inquiry, and that blind prepossessions and prejudices, such as we have described, are no part of true religion. We are far from asserting that such prejudices are to be found only on one side. We believe that there are bigoted Protestants as well as bigoted Roman Catholics. We know that on both sides are to be found men of narrow minds and prejudiced understandings—hasty in forming an unfavourable opinion of their opponents, and prone to condemn without inquiry. We, for our part, are resolved, to the best of our ability, not to imitate such conduct. One of our chief motives in originating this journal was, because we believed that free discussion must lead to more enlarged and liberal views, and would tend to dispel many of the false notions which each party is so ready to take up respecting those of the opposite side. We are deeply persuaded that all Christians, whatever may be the Church to which they belong, ought to bear in mind and to act upon the solemn injunction of the Apostle Peter, "to be ready always to satisfy every one that asketh them a reason of the hope which is in them"—1 Pet. iii. 15. In order that a man may be able to give a reason to others, however, it is evident that his own mind must be first enlightened as to the grounds of his religious belief. He ought to avail himself of every opportunity of becoming acquainted with the arguments in support of the doctrines which he professes to hold; and, on the other hand, he ought to be slow to condemn those who differ from him, unless he is first satisfied of the unsoundness of their views. And if, upon examination and careful inquiry, he becomes persuaded that others entertain erroneous opinions, it is his duty, not to censure them uncharitably, or to join in any acts of persecution against them, but rather to win them over by fair argument and kindly persuasion. The man who thus acts, whatever be his creed, will be sure to gain the respect and esteem even of his opponents: but the narrow-minded partisan, whose judgment is warped by prejudice, and who is opposed to full and free discussion, who forms his own opinions blindly, and condemns others without inquiry, is a bigot, and a foe to the cause of truth.

It may at first sight appear a very strange phenomenon, that many persons who exhibit great credulity themselves, and who take up their religious belief, as it were, upon trust, are sometimes very angry when other persons venture to adopt opinions different from theirs. It seems a curious anomaly, that a man who has bestowed little or no industry upon the business of seeking truth for himself, should suddenly become indignant when he sees his neighbour anxiously inquiring where that precious treasure may be found; and that he should be too often ready either to persecute him for so doing, or else to ascribe his conduct to base and interested motives. Such occurrences are, unfortunately, but too common in our own country; and we believe that, in many cases, the real motive of such conduct is this. A man whose religious belief is founded on rational inquiry, who has himself examined the reasons for his faith, and perceived them to be solid and well-grounded, can afford to stand alone. Not so, however, the individual whose creed is based on prejudice and blind credulity. His mind having no solid foundation on which to repose itself, and being devoid of a rational conviction of the truth of his creed, he naturally looks out for a numerous companionship in the faith which he professes. His belief, and the comfort of his belief, mount with the tens, and hundreds, and thousands, that are seen to be travelling along the same road with himself; and thus it naturally comes to pass, that as his faith depends upon the faith of others, his doubts, too, are in their power. If his friends or neighbours waver in their religious belief, or if they change it altogether, a rude shock is given to his own inward peace of mind. It is not so much that his convictions are assailed, and his pride and self-love irritated by their opposition, but it is because something is withdrawn from the internal warmth and comfort of his soul, so that he can no longer feel as tranquil as before. He is unwilling, perhaps, to acknowledge, even to his own mind, that his neighbour's change of opinion has robbed him of any part of his own assurance of the truth of his creed; but yet, nevertheless, his feelings are the same as if he had been despoiled of that precious possession; and these feelings prompt him to resent the injury, and to visit it upon the unoffending cause.

Credulity, therefore, and bigotry go hand in hand; and when they are combined, as in the case we have just described, they too often break out into bitter persecution and open violence. The true, and, indeed, almost the only remedy for such evils, is to be found in an enlarged spirit of fair and dispassionate inquiry, which, in proportion as it enlightens the mind of him who seeks for the truth, will, at the same time, teach him forbearance and moderation towards others. The doubts and difficulties of the young student in geometry cause no

* It may amuse some of our readers to be told that the name bigot is a very ancient one, and that the person who gave occasion for its use is said to have been Rollo, the first Duke of Normandy. (Vide Stephan. Paschasium. Disquisit. Francic., lib. 8., c. 2; et Chronic. Historiæ Franc. de Rollone, primo Normannorum duce)—"Ille non est dignatus pedem Caroli osculari, sibi ad os suum levaret. Cumque sui Comites illum admonerent, ut pedem Regis in acceptione tanti muneris (Neustriæ provinciæ) oscularetur, lingua Anglicâ respondit, Ne se bigot, quod interpretatur, Ne per Deum. Rex verò et sui illum deridentes et sermonem ejus corruptè referentes, illum vocaverunt Bigoth unde Normanni adhuc Bigothi vocantur."

uncertainty in the mind of the profound mathematician. His convictions are too deep and solid to be so disturbed: but yet he can sympathize with those who feel such doubts, because they remind him of his own past experience. On the other hand, the man who is blindly credulous, and who believes or disbelieves without inquiry, knows nothing of scruples or difficulties, and has no fellow feeling for others who may be searching for truth. He cannot understand why every one does not exactly coincide in opinion with himself; and the first show of opposition to his views only makes him obstinate and angry. When two narrow-minded disputants of this latter kind come together, instead of discussing their differences in a calm and Christian spirit, they would be ready, perhaps, like the two bishops at the Council of Trent,* to pull one another's beards, were it not that, unfortunately, the daily use of razors now leaves men no beards to pull.

We have seen that bigotry has been described as "a blind prepossession" in favour of some peculiar opinions. One of the most common ways in which it exhibits itself is, when a man is induced, from some cause or other, to attach himself to some one individual, and to adopt all his views without inquiry. It is thus that party leaders acquire an ascendancy over their followers, which enables them to twist and turn them so as to advance their own interests, utterly regardless of the welfare of their misguided adherents. It is, doubtless, a far easier plan to adopt blindly the opinions of others than to be at the trouble of forming them for ourselves; but we need scarcely remark, that it is sometimes a very dangerous plan, especially when we fall into the hands of those who have any pecuniary or other interest in misleading us. Religion is a subject of such deep and momentous importance, that, if we value it aright, we ought to study it for ourselves, and not allow our creed to depend upon the word of any man, or any set of men.

We cannot, even if we would, divest ourselves of the duty of inquiry where religious truth is concerned; and if we really wish to be set free from the bondage of bigotry and prejudice, if we seek to arrive at truth, and to attain some solid resting-place, on which we can safely take our stand, for time and eternity, there is no better or surer path for us to follow than that marked out for us by the Apostle Paul (1 Thess. v. 21)—"Prove all things; hold fast that which is good."

THE FAIR OF LOUGHMANAGH.

I SUPPOSE that everybody knows that the great fair of Loughmanagh, in the county of Westmeath, is held every Valentine's day. There was a capital fair last month; I don't know when there was a better show of beasts, and very good prices they fetched. Pat Murray, that some of you may have heard of, was there selling cattle for his master; and a very good job he made of it, and he had a good bundle of bank notes in his pocket with him when he was going home in the evening. Mike Dolan walked home with him, for he had been at the fair, too, where he had laid out his money on a little slip of a pig that he was driving home before him. The two men were very good friends, and they had a pleasant walk together (Pat in great spirits at the bargain he had made) until they got about half way home, when, just after you cross the bridge, and a little before you come to Cassidy's public house, who should they meet but Brian Shaughnessy, the big beggarman. I don't think either of them were glad to meet him, for there was never a more lazy, good-for-nothing scoundrel than that same Shaughnessy: every penny he could get went for whisky, and it was not his own money that paid for it either, but he had such a tongue that there was not one that liked to provoke him or that would not rather any day give him a trifle than stand the abuse he would give if they refused him. So when he and the boys had saluted each other,

"I'll walk back with you," says he, "to Cassidy's and you'll treat me, and give me some money to take with me, for you must have plenty of it after the fair."

"Indeed, then," says Pat Murray, "I'll not stop at Cassidy's or any where else, for its growing dark, and I don't want to be out late these winter evenings with money in my pocket."

Mike Dolan made some exense, too, for not stopping; but Shaughnessy was not to be put off, and says he, "I don't mind if you can't stop; but at any rate you'll just give me half-a-crown between you, for it's well you can afford it, and I'll leave you my blessing."

"Why, then, Brian," says Mike Dolan, "I am very sorry, and I'd give it to you with all my heart if I had it, but I laid out the last penny I had with me on this little pig here, and I have not got a cross now to bless myself with."

"Well," says Brian, "Pat, you can't put me off that way, for I heard from all the neighbours I met how well you did at the fair; and I know you have your pocket full of money, if you have the heart to give a poor man some."

"Sure, then," says Pat, "you must know very well that what I sold the beasts for is not my money, but my master's. I have not got any money of my own with me, and you would not have me take the master's money and give it to you."

"Troth, then, would I," said Brian, "he is rich enough not to miss it; and how does he know what you sold the beasts for? and it's little sin to take it from the likes of him, and give it to a poor man like me."

So says Pat Murray, "You may say what you like, but you will not make it out to be anything but robbery, if I was to take the master's money and make a present of it to you. I may be as charitable as I like with my own money, but I have no right to be charitable with other people's. But I'll tell you what's more, Brian Shaughnessy," says he, "if the money was my own I would not give you one penny of it. I am a struggling man, with a wife and five small children to support, and I don't think it would be any charity to take the bread out of their mouths and give it to you, that's as well able to work as I am, but that never does a hand's turn, and would spend anything I gave you drinking at Cassidy's."

With that Brian was very angry, as you may suppose, and very bad words he gave. Mike Dolan became terribly frightened—

"For the love of heaven, Pat," whispered he, "give him what he asks, and don't bring his curse on you and the children." But Pat only answered stouter and stouter; and the end of it was, that Brian Shaughnessy went down on his knees in the middle of the road, and put such fearful curses on Pat Murray and all his seed and generation, that it would make your hair stand on end to listen to him.

"O Pat Murray, Pat Murray," said Mike Dolan when they walked on; "the saints between us and harm; but why would not ye take my advice and give him what he asked? I would not for a thousand pound be in your skin this blessed night, after the curses he put on you. It would be better for you to run after him now and make it up with him, and get him to take them off."

"I'll do no such thing, then," said Pat; "what should I be afraid of him for? Is it because I would not rob the master's money, and give it to a good-for-nothing scoundrel like him? Do you think his prayers have such influence with the Almighty, that the Lord would punish me for not breaking one of his own commands because he bids me? If his prayers have so much effect as all that comes to, why does not he pray himself a good coat on his back and plenty of money in his pockets, and then he would have no need to tempt an honest man to do a wrong thing for his benefit?"

"Ah, then, Pat," said Mike Dolan, "that's no way for you to talk. You ought to know as well as I do, that many a one has suffered from the curse of people that were never able to pray much good for themselves or anybody else."

"Why, then," says Pat, "you'll never persuade me to that—you'll never make me believe that the Lord is more willing to do harm than to do good; or that if a man can't pray himself out of poverty, he can pray other people into it."

"Well, but," said Mike, "what do you say to poor Norah Callaghan, that this same Brian Shaughnessy cursed? I know that she was recovering from her confinement when he begged at her house, and I don't know what made her refuse him; but refuse him she did, and give him cross words besides; and he gave her such a curse that she went back to her bed, and never rose up from it again alive."

"Why, I say," says Pat, "that it's no wonder. She is not the first person a fright has killed. I could tell you stranger stories than that, that I heard from Thady Byrne, the pensioner, of things he saw when he was in the West Indies. He told me that the blacks there have got what they call Obeah men; and when one of these puts his curse upon one of them, the poor fellow sickens and pines, and he never will tell who has cursed him; and if nothing is done at last he dies; and sometimes whole scores of them die this way by one of these Obeah men; but if the master can find the fellow out, and give him a sound flogging, all the sick fellows recover at once."

"The Lord only knows," says Mike, "what power wicked spirits have; and I don't doubt but, as you say, God can't be more ready to hear prayers for evil than for good; but maybe the devil hears the curse and brings it to pass."

"So, then," says Pat, "you want me to be afraid lest the devil should bring Brian Shaughnessy's curses on me. Now, I tell you that I don't doubt that the devil would be well pleased enough if Brian Shaughnessy could tempt me to wrong my master; and I don't doubt, too, but that the devil would be willing enough to hurt me, whether Brian Shaughnessy tells him or no; but while I try to obey God, I am not afraid of man or devil hurting me beyond what he permits them. And I think I might as well say my prayers to the devil at once as let Brian Shaughnessy make interest for me with him not to hurt me; or as well as do a wrong thing, lest he should persuade him to do me a mischief. Believe my words, Mike Dolan, Brian Shaughnessy can't put any one in the devil's power but himself; his wicked words can't harm those that are in God Almighty's keeping; and if a curse puts any one in the devil's power, it is those who speak it. I'll show you," says he, "out of the Psalms who it is that cursing harms;" and he pulls a book out of his pocket, and he reads this verse which describes the punishment of him that took pleasure in cursing his neighbour—"As he loved cursing so let it come to him: as he delighted not in blessing, so let it be far from him. As he clothed himself with cursing like as with his garment, so let it come into his bowels like water, and like oil into his bones."—Psalm cviii. 18.

So when he had read these words, Mike Dolan stopped short, and "Pat," said he, "what book is that you are reading these words out of?"

"What book should it be," said Pat, "but God's own book? sure it's the Bible."

"The Bible!" says Mike, lifting up his hands; "O Pat, Pat, sure it's not Bible reader you are turned. Did not you hear what Father Sheehy threatened from the altar against all those that would read that book? It's well known it makes all those heresies that read it; and, then, Father Sheehy will curse you from the altar with bell, book, and candle, and what will become of you then, here and hereafter?"

"Why," says Pat, "I hope, with God's blessing, I may survive Father Sheehy's curse as well as Brian Shaughnessy's."

"What!" says Mike, "are you going to even the curse of a fellow like Brian Shaughnessy with the curse of a priest of the Church? Though I don't read the Bible, I've heard how the prophets of old could call down fire from heaven on those that would not obey them, and how the apostles, too, could punish those that despised them, and I know God is with his Church still, and that a priest's curse is sure to be heard."

"Well," says Pat, "I do read the Bible, and I can tell you that you are very much mistaken if you think that either prophets or apostles cursed out of their own heads; they could do no more than foretell the good or the evil which God was about to bring on those who loved him, or on those who despised him; but they could not make any harm happen to any one against God's will. And if you'll attend to me, I'll read for you the story of the Prophet Balaam, which is told in the 22nd of Numbers. You must know that there was one Balak, King of Moab, who was an enemy of the Jews in those days, and he had often heard of the Prophet Balaam, and he knew that good or evil had often followed according as he had blessed or cursed. 'I know,' said he to Balaam, 'that he whom thou blessed is blessed, and he whom thou cursest is cursed.' So you must know, Mike, that Balak thought the prophet put on his curses all out of his own head, and that he could curse any one he liked, and that, if he could get him to curse his enemies, the Jews, it would be all over with them; and he offered to pay Balaam well for doing the job. Balaam, though he was a prophet, was not a good man, and well pleased enough he would be to earn the king's money; but he knew better than to think that he could curse any one if God did not bid him; and he knew very well, too, that if he did curse, it was himself and not the Jews that would suffer by it. So, though he was longing for the money, he did not dare to give the curse. 'How shall I curse,' said he, 'those whom God has not cursed?' and at last, says he—'If Balak would give me his house full of silver and gold, I cannot go beyond the word of the Lord my God, to do less or more.' That's the story, Mike, of the way the prophets had the power of cursing; and as for the apostles, I know that St. Peter was able to strike Ananias and Sapphira dead when they lied unto the Holy Ghost; but I know, too, that the apostles never thought they might curse any one they liked out of their own heads. Many a beating St. Peter and St. Paul got, and many a time they were shut up in prison, and they never once ventured to put their curse on those that ill-used them. But," says Pat, "I'll believe that Father Sheehy has the power of cursing, like the apostles, when I see him work miracles as they did. Let him cure the lame, and make the blind see, and raise the dead, and then, if we see that God hears his prayers for good, we will have cause to be frightened when he prays us harm."

"O Pat, Pat," said Mike, "I am afeard you are in a bad way, hardening yourself that way; there is no knowing what the priest might do to you."

"Well," says Pat, "I often heard say that he could turn a boy into a hare, but I tell you now, and I'd say it to Father Sheehy himself, this minute, here I am now, and you may turn me into a hare, or a rabbit, or a cow, or any other beast you like, if you can. Somehow or other, Mike, I don't think he'd do it when it came to that; and if the priest can make cows as easy as all that, suppose, instead of turning good Christians into cows, he was to turn the rats and mice into them, he might stock his farms then without going to the fair of Loughmanagh, or without troubling us much about dues either."

*Lest our readers should suppose that this is a calumny of some bigoted Protestant historian, we here present them with the words of the orthodox Cardinal Pallavicini, who certainly would not needlessly say anything to the discredit of the venerable men who composed the Council—"Tum verò Cæsenis, ut mos est iracundiâ percitis, exarsit in utrumque longè perniciosiorem ultori ipsâ injuriâ quam ultum ibat. Nam in Chironensis barbam injectâ manu, multos excâ pilos avulsit, et confestim abscessit."—(Vide Pallav. Hist., Conc. Trid. Tom. i. p. 377, Aug. Vin. 1775.) We pity the poor bishop who thus lost a handful of hairs out of his beard; and we could almost fancy that, when Dr. Johnson defined bigotry to mean "unreasonable warmth in favour of party opinions," he had these venerable combatants in his eye. It may be deemed, perhaps, some excuse for their quarrel, that the point to dispute related to the abstruse doctrine of original sin! Notwithstanding these bitter internal dissensions, however, the Council of Trent, claiming to act under the inspiration of the Holy Spirit, boldly pronounced their usual anathema upon all who presumed to differ from the decree at which they finally arrived!

"You may say what you like, Pat," says Mike, "but I could tell you of people that were cursed by the priest and never throve after it."

"I dare say you could," replied Pat; "and you told me just now of Norah Callaghan dying of Brian Shaughnessy's curse. I dare say a curse is mischievous enough to those that are fools enough to be frightened at it; but I'd like him to try his curse on dumb animals, that have not imagination enough to take fright at it. Sure I'll take Father Sheehy up a cage full of rats, and he may curse them his best, and then, if we see that the rats are the worse of it, we shall know that a priest's curse can do some harm. And I heard the master say that only a couple of hundred years ago the priests used to curse the caterpillars, and all the other troublesome animals in their districts, though they don't do it now, more's the pity; I wish they could curse the fly out of the turnips."*

"Then," says Mike, "Pat, I suppose the whole of it is that you do not believe the Saviour left any commission to the priests to curse his enemies."

"Ay, that's just where it is," says Pat; "if I do not mind Father Sheehy's curse, it's not that I think it could do me no harm. Sure I have heard him tell us to call names after people, and throw stones at them, and not to deal with them; and if he was to do that to me, to be sure I'd be the worse of it; but the more I think of it, the more I am convinced that this was not the commission our Lord left his Apostles. Sure I have searched all the New Testament to find where our Saviour told them to curse their enemies—and there's not a word of it in the whole book; quite the contrary—he tells them to love their enemies, and to pray for them that spitefully used them and persecuted them. And St. Peter, that we all ought to mind, told his people never to curse even those that cursed them. Says he, we should follow the example of the Lord, that, when he was reviled, reviled not again; when he suffered, he threatened not. You are not, says he, to render railing for railing, but contrariwise blessing: for he that will love life, and see good days, let him refrain his tongue from evil, and his lips that they speak no guile."—1 Pet. ii. 23; iii. 9.

"Sure," says Mike, "it's a power of Scripture, Pat, ye have got; but I suppose this was only the laity St. Peter told not to curse: but the clergy were to keep this to themselves."

"Not at all, Mike," says Pat. "Here is the instructions St. Paul gives to Timothy, that he ordained himself, about the duties of clergymen—'The servant of the Lord must not strive, but be gentle with all men, apt to teach, patient, in meekness instructing those that oppose themselves.'—2 Tim. ii. 24. Now," says Pat, "I see this, that in the Apostles' time all the world was against the Christians, and they beat them, and imprisoned them, and killed as many of them as they could; and sure it would be a fine thing, then, if the Apostles could put curses on their enemies, and make them afraid to do them a mischief; and yet, we know that they never did, and only opposed them with gentleness, and patience, and meekness, and gave reasons and arguments to those that differed with them. And am I to think the men are like the Apostles now that are afraid to argue with those that differ with them, and give them nothing but hard words and curses instead of argument, and strive to do harm, and get people beaten, that I can't but think are as good Christians as themselves? No, Mike, the more they go on in this way the more I misdoubt their having the right doctrine of Christ. Here, Mike, is what our Lord told his disciples, and I am inclined to follow those that I see keep his command best. 'Bless them that persecute you. BLESS AND CURSE NOT.'"

ROSA MADIAI.

THE following is a description of Rosa Madiai, written by a lady who visited her in the month of September last, in the prison in which she is confined in Lucca:—

"28th September, 1852.

"Rosa Madiai is a woman of tall and dignified appearance, with handsome, though strongly-marked features, and dark eyes, sunk deep in their sockets, with a dim, worn look that tells of tears and weary watching. Long imprisonment—for she has been in confinement since May, 1851—and protracted anxiety and suspense, joined to her previous weak state of health, have evidently told upon her; its traces are visible in her thin gray hair, in her emaciated hands, and her drooping head, bowed down with that indescribable expression which acute mental suffering alone can give. But as soon as she began to speak, the unfeigned cheerful resignation, the unquestioning faith, which are her leading characteristics, so lighted up her countenance, that all previous marks of suffering seemed to disappear. There is, however, nothing of the parade of a would-be martyr in Rosa Madiai—no exaggeration, no fanaticism. On the earnest hope being expressed that no arguments, nor promises, nor prospect of speedy deliverance would ever induce her to waver in her profession, she clasped her hands fervently, and looking up to heaven, said—'Oh, no, I trust in God, never! oh, no, I would far sooner die; I do not trust in my own strength, for I know I am a poor, weak woman, and sometimes my heart seems to faint; but I pray to God, and I know, for Christ's sake he will give me strength to glorify him in the end.'

"She has hitherto not been compelled to assume the prison dress, nor to have her hair cut off, the latter in particular being, perhaps, the greatest humiliation to which the feelings of an Italian can be subjected; but it is feared an order from Florence may soon arrive to this effect; she said she expected it from day to day, and hoped for a fitting spirit to enable her cheerfully to submit; her gentle deportment seems to have won the respect of those to whose keeping she is intrusted. On asking one of the nuns, who superintended the female prisoners at Lucca, whether Rosa suffered much, she answered—'Not so much as another would under the circumstances; she is so pious, she has such faith in God.' She expressed much gratitude for the kindness of the nuns, who never taunted or abused her, as had been the case with her former keepers, when she was confined in the Borgello, at Florence.

"Her cell is very small and dark, the lower part of the window being boarded up, and light and air only admitted by a grating at the upper end. At night, when both door and window were closed, the oppression was terrible; she said she could not rest, she felt as if suffocated. The furniture of this room consists of a bed, a bench near the window, and a chair. She is employed in needlework, and at present makes shirts for the galley slaves. Her chief source of annoyance is from the fearful oaths, yells, and shrieks which unceasingly reach her ears, from fifty or sixty of the most abandoned and hardened of her sex, her companions in captivity.

"From the court-yard beneath her window she can also hear the blasphemies and ribald songs of the male prisoners, of whom there are about 300. No tongue can describe all the horrors she is thus compelled to listen to. One night she was repeating the Lord's prayer aloud, and when she came to the words, 'Hallowed be thy name,' she stopped and said—'Ah, no! thy name is not hallowed here; thy name is profaned and outraged all day long. Ah, why do those who build prisons not think of the souls of those they confine in them? Who can ever learn to repent in such a place as this?' She was trying to acquire the custom of speaking aloud to herself; she said it broke the silence of her cell: her voice was like a companion to her. Some days were terrible, when her soul was dark within her, and she was very anxious about her husband—such long, long days, as if they never would come to an end. On others, again, she felt quite cheerful, and scarce conscious of her captivity.

"A person one day asked if her sufferings were not very great. 'Yes, I suffer,' was the reply; 'but I strive always to remember how much more Christ suffered for me, and how thankful I ought to be if I suffer now for his Name's sake.' 'You must be very good, Rosa,' was the rejoinder.' 'No, I am not,' she answered; 'there are none good; but what I am, I am by the grace of God; he will give me strength to glorify him.'

"Controversial books were given her to read; but, unlettered as she is on most topics, she is yet thoroughly well read in that Book which maketh wise unto salvation; and the precision and clearness with which she applies its unerring test to the arguments placed before her, would give a salutary lesson to many in these times.

"She shed no tears during our interview; but the muscles of her mouth often quivered, and her poor, thin hands were often pressed nervously together, particularly when speaking of her husband.

"She said she 'tried not to weep, as she feared her tears might be attributed to regret at the course she had taken, or to faint-heartedness.' Those only who understand the Italian character, its warmth of expression and vehemence in lamentation, can adequately appreciate this heroic woman in her calm, Christian endurance and resignation."

THE POWER OF THE KEYS.

THERE are three remarkable passages in the Holy Scriptures, the right understanding of which we hold to be a matter of great importance to sound views of the priestly office in the Church of Christ; and we proceed to consider them with an anxious desire neither unduly to derogate from nor unduly to exalt that reverend office.

The three passages are Matt. xvi. 19, Matt. xviii. 18, John xx. 23.

In Matt. xvi. 19, our Lord, in his address to St. Peter (who had just acknowledged him to be the Christ, the Son of the living God), says—"And I will give thee the keys of the kingdom of heaven, and whatsoever thou shalt bind on earth shall be bound in heaven; and whatsoever thou shalt loose on earth shall be loosed in heaven."

In Matt. xviii. 18, our Lord, addressing ALL the apostles, and teaching them how they should deal with offending brethren, says—"Verily I say unto you, whatsoever ye shall bind on earth shall be bound in heaven; and whatsoever ye shall loose on earth shall be loosed in heaven."

In John xx. 23, again addressing all the apostles, our Lord says—"Receive ye the Holy Ghost: whosesoever sins ye remit they are remitted unto them; and whosesoever sins ye retain they are retained."

We shall not now enter into the question, whether the first of these texts, with its context, gave St. Peter a primacy or superiority over the rest of the Apostles—that will form the subject of a distinct consideration, which we shall not overlook in its proper place: our present object of inquiry is a different one, what is the nature and extent of the power conferred by our Blessed Lord in any or all of these passages, upon the Apostles or any of them, or on the bishops and priests who were to succeed them in their pastoral office in future times.

Three things are spoken of by our Lord, which may be either distinct in their nature or several forms of expression for denoting one and the same thing—

1st. The keys of the kingdom of heaven.

2ndly. The power of binding and loosing on earth.

3rdly. The power of remitting or retaining sins.

What "the kingdom of heaven" means in the passage in Matt. xvi. 19, has been the subject of much discussion, and there are strong reasons for holding that it is used in this and other passages as referring to the "kingdom of heaven" in its now existing form of Christ's Church militant here on earth, preparatory to its future development in glory; but we are willing, for the sake of making the discussion as simple as possible, to treat it for the present as if it related directly to the future state of that kingdom only, rather than to its present state as now existing on this earth.

Upon this supposition, the most favourable one to the exaltation of the power of the priesthood, how does the matter in question stand?

On the same night that our Lord was betrayed,* he said to his disciples—"Ye are they which have continued with me in my temptations; and I appoint unto you a kingdom, as my Father hath appointed unto me, that ye may eat and drink at my table in my kingdom, and sit on thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel."

So Matt. xix. 28—"And Jesus said unto them, Verily I say unto you, that ye which have followed me, in the regeneration, when the Son of Man shall sit on the throne of his glory, ye also shall sit upon twelve thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel," which passage closely follows verses 23, 24, in which he says—"A rich man shall hardly enter into the kingdom of heaven, and it is easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle than for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of God."

Assuming that those passages refer to the same kingdom of which St. Peter was to be given the keys, it would follow from them that the kingdom appointed to the apostles was no other than CHRIST'S OWN KINGDOM, which the Father had appointed to him, and which is alike, without distinction, called "the kingdom of HEAVEN" and "the kingdom of GOD." And it is surely manifest, that Christ never intended to deprive himself of his kingly power by conferring on his apostles twelve thrones, on which they were to judge the twelve tribes of Israel.

What, then, was meant by our Lord when he promised St. Peter (admitting the promise was made to him), "I will give thee the keys of the kingdom of heaven?" Could he have meant to relinquish the power of opening and shutting the kingdom of heaven to whomsoever he will, and to bestow on any apostle, however great, that EXCLUSIVE power? Surely it would be equally absurd in reason and inconsistent with the rest of God's revealed Word to think so. We doubt, indeed, if any one, however high his notions of priestly power, would venture to assert a proposition so startling and extravagant.

Hear, however, what our Lord says, in the parable of the ten virgins, who came to the door of the kingdom of heaven, after the door was shut, saying, "Lord, Lord, open to us." Does he answer, Go to Peter, for I have given him the keys? No; but verily I say unto you, "I know you not."

And, again, Rev. i. 17, 18—"Fear not, I am the first and the last, I am he that liveth and was dead, and, behold, I am alive for evermore, Amen; and have the keys of hell and of death." And, Rev. iii. 7—"These things, saith he that is holy, he that is true, he that hath the key of David, he that openeth and no man shutteth, and shutteth and no man openeth."

Can any one doubt that Christ, who is the Alpha and the Omega, the first and the last, has still in his hands the keys of both heaven and hell, and that neither St. Peter nor any other can open or shut the kingdom of heaven, in the same sense that our Lord does, "that hath the key of David, and that openeth and no man shutteth, and shutteth and no man openeth?"

* The following specimen of such a curse is abridged from Ducange, quoted in the Encyclopædia Metropolitana, (article excommunication) —"A complaint having been made to us, by the inhabitants of such a place, that certain cankerworms, caterpillars, and asforth have destroyed the fruits of the vines on several years, and are doing so in this present year, to the great detriment of the inhabitants of the place; and a request having been made to us that we would compel the said animals to depart, by ecclesiastical remedies, we, by the authority which we enjoy in these parts, do admonish the said cankerworms, caterpillars, or by whatever name they may be called, under pain of malediction and anathema, to depart within six days from these regions, and to do no injury either there or in any other place to this diocess. And if, within the above-named six days, the aforesaid animals do not obey this our admonition, then by these writings we curse and anathematize them." This was in the year 1515.

* St. Luke xxii. 28, 29.

In what sense St. Peter and the apostles, or any of their successors, were given the keys of the kingdom of heaven, we shall endeavour presently to elucidate. We shall now only say, that it must be in a different or at least a wholly subordinate sense from that in which our Lord himself holds them.

We shall now consider the power of remitting and retaining sins, given to all the apostles, in John xx 23; for the power of binding and loosing, if not identical with the power of the keys, is evidently annexed to and forms part and parcel of it, as is obvious from the passage in Matt. xvi. 19; and will also incidentally be illustrated by what we have to say on the power of remitting and retaining sins. What, then, does our Lord mean in John xx. 23, when he says—"Whosoever sins ye remit they are remitted, and whosoever sins ye retain they are retained?"

In the life of St. Basil a certain lady is introduced, and represented as coming to that holy Father, for obtaining remission of her sins; but St. Basil, instead of claiming the power of remitting sins, replied to her, by asking this question of her—"Hast thou heard, O woman, that none can forgive sins but God alone?" To which she answered—"I have heard it, Father; and therefore have I moved thee to make intercession unto our most merciful God for me."

St. Basil was too devout and too humble to arrogate to himself that which belonged to God, well knowing that God has never communicated, and never will communicate to any creature, the power that belongs to himself as the Creator, "who will not give his glory unto another."—Isaiah xlviii. 11.

St. Gregory the Great taught the same doctrine in his exposition of the 2nd penitential Psalm, when he thus paraphrases the words of David—"Thou who alone sparest, who alone forgivest sins: For who can forgive sins but God alone?"*

So likewise Irenæus tells us that our Lord, in forgiving the sins of the man whom he cured of the palsy (Mark ii. 7, Luke v. 21), did manifestly discover who he was. "For if none," saith he, "can forgive sins but God alone, and our Lord did forgive them, and cured men, it is manifest that he was the Word of God made the Son of Man; and that, as man, he is touched with compassion of us; as God, he hath mercy upon us, and forgiveth us our debts, which we do owe unto God our master."†

It would be easy to multiply from the ancient Fathers authorities on this almost self-evident proposition. Tertullian, St. Hilary, St. Ambrose, St. Jerome, St. Chrysostom, St. Cyril, St. Augustine, St. Athanasius, all assert the same thing. We shall be satisfied with St. Cyril, who says—"For, indeed, it belongeth to the true God alone to be able to loose men from their sins; for who else can free the transgressors of the law from sin but he who is the author of the law itself?"‡

What, then, must be the meaning of our Lord when he told his apostles, that whatsoever they should bind on earth should be bound in heaven, and whatsoever they should loose on earth should be loosed in heaven?

Many and divers, indeed, have been the explanations given by eminent theologians of the Church of Rome (to say nothing, at present, of the Church of England) upon this important matter. We, for the present, shall content ourselves with a single authority—that of the celebrated Peter Lombard, Bishop of Paris in the 12th century (who died A.D. 1164), known familiarly among scholastics as "the Master of the Sentences," from his learned collection of sentences and passages, drawn from the Fathers, illustrating the doctrines of the church, forming such a complete body of divinity, and treated as a work of such high authority, that no less than 244 of the most learned doctors are numbered by the Abbé Fleury among the commentators upon it. After enumerating the opinions of the Fathers upon this point, this master, in his 4th book, thus sums up the matter:—"In this so great variety of opinions (300 years, be it remembered, before the birth of Luther), what is to be held? Surely, this we may say and think, that God alone doth forgive and retain sins, and yet hath given power of binding and loosing to the church; but he bindeth and looseth one way, and the church another. For he only himself forgiveth sin, who both cleanseth the soul from inward blot, and looseth it from the debt of everlasting death. But this hath he not granted unto priests, to whom, notwithstanding, he hath given the power of binding and loosing—that is to say, of declaring men to be bound and loosed. Whereupon the Lord did first by himself restore health to the leper, and then sent him to the priests, by whose judgment he might be declared to be cleansed. So also he offered Lazarus to his disciples, to be loosed, having first quickened him".* Cardinal Hugo adds this further explanation—"That the priest cannot bind or loose the sinner with or from the bond of the fault and the punishment due to it; but only declares him to be bound or loosed. As the Levitical priest did not make nor cleanse the leper, but only declared him to be infected or clean."†

We shall probably take occasion, in recurring to this subject again, to show that a vast number of eminent writers, including Pope Hadrian VI. himself, have laid down the same doctrine—that to pardon the fault and eternal punishment due to it is the proper work of God, and that the priest's absolution hath no real operation in so doing, but presupposes the party to be first justified and absolved by God. Pope Hadrian's words are these—"The most approved divines were of this mind, that the keys of the priesthood do not extend to the remission of the fault."‡

But supposing it were even granted that the power of the church is not merely ministerial or declaratory, but also judicial, it surely would not follow that their judgment is final and without appeal, irrespective whether the judgment be just or erroneous. Can any one suppose that the Church's judgment, whether pronounced by a priest or a bishop, is not subject to an appeal to the supreme tribunal of the Lord himself? "Shall not the Judge of all the world do right?" And is it possible to believe that God ever deprived himself of the power of doing right, by intrusting to fallible man the judgment of any without an appeal? Whatever the power of the priest may be, it surely is not an arbitrary or unconditional power—of binding those who ought not to be bound, or of loosing those who ought not to be loosed: whatever the power or the limits may be, it is plainly a conditional one, and the condition is, that the judgment must be just. If the church absolves where she ought not, the sinner can derive no benefit from such absolution—if the church condemns where she ought not, the injured victim cannot be thereby condemned in heaven.

Is this Protestant heresy? Nay, but sound Catholic divinity. The great St. Augustine says—"Thou hast begun to esteem thy brother as a publican; thou bindest him on earth. But look that thou bindest him justly; for unjust bonds justice shall break." Maldonatus lays it down correctly that when the priest saith, "I absolve thee," he means no more thereby but, "As much as in me lieth, I absolve thee." And the same Master of the Sentences, Peter Lombard, pronounces thus:—"God doth not evermore follow the judgment of the church, which sometimes judges by mistake and ignorance; whereas God always judges according to the truth."§ "So the priests sometimes declare men to be loosed or bound, who are not so by God. With the penalty of satisfaction or excommunication they sometimes bind such as are unworthy, or loose them; they admit them that be unworthy to the sacraments, and put back them that are worthy to be admitted. But it must be understood of them whose merits require that they should be loosed or bound; for then is the sentence of the priest approved and confirmed by the judgment of God and the whole court of heaven, when it doth proceed with that discretion that the merits of them who are dealt with do not contradict the same. Whomsoever, therefore, they do loose or bind, using the key of discretion according to the party's merits, they are loosed or bound in heaven—that is, with God; because the sentence of the priest, proceeding in this manner, is approved and confirmed by Divine judgment."‖

To think, therefore, that it lieth in the power of any priest truly to absolve a man from his sins, without implying the condition of his believing and repenting as he ought to do, is both presumption and madness in the highest degree—nearly all theologians agreeing, that the power of binding and loosing committed to the ministers of the church, is not absolute, but limited by the clause, Clave non errante, meaning that it is only of force when the matter is judged with right judgment, and no error is committed in the use of the keys.*

We think we have now arrived at the stage of our argument, when it will not be very difficult to give a satisfactory elucidation of what our Saviour means by the keys of the kingdom of heaven, which has been supposed to convey so vast and mysterious a power to the Christian priesthood by those whose aim is to exalt it to an almost superhuman dignity.

We may first remark, that the expression is plainly a figurative one, and therefore much less absolute in its expression than the one of remitting and retaining sins, which we have already shown, upon such high Roman Catholic authority, is not to be construed absolutely, but in a limited and conditional sense, different in kind, as well as subordinate in degree, to the power of God in judging or forgiving the sinner. We have also shown already that Christ did not part with the keys of either heaven or hell, in imparting the keys to St. Peter or his other apostles; and we think it scarcely an assumption to say, that just as the apostles' power of remitting sins was that of declaring them to be remitted, conditionally, on the sincere repentance of the sinner, so they had the power of declaring men to be true members of Christ's heavenly kingdom, or declaring them excluded from it, on the like condition—viz., that the persons admitted or excluded had or had not the graces of true repentance and true faith.

We can see no reason whatever for conceiving, that the power of admitting or excluding from Christ's kingdom in heaven was at all more absolute or extensive than that of remitting or retaining sin, since sin alone could be the cause of such exclusion; and we think it is almost self-evident, that Christ could never have meant to bestow on St. Peter, or on any other apostle (much less on any of their successors in their pastoral, not apostolical office), the power of admitting those into heaven whose sins were still unremitted, or of excluding from heaven any whose sins were forgiven. So far, therefore, as concerns that kingdom of heaven of which we have been hitherto speaking—viz., the future state of happiness of the redeemed—we think the power of the keys is identical with, and merely a figurative mode of expressing the same thing as, the power of binding and loosing, and of remitting and retaining sins, all of which were conferred upon the apostles only in a subordinate and conditional sense, and never were, by the early Church, considered as imparting to them that power of forgiving sins which belongs to God alone, who only can discern and judge the inward heart, and spirit of man, or that power which Christ has reserved to himself, of "opening so that no man can shut, and shutting so that no man can open."

There remains much to be said upon the subject in question, on the supposition that "the kingdom of heaven," in the passage referred to, is to be understood of the Church of Christ in its existing state upon earth, rather than of the invisible Church of Christ in heaven; but we must reserve what we have to say on this head to a future number, in which we hope to throw further light upon this important and interesting question, which appears to us to lie at the root of many of the errors of the Church of Rome.

PIOUS FRAUDS.

THE Roman Catholic priesthood in Ireland are constantly denouncing the Protestant version of the Holy Scriptures, as a corrupt and perverted translation, manufactured by impiety to prop up heresy; as, in fact, a gross and audacious fraud, perpetrated to give countenance to Protestant novelties. We doubt whether any of them ever used so mild or equivocal a title as that at the head of this article, in designating the character of what is known in the Church of England by the name of the Authorized Version of the Holy Scriptures. We shall have much to say on the subject of that translation hereafter; but, for the present, what we would call the attention of our readers to is the question, whether the Church of England or the Church of Rome is most justly chargeable with having manufactured translations of the Holy Scriptures to prop up the peculiar doctrines of their respective Churches.

To those of our readers who have read the Roman Catholic tract called The Touchstone, which, from time to time, we have reprinted, and replied to in our pages, and compared the passages of Scripture relied on by its author (all of which he has quoted from the Protestant authorized version), with the corresponding passages in the Douay and Rhemish versions, it will probably have already abundantly appeared that the Protestant version has not mutilated or perverted to suit a purpose any passage of Scripture bearing on transubstantiation, purgatory, the sacrifice of the mass, or any other of the points in dispute between the two Churches; and notwithstanding the differences of opinion among the learned as to the meaning of particular passages, we think we may safely say that the authorized Protestant version of the Bible has not been mistranslated for the purpose of countenancing Protestantism and confuting Romanism. We shall have occasion hereafter to notice the controversy upon the Greek word μετανοια which is sometimes translated by the Roman Catholic translators, repentance, and sometimes penance, but always by Protestants repentance, and give our reasons for believing that the Protestant version is the correct one, but shall be happy to insert anything written with candour, and a competent knowledge of the subject by any Roman Catholic who will assert that the Protestant translators mistranslated these, or any other passages, for the fraudulent purpose we have referred to.

In the meantime we would invite our readers' attention to a remarkable attempt made by some theologians of the Roman Catholic Church to give Scriptural countenance to the leading doctrines of Romanism, and confute Protestantism out of the Bible.

The absence of any passage in the New Testament in which either purgatory, the sacrifice of the mass, the distinction between latria or supreme worship, and dulia or inferior worship, or the distinction between mortal or venial sins, was mentioned, was naturally strongly relied on by the Protestant Reformers in the 16th and 17th centuries. The French people, who were always more inquiring and free than their Italian and Spanish neighbours, could scarcely be successfully prevented from consulting the Scriptures for themselves; and a variety of translations into French had, from time to time, been published, the principal of which were those of Antwerp, in 1530, and reprinted in 1534, and that edited by Amelote, first published with notes in 1666, and afterwards without notes in 1686. All those translations and editions of the French Testament, though very imperfect, were however, felt on the whole, to be anything but favourable to the Roman Catholic party, in opposing the growth of Protestantism; and it, no doubt, was thought advisable to give to the French people a version in their vulgar tongue, which would correct this defect in all existing versions, and preserve the people from the taint of heresy. This important and remarkable book was published at Bordeaux, by Jacques Mongiron Millanges (the edition we have seen was printed in 1686), and we shall presently state under what authority.

First, however, let us give a few examples of its mode of translation, as contrasted with the Douay Testament published in Ireland, with the approval of all the Irish Roman Catholic bishops, in 1829, and the more modern translation of the Right Rev. F. P. Kenrick, Roman Catholic Bishop of Philadelphia, New York, 1851.

1 Corinth, iii., 15 (Douay version).—"If any man's work burn, he shall suffer loss: but he himself shall be saved, yet so as by fire."

(Bishop Kenrick's version—) "If any man's work burn, he shall suffer loss: but he himself shall be saved: yet as by fire."*

Now for the Bordeaux Testament, p. 52 (1 Cor. iii. 15)—"Si l'œuvre de quelqun brûle, il en portera la perte, mais il sera sauve quant a lui, ainsi toutefois comme par le feu du Purgatoire."

"If any one's work burn, he shall bear the loss, but he himself shall be saved, yet as by the fire of PURGATORY."

Acts of the Apostles xiii. 2 (Douay version)—"And as they were ministering to the Lord, and fasting, the Holy Ghost said to them: Separate me Saul and Barnabas for the work whereunto I have taken them."

Bishop Kenrick—"And as they were ministering to the Lord, and fasting, the Holy Ghost said to them: Separate me Saul and Barnabas for the work whereunto I have taken them."

What says the Bourdeaux, p. 36?—Acts xiii. 2.—"Or comme ils offroient au Seigneur le sacrifice de la MESSE, et quils jeunoient le S. Esprit leur dit; Separez moy Saul et Barnabé pour lœuvre anquel je les ay destinez."

"And as they were offering to the Lord the Sacrifice of the MASS, and fasting," &c., &c.

How conclusive must such passages have been to the simple-minded readers of the French Testament, who sought in the Word of God a confutation of Protestant heresy, and proof from Holy Scripture of Purgatory and the Sacrifice of the Mass, being among the apostolical doctrines of primitive Christianity.

Not less so the following:—

1 Timothy iv. 1 (Bordeaux Testament, p. 192)—"Or l'esprit dit clairement, ques derniers temps, quelquesuns se separerout de la foy Romaine s' adonnans aux esprits d' erreur, and aux doctrines enseignees par des diables. V. 2—Disans des choses fausses par hypocrisie, ayans aussi la conscience cauterisée. V. 3—Condamnans le sacrament de mariage, l'abstinence des alimens que Dieu a creés pour les fidelles, &c."

"Now, the Spirit says clearly, that in the last times some shall separate themselves from the Roman Faith, giving themselves up to spirits of error and to doctrines taught by devils, speaking lies in hypocrisy, and having their consciences seared; condemning the sacrament of marriage, and abstinence from meats, which God has created," &c.

See now and compare the Douay version—"Now the Spirit manifestly saith, that in the last times some shall depart from the faith, &c. . . . . forbidding to marry, to abstain from meats," &c.

Bishop Kenrick follows the Douay version in this passage, but freely admits, in the note (see p. 463), that the passage ought to run forbidding to marry, and commanding to abstain from meats, as things unlawful; but in neither the Douay nor Bishop Kenrick's version is there a hint either as to the separation being from the Roman faith, or marriage being a sacrament, or that the apostasy of the latter times was to consist in condemning the sacrament, and not the practice of marriage.

Two other examples will suffice:—

1 John v. 17—(Douay Testament)—"All iniquity is sin. And there is a sin unto death."

(Bishop Kenrick)—"Every iniquity is sin: and there is a sin unto death."

Bordeaux Testament, p. 292.—"Tout iniquite est peché, mais il y a quelque peché qui nest pas mortel, mais veniel."

"All iniquity is sin; but there is sin which is not mortal, but venial."

Luke iv. 8.—(Douay version)—"And Jesus answering said to him, It is written: Thou shalt adore the Lord thy God, and him only shalt thou serve."

(Bordeaux Testament)—"Serviras de latria a lui seul."

"And him only shalt thou serve with latria!"

What a convenient and conclusive mode of settling the controversy with heretics! For if this French Testament was published by sufficient authority, and certified to be a correct translation, what Frenchman could doubt that the alleged reformers had perverted and garbled the Holy Scriptures, by wickedly excluding from their copies and translations all mention of purgatory, the sacrifice of the mass, the holy Roman faith, the sacrament of marriage, venial sin, or the distinction between supreme and inferior worship,—the Latria and Dulia of the Church of Rome—all of which were thus distinctly and expressly mentioned in the authorized French version, though now we see them equally omitted from the most authentic of the Roman Catholic versions of the Holy Scriptures.

Let us now inquire by whom was this French translation made, and by what authority published and attested.

Let the volume speak for itself. We give the following translation, with the original French in the note. The title is as follows:—

"The New Testament of our Lord Jesus Christ, translated from Latin into French, by the Theologians of Louvain. Printed at Bordeaux, by James Mongiron Millanges, Printer to the King and the College, 1686, with approbation and permission."

Then follows the approbation, which is as follows:—

"We, the undersigned Doctors in Theology, of the University of Bordeaux, attest that the present French version of the Latin New Testament, revised and approved of by the Catholic Apostolic Church of Rome, made by the Doctors Theologians of the University of Louvain, revised and approved by several Doctors of Theology of the University of Paris, and several times printed by the permission of Superiors, is very useful for all those who shall be able to read it with the permission of their Superiors. In faith whereof we have signed this present attestation at Bordeaux, this 11th February, 1661.

"Lopes,
"Theological Canon of the Metropolitan Church
"Germain Carme."

Then is added the following

"permission.

"We, Louis D'Anglure de Bourlemont, by the Grace of God and of the Holy Apostolic See, Archbishop of Bordeaux, Primate of Aquitaine, permit the widow of James Mongiron Millanges to print the New Testament of our Lord Jesus Christ, translated from Latin into French, revised and exactly corrected. Given at Bordeaux, in our Archiepiscopal Palace, this 17th July, 1686.

"Louis, Archbishop of Bordeaux,
"By order of his Grace,
"Cosson, Secretary."*

Here, then, we have the three Roman Catholic universities of Louvain, Paris, and Bordeaux, and the Archbishop of the latter city, and Primate of Aquitaine, attesting and approving of this translation, as carefully revised and exactly correct! What higher authority could any pious Frenchman desire, and who could dream of or suspect the pious frauds by which such daring interpolations could alone have been introduced or excused?

Père Simon, in his "Critical History of the Versions of the New Testament," gives us an amusing anecdote of Monsieur Veron, the controversialist, who, being asked why he translated the passage Acts xiii. 2, "the sacrifice of the Mass, naively replied by giving the reason—"Que les Calvinistes lui avoint souvent demandé en quel lieu de l'Ecriture il etoit marqué que les Apôtres eussent dit la Messe!"—"That the Calvinists had often asked him in what part of Scripture it was stated that the apostles had ever said Mass!" To get out of which difficulty, we presume, controversy had taught him no readier or simpler means, than that of manufacturing a translation for the purpose, and fortified by no less than the theologians of three great universities, and a Primate Archbishop, we can scarcely be surprised if the expedient was for a time a successful one.

After this, will it be boasted that the Roman Catholic Church have been the only faithful preservers and guardians of the Divine oracles? and do we act uncharitably when we warn our readers against guides so unscrupulous? We do not assert that all Roman Catholic bishops are capable of such barefaced dishonesty; but we do say to our readers, as a man loves his own soul, let him take care how he implicitly, and without inquiry, trusts a Church that will tolerate universities and archbishops who, by way of pious fraud, dare to falsify the Word of God at this rate. Any man may honestly make a mistake in translating or transcribing a will; but who would trust one who could deliberately add to or forge testaments or deeds? Surely it is not piety, but wickedness, to corrupt the holy oracles of God, to serve a turn. After this, we think no one need be much surprised at the interpolations and forgeries which have been circulated under high authority among the writings of the Fathers, and the epistles of the Popes, much less at the perversions, by modern controversialists, of passages from such writers as Bishop Jeremy Taylor and Sir Edward Sandys—which we have already noticed more than once in our pages—and which we feel assured no Roman Catholic, of education or principle, would willingly countenance, whatever the object aimed at by such fraud, be it pious or otherwise.

THE TALK OF THE ROAD—No. X.

Well, the work began to get a little slack in Kilcommon, so Pat went home for a few days, and, of course, he went over the first evening to Jemmy Brannan, to have a talk with him about what was doing.

"So tell us, Pat," said Jem, "how things is going on."

"Why, then, there's law going on," said Pat.

"And what's that about?" said Jem.

"Why, it's about stoning the readers," said Pat. "I was out one day with the cart, and I saw the greatest work at all; there was the readers first, walking as hard as they could, and you wouldn't see a bit of the colour of their clothes as big as my hand, the way they were covered over with mud and slush from head to foot; and Paddy Brady, and Micky Dooly, and the Finnegans, and a set of the biggest vagabonds in Kilcommon, the fellows that used to be stealing the sheep, and that's up to all kinds of mischief, after them, pelting all the dirt they could get on them; and when the readers crossed over a piece of road that the stones was spread on the day before, and the boys came on it after them, if there wasn't a shower of stones after them fit to wipe the mud off of them! And their hats was knocked off, and their heads cut, and lumps on them as big as eggs. And then the polis comes down, and takes Paddy Brady, and Mick Dooly, and another that was foremost, and marches them off. And sure, says the boys, 'It's only defendin' our religion we are.'"

"And arn't they the pretty fellows to be defendin' their religion?" said Jem.

"Sure enough," said Pat, "I believe it's little they trouble the priest about religion. I hear tell there's not one of them has been at confession these five years; but Father John thinks them the right sort now, as you'll find."

"Well, on the Friday after, the boys were to be tried afore the bench, and it happened to be a holiday, so there was no work doing; and I seen such a crowd going to the chapel that I went there, too, to hear what Father John would say; and, sure enough, after mass, the sermon was all about the firebrands, and the soupers, and the ranters, and the poor, innocent boys that was going to be tried, and persecuted, and exterminated, only just for trying to keep their religion from being insulted by the firebrands. So when he was tired, says he, 'Now go down every one of you,' says he, 'man, woman, and child,' says he, 'and stand by the poor fellows that's going to be persecuted and swore against by the firebrands,' says he. So, sure enough, when I got to the courthouse, there was a thousand people there anyway. And there was Mr. Foley, the lawyer, from Dublin, come down to defend the boys."

"And who paid for him coming?" said Jem.

"Why," said Pat, "Father John sent round his servant, and two or three of his head men, to all the Catholic shopkeepers and tradesmen in Kilcommon, and made them all subscribe their pounds, and ten shillings, and five shillings; and I heard tell they liked it little enough, but they were mostly all afraid to bring Father John's tongue on them in the chapel; only Mr. Nulty and one or two more that never cares what Father John can say. Well, the readers told their story mighty fair and clever, and then Mr. Foley got up and examined them, to make them confess they were insulting the people, and he fetched out a tract, and asked them did they give any of that; and they said they did a few; and then he read out a place where it said the priests was harrassing the people for their dues. And then he made a great speech entirely to the magistrates, and said, what wonder what would happen to them, when they were insulting the people and their religion like that?"

"And did he make out they were insulting their religion any other way?" said Jem.

"No then he didn't," said Pat, "but he thought that the greatest insult at all."

"Well, then, I'm thinking," said Jem, "he got his story from Father John, for it's he that would think that the greatest insult entirely. But sure the people of Kilcommon is greatly changed this ten years back, if they think the like of that is an insult to them. Don't I remember, just ten years ago, when the people was fairly riz for the Priest's Tariff, as they called it, up the country? And wasn't the boys of Kilcommon just going to rise for it too, and had it all settled among them, and the day fixed, and all the boys bound to pay only the dues allowed in the Tariff for christening, and marriages, and everything else? And didn't Father John and the rest get up a great meeting for Repale, to put the boys off it, and promised to get them the country for themselves, and all kinds of things? and hadn't they fifty priests at it? and wasn't that the way the monster meetings for the Repale come about, where all the boys was expecting to get the word at last to take Ireland for themselves? And a mighty cute and clever job it was of Father John and the rest, for it put the people off the Tariff entirely.* But sure the people of Kilcommon is greatly changed if they are so easy hurt at a word agen the dues. But if Father John taught the lawyer his story, sure it's all plain enough."

"Well, that was all the insult they had, any way," said Pat, "and then Mr. Owens got up, and said there was only a dozen of that tract given out, and that he stopped it when he heard Father John took offence, and never gave any more; and if anything else was insulting, he'll stop it too. And when the lawyer was done, the gentlemen said there was no law for stoning people for the like of that, and they would have to find the boys guilty, just as if they stoned anybody else. So then the lawyer asked the gentleman only to put a fine on the boys, and whatever it was it would be paid. And while I was wondering where the like of them would get the money, I turned round, and saw Father John with his roll of bank notes out in his hand."

"Ay," said Jem, "I seen that myself, after the work at the election last summer, when Father John paid down the money in open court for every one of the boys that was fined for the work—and bad work it was.† But did the magistrates let them off with a fine?"

"'Deed, didn't they," said Pat, "this time. Old Mr. Everards says, just as quiet and easy as you please—'It's a month's imprisonment and labour we're going to give them,' says he. And I never seen Father John look so mad, for he was'nt going to stand that for the boys. Still it's a pretty good thing they made of it; for all their wives and children got new clothes, and meal, and money, and what not."

"And isn't that the dacent way for Father John to be defending his religion?" said Jem; "didn't the Rev. Mr. Owens write him a letter, asking him to settle who was right, by fair discussion, before the people? But Father John would rather get his religion defended with stones and mud, by the blackguards that never comes to confession at all: and does'nt all that show who knows that he has fair reason on his side?"

"Well, Jem," said Pat, "I am coming to think more and more that the priests hasn't reason on their side, and that they know, that once it comes to fair argument, the people will find out that. But as I was going home I fell in with Mr. Owens, and had a talk with him. And, says he, 'Why wouldn't we be stoned,' says he, 'when the blessed Apostles was stoned in almost every place they went to preach in?' says he, and with that he pulled out his Bible, and showed me two places where the Apostles was stoned for speaking to the people;* and another place where the Jews gathered up all 'the wicked men of the vulgar sort, and made a tumult, and set the city on an uproar,'† just for all the world the way Father John does now, 'and so it's no new thing,' says he, 'but we must follow the way the Blessed Apostles went.'"

"But, your reverence," says I, "what can poor men, like the likes of us, do, when the priest can get up the like of that agin any of us, and maybe put us out of our work too? How can we stand up for the Bible at all? And with that he took out his Bible again (and it was a Douay Bible too), and he read these words, that came harder on me than any words that ever I read in the Bible;" and Pat took out his Douay Bible and read the place (Mark viii. 38)—"'For he that shall be ashamed of me and of my words, in this adulterous and sinful generation, the Son of Man also will be ashamed of him, when he shall come in the glory of the Father, with the Holy Angels.' 'And now,' says he, 'are you ashamed to stand up for the word of the Son of God, and will you make him be ashamed to stand up for you?' So I couldn't tell what to say at all, and I can't get them words out of my mind; and what will I do at all?"

So if ever we hear of what they did, we will tell it to our readers.

* Jem is quite right about this fact. We know it ourselves on good authority. The Priest's Tariff had at that time been proclaimed in many counties in Ireland, when the monster meetings turned the minds of the people in another direction.

† Jem is quite correct about this fact, too.

LATRIA, HYPERDULIA, DULIA.

A PIOUS clergyman of the Established Church, in the west of Ireland, once showed us a scapular that had been presented to him by one of his parishioners who had seceded from the Church of Rome and joined his congregation, on which were embossed, in rude embroidery, three figures, representing, as he stated, Joseph, Jesus, and Mary, on a small heart of cloth, which, for seven years, the individual in question had worn round his neck as a charm, and worshipped, under the impression that Joseph, Jesus, and Mary were the holy and ever-blessed Trinity. We cannot take upon us to state from what source he obtained this scapular, whether from his parish priest or some itinerant Jesuit, who traded on his simplicity; nor should we think it needful to notice such cases of ignorance and superstition, if we did not believe that thousands of such cases exist in our unfortunate country, and that no exertion is made, on the part of either the Roman Catholic priesthood or hierarchy, to disabuse the minds of the people from such delusions. While examining the subject of indulgences, which we can assure our readers we have not lost sight of, with a view to bringing forward some instances which might practically illustrate that important subject, and enable us hereafter to make the arguments of our opponents and ourselves the better understood by those seriously desirous of arriving at the truth, we were struck by the following specimen, which we conceive to be not wholly unconnected with this subject, and which we take from a volume already referred to in our pages, entitled "Indulgences granted by Sovereign Pontiffs to the Faithful, &c., collected by a Member of the Sacred Congregation of Indulgence in Rome, translated with permission of Superiors," published by Richard Grace and Son, 45, Capel-street, Dublin, p. 136. It is verbatim as follows:—

"Seventy-fifth Indulgence.

"In order to increase among Christian people a true devotion towards Jesus and Mary, by frequently invoking their most sacred names, together with that of St. Joseph, and to encourage the faithful to recommend themselves to their protection at the close of life, on which depends eternity, Pius VII., by a Decree of the Sacred Congregation of Indulgences, dated 28th of April, 1807, granted for ever an indulgence of 300 days each time they repeat devoutly, and with contrite heart, the following three aspirations to Jesus, Mary, and Joseph, and whenever they say one of these devout aspirations, he granted them an indulgence of 100 days. In both cases the indulgence is applicable to the souls of the faithful departed. It is recommended to make these short and pious aspirations of the soul in the day, and frequently during life, and to suggest them to sick persons in danger of death, which will afford them much spiritual comfort:—

"Jesus, Mary, and Joseph, I offer you my heart and soul.

"Jesus, Mary, and Joseph, assist me in my last agony.

"Jesus, Mary, and Joseph, may I breathe forth my soul in peace with you."

We are aware that, according to Roman Catholic principles, supreme worship, by them called Latria, is due to our Lord Jesus Christ, as one of the persons of the ever Blessed Trinity. A secondary and inferior worship—Hyperdulia—to the Blessed Virgin Mary, and a tertiary or lower worship—Dulia—to Joseph and other saints canonized by the Church. To keep ever in mind this important distinction is admitted to be necessary to avoid the mortal sin of idolatry; but here we have Pope Pius VII. recommending an act, including Latria, Dulia, and Hyperdulia in the same prayers, and even in the same sentence, solemnly recommending pious persons, in the hour of death, devoutly to offer up their heart and soul, not to the three persons of the ever Blessed Trinity—God the Father, God the Son, and God the Holy Ghost, each of whom is entitled to the same supreme worship—but to three persons, of whom, according to Roman Catholic doctrine, one only is entitled to supreme, and the others to different degrees of even inferior worship.

Will any of our Roman Catholic readers explain to us how it would be possible to offer up our heart and soul to Jesus, Mary, and Joseph in three different ways, in the same devout aspiration, or tell us in what respect calling on Jesus, Mary, and Joseph at the hour of death to "assist us in our last agony," differs from the most solemn prayer which the human heart is capable of pouring forth to the Most High God? It would strike an ordinary mind, unclouded by metaphysical and scholastic theology, that it would be mockery to address to the Divine Redeemer of our souls in the solemn hour of death, anything short of the highest adoration—the supremest worship of which the human soul is capable, and that no language addressed to the Supreme Being could surpass in devout solemnity the simple and touching words—"I offer thee my heart and soul—assist me in my last agony—may I breathe forth my soul in peace with thee!" If such be not the prayer of Latria, we would earnestly request some of our friends to show us in what the worship of Latria consists. If it do amount to Latria, or an act of the highest devotion, we would then ask whether it be probable—nay, possible—that a dying man could use these prayers at the same moment, with three different feelings and emotions—Latria towards Jesus, Hyperdulia towards Mary, Dulia towards Joseph? Can one offer up his heart and soul in three different ways, in the same breath, to three different persons, differing so widely in dignity and nature? In sober sadness, we ask our Roman Catholic friends to tell us whether the blame lies at the door of the ignorant peasant who worships the worsted images of Joseph, Jesus, and Mary, and the itinerants who traffic in such wares, or at the door of Pope Pius VII., who offers, in the nineteenth century, 300 days' indulgence to every one who prays to Jesus, Mary, and Joseph in the way prescribed, and recommends them frequently, every day during their lives, and especially when dying, to look for spiritual comfort from such exercises?

We have looked into Cardinal Bellarmine on this subject, who distinctly lays it down (De Sanct. Beatit. Lib. i., c. 17, p. 292—"Quomodo sancti invocandi non sint") that it is proved—1st, by Scripture; 2nd, by the practice of the Church; 3rd, by reason; and 4th, by the Fathers St. Augustine and Theodoret, that we should not expect or seek for anything from saints save that they should, by their prayers, obtain from God those things which are useful for us, which he tells us (in chapter xii., p. 287) is the inferior worship of Dulia, as distinguished from Latria or the worship of God, and Hyperdulia, the worship of Christ in his human nature, and the Blessed Virgin as the Mother of the Son of God. Now, is there anything in these prescribed prayers (to be rewarded by a 300 days' indulgence) or in the exhortation to use them to guard the suppliant against the danger of confounding the divine and human natures of Christ, and addressing him only in his human nature with Hyperdulia, or of falling into idolatry, by addressing the Blessed Virgin and St. Joseph with Latria, at the same moment with Jesus in his divine nature?

Did Pope Pius VII. recommend the dying to resort to Jesus in his Divine or in his human nature, to address him with Latria or mere Hyperdulia?

Could any man, however educated in scholastic subtleties, much less any simple-minded rustic, suppose that by the words, "Jesus, Mary, and Joseph, I offer you my heart and soul," it is not meant to convey a devoting of the heart and soul to each of those three persons, but merely, "Jesus, I devote to thee my heart and soul; and, Mary, I beseech thee to intercede for me with thy son Jesus, to accept my heart and soul; and Joseph, I invoke thee to pray for me?"

If we consult the written Word of God, we shall be at no loss to point out to whom we ought to offer our heart and soul, as the highest act of religious homage.

"These are the precepts," says Moses,* "which the Lord your God commanded that I should teach you . . . Hear, O Israel, the Lord our God is one Lord, and thou shalt love the LORD THY GOD with thy WHOLE HEART, and with thy WHOLE SOUL, and with thy whole strength." And when our blessed Lord himself was asked by a certain lawyer tempting him—"Master, what must I do to possess eternal life?" The answer was, "What is written in the law? How readest

* Deut. vi., Douay Bible.

thou?" He answering said*—"Thou shalt love the Lord THY God with thy WHOLE HEART, and with thy WHOLE SOUL, and with all thy strength, and with all thy mind, and thy neighbour as thyself;" and he said to him—"Thou hast answered right; this do, and thou shalt live." Is not this true adoration? Is not this true supreme worship? "God is a spirit, and they that adore him must adore him in spirit and in truth"†

Can any one dare, in the hour of death, to offer the affections of his heart and soul to any one but him who has thus plainly declared that HE requires the whole heart and the whole soul of his creatures, and that not from the lips only, but in spirit and in truth?

We ask again, in all sincerity and solicitude for the safety of men's souls, will they peril them (for the promise of a 300 days' Indulgence), and hazard their immortal safety, by offering to any created being that heart and that soul which, if there be any truth in the Douay Bible, belongs to the Supreme God alone? and if not, what must be thought of Pope Pius VII., who thus recommends and tempts them to do so, even in the awful hour of death, by offering them a 300 days' indulgence for each time they do so?

We take this opportunity of stating, that we have not lost sight of the subject of indulgences, nor shall we evade any argument which has been urged by Roman Catholic divines and controversialists in support of it. Possibly the instance above given may serve hereafter to assist us in practically illustrating the doctrine, and the uses to which it has been applied.

The Catholic Layman.

DUBLIN, MARCH 1853.

IT has been well said by an old writer, that "there is nothing which truth fears so much as to be prevented from appearing in public, and being exposed to the examination of all men." This must needs be because truth will bear close inquiry, and the more it is tried the more will the pure and solid gold be apparent to those who test and analyze it. As laymen and freemen, we heartily respond to this. We cannot believe that truth can be really promoted by the clergy being allowed to keep up a monopoly of knowledge to themselves, or by the laity being compelled to accept implicitly everything proposed to them relating to religious truth and duty without further inquiry, merely because the Church prescribes it; and we cannot but suspect that priestly advisers have some design not quite unconnected with their own aggrandizement, when they ask men to shut their eyes and ears against everything which does not directly favour their own views, or which tends to encourage freedom of judgment, and enlarged and accurate views of the grounds on which their faith is founded. Any Church or set of men which challenges close inquiry into their pretensions and claims, we think naturally deserves the respectful attention, at least, of every one who has sufficient self-respect and reliance on the reason and intelligence which God has given him, to reflect and judge for himself between truth and falsehood; while any Church which would deter men from inquiry, and invite them to close their eyes and ears against all that is going on around them in the world of intellectual progress, would seem to us naturally to create a suspicion in the mind of any thinking man, that its leaders were conscious they could gain nothing, and might lose everything by too close a scrutiny into the foundation of their pretensions. The champion of truth must, we think, ever be bold and fearless, and anxious for the conflict, because he has proved and assayed his armour and his weapons, and can unhesitatingly confide in them. Distrust and timidity better become him who doubts the soundness of his cause, as he who anticipates defeat is never very solicitous for the combat. Have our Roman Catholic readers yet satisfied themselves why it is that their priests decline and evade the challenges we have so frequently urged on them to a fair and friendly discussion, and why they prefer maligning our motives and objects to meeting our arguments, and preaching the doctrine of implicit faith and blind obedience, to encouraging all, in the language of their own Bible, to "prove all things, hold fast that which is good?"—1 Thessal. v. 21 (Douay version). We can give but one explanation of it, which we will also do in the language of an old writer rather than our own—"I would have you to wit that the Church of Rome knew what they did when they invented the doctrine of an implicit faith and a blind obedience to all the Church's decrees; for if men should once dare to open their eyes and examine their assertions all their craft would be in danger to be set at nought, and the temple of 'Dominus Deus noster Papa' (as the Canon law calls him) would be despised, and his magnificence would be destroyed, whom so great a part of the world worshippeth."*

We rejoice, however, to think, that the progress of light, knowledge, and education in these free kingdoms has released from the fetters with which priestcraft had so long enchained them, thousands of thoughtful men, of vigorous minds and independent understandings, who know how to distinguish between subservience and respect, and can be inquirers without scepticism, and rational without being irreverent. Ignorant or timid men, of limited capacities and feeble judgment, may, and, perhaps, must ever be led by others, whether for good or for evil, but that is plainly no rule for those to whom God has given a larger amount of intelligence and capacity, and who feel themselves able to understand and weigh the force of evidence and argument, and who are not disposed to be blindly led, they know not whither, and cannot be happy, or feel themselves secure, without inquiring at least to the extent that will satisfy them that they are not trusting to blind leaders of the blind, which could lead ultimately but to the destruction of both. We would not urge or wish our readers lightly or hastily to make up their minds without the fullest and most careful examination of the important subjects of controversy between the two Churches. All we urge on them is, to persevere in their inquiries, and calmly and deliberately judge for themselves in so momentous a matter, on which no less a stake than that of their eternal happiness may depend. But when they have once made up their minds, on adequate grounds, as to the guides they should follow, let them do so in the spirit of intellectual freedom and enlightened conscientious conviction, and not in the contemptible servility of ignorance and superstitious fear. Priestly curses may be formidable, in a temporal point of view, when backed up by the physical force of the rabble; but to those who would satisfy themselves of their spiritual inefficacy, as well as sinfulness, we would recommend the perusal of the article on the Fair of Loughmanagh, which they will find in another column of our present number.

THE TOUCHSTONE.

OBJECTION 40.—Protestants will not allow that water, or other creatures of God, may be sanctified, or made holy, by the prayers of the church.

Their Bible assures them they may—For every creature of God is good, and nothing to be refused, if it be received with thanksgiving. For it is SANCTIFIED by the word of God and PRAYER.—1 Tim. iv. 4, 5.

REPLY.—It is plain that this passage relates altogether to men's ordinary diet. The Apostle is warning Timothy against certain false teachers who pretended that there was some special virtue and holiness in celibacy, and in abstaining from certain kinds of food, "forbidding to marry and commanding to abstain from meats, which God hath created to be received with thanksgiving of them which believed and knew the truth. For every creature of God is good, and nothing to be refused if it be received with thanksgiving."

Protestants accordingly hold, as this Apostle teaches them, that all kinds of food—whether fish, flesh, or vegetables—being all alike "creatures of God," are indifferent in his sight, and are "sanctified"—that is, made pure—by our offering prayers and thanksgiving to Him for his gifts. As for any spiritual efficacy in sprinklings with what is called "holy water," it does not appear that any such thing was ever thought of in the times of the Apostles. And this the writer of the "Touchstone" seems to be aware of, by his bringing forward a passage which so manifestly has nothing to do with the matter.

OBJECTION 41.—Protestants teach, in the eleventh of their thirty-nine articles, that we are justified by faith alone.

Their Bible expressly teaches the contrary (St. James ii. 24)—You see, then, how that by works a man is justified, and not by faith only. 1 Cor. xiii. 2—Though I have all faith, so that I could remove mountains, and have no charity, I am nothing.

REPLY.—Protestants do not presume to deny or to keep out of sight what the Apostle Paul says, who most undeniably does speak of justification through faith.—See Rom. v. 1; iv. 1—8, &c. And as it is impossible that he and his brother-Apostle St. James could really have taught contrary doctrines, it is plain that they must be speaking of different kinds of faith. St. Paul certainly did not mean that there is any value in such faith as consists in mere belief, not bringing forth the fruit of holiness of life. For that, as St. James observes, is the faith of devils [demons], who "believe and tremble." Nor, again, could St. James be speaking of any good works—however beneficial to mankind, and so far good in themselves—which do not proceed from a right motive. For these would be no less the good works of demons, than the other is the faith of demons. It is a "good thing" in itself to acknowledge Jesus as the Holy One; but those demons, whom He cast out, when they made this acknowledgment, did so because they were overruled by a superior power.

And, indeed, the very instance which St. James brings forward proves that he was speaking of good works springing from faith and love towards God. For Abraham's obedience evidently was the result of a firm faith. And the Apostle accordingly says—"I will show thee my faith by my works."

But neither by our own works nor by our own faith are we able to save ourselves. Eternal life, we are assured, is the gift of God through Christ; and He has Himself assured us that we can have no claim of merit in his sight: for "when ye have done all those things which are commanded you, say, we are unprofitable servants: we have done that which was our duty to do."

OBJECTION 42.—Many Protestants maintain, that the faith by which we are justified is, to believe, with an infallible assurance, that we are justified, and that we are of the number of the predestinate.

Their Bible expressly teaches the contrary, when it admonishes us (Philipp. ii. 12) to work out our salvation with fear and trembling. And when St. Paul tells us (1 Cor. ix. 27) of himself, that he kept under his body, and brought it into subjection, lest, having preached to others, he himself should be cast away. Can these people pretend to be more secure than St. Paul?

REPLY.—Questions about predestination have nothing to do with the differences between Protestant and Roman Catholic. For as Protestants are much divided among themselves on several of these questions, Roman Catholics are no less so. Augustine, whom they regard as a very eminent saint, was, it is well known, a zealous predestinarian; and so are many eminent Roman Catholic divines; while others of them have taught the contrary. But most advocates of predestination, Protestant or Roman Catholic, would admit that whoever is predestined to final salvation, is also predestined to work out his salvation by walking in God's commandments.

OBJECTION 43.—Many Protestants maintain that the commandments of God are impossible; and that no man ever kept them all.

Their Bible confutes this assertion, by the example of Zacharias and Elizabeth, of whom we read (St. Luke i. 6)—They were both righteous before God, walking in all the commandments and ordinances of the Lord blameless.

REPLY.—No Protestant, or, indeed, any one in his right mind, can conceive that anything can be a duty—can be commanded by God to be done—which is, strictly speaking, "impossible"—that is, absolutely out of a man's power to do. To talk of its being a man's duty to go to the field of battle and fight for his country, if he were a bed-ridden cripple; or his duty to relieve the poor, if he were himself in a state of destitution, and had nothing to give; or to talk of commanding a man to "add a cubit to his stature," or to fly in the air, would be to talk like a madman.

But though the word "duty" clearly implies "possibility," Protestants may well be allowed to doubt the possibility of actually finding a man who has performed all his duties with unsinning rectitude throughout his whole life, without ever committing even the smallest sin. This at least, however, is perfectly plain, that, supposing any such person actually to exist, neither he, nor we, nor any but the all-seeing God, could possibly know this with certainty, or could have any right to assert it. For "if we say that we have no sin (says the Apostle John), we deceive ourselves." And this would be no less true, even if we really were exempt from all actual sin; we could not be authorized to say it, since we could not be infallibly sure of it.

And yet many Protestants, as well as Roman Catholics, are accustomed to speak of such and such a person as a "very worthy man," as a "man of blameless life," a "person of exemplary Christian character," &c.; meaning, and being understood to mean, that such is the general tenor of his life; not that he was never guilty of any fault, small or great, in all his life. And this is the sense in which St. Luke's description of Zacharias and Elizabeth is most naturally to be understood.

OBJECTION 44.—Many Protestants maintain, that God has not a sincere will of the salvation of all men, but only of the elect; and that Christ did not die for all.

Their Bible, in express words, confutes this error, when it tells us (1 Tim. ii. 3, 4) that God our Saviour will have all men to be saved, and to come unto the knowledge of the truth; and ver. 6, that Christ gave himself a ransom for all. And 2 St. Pet. iii. 9, that God is not willing that any should perish, but that all should come to repentance. And 1 St. John ii. 2, that Christ is the propitiation for our sins; and not for our sins only, but also for the sins of the whole world.

REPLY.—The same remark is applicable here which was made in objection 42. Questions about predestination and election are nothing to the present purpose, since, on these points, both Protestants and Roman Catholics are divided among themselves.

OBJECTION 45.—Protestants will have it, that there is no middle place, or middle state of souls, after this life: but that all go straight either to heaven or to hell.

Their Bible teaches to the contrary (1 St. Pet. iii. 18, 19), 20, where Christ being put to death in the flesh, is said, by the spirit, to have gone and preached to the spirits in prison, which sometime were disobedient, &c., which prison cannot be understood either of heaven or of the hell of the damned; for Christ certainly did not go to preach there; and, therefore, it must be a middle place.

REPLY.—Whatever this obscure text may mean (and Roman Catholics as well as Protestants differ very much among themselves on that point), it cannot refer to purgatory. For purgatory is said to be a place where the venial sins of Christians are purged away; whereas the spirits in prison are said to have been disobedient in the time of Noah, before the flood, and to have then despised the long-suffering of God; which was plainly a mortal sin. But the writer of the "Touchstone," in order to make the text seem to favour purgatory, garbles the passage quoted from St. Peter, in whose Epistle the latter part of it runs thus:—"Which sometime were disobedient, when once the long-suffering of God waited in the days of Noah, when the ark was preparing, wherein few—that is, eight souls were saved by water."

OBJECTION 46.—Protestants will have it, that there is no forgiveness of any sins in the world to come.

Their Bible declares the contrary (St. Matt. xii. 32), where we read, that the sin against the Holy Ghost shall not be forgiven a man, neither in this world, neither in the world to come. Which words evidently imply that some sins may be forgiven in the world to come; though that particular kind of sin be excepted from this number, hence follows a middle place, which we call purgatory, because in hell there is no forgiveness, and in heaven no sin.

REPLY.—The most obvious sense of this passage would seem to be, that the sin in question will not escape divine judgment, either in the present world or in the next.

But if it had been designed to teach us that there is such a place as purgatory, and that persons are sent thither who die with sins unpardoned by God, and that they may afterwards receive pardon there, through the prayers offered up for them by their surviving friends, and masses said for them by priests, paid for that purpose, and indulgences sold by the Pope—supposing all this had been true, we may be sure the apostles and other early Christian teachers would have set forth so important a doctrine very clearly and frequently in their writings.

This, every one knows, is what is done by Roman Catholic priests at this day; and, therefore, we cannot doubt that the apostles would have done the same, if they had known and designed to teach the doctrine. They would have spoken much, and strongly (as the Roman Catholic priests do), of purgatory, and of the efficacy of masses for the departed, and of indulgences: and, in particular, Peter and the other apostles would have dwelt much on the wonderful privilege bestowed on him and his successors, of delivering numberless souls from a place of torment in the next world.

Now of all this we find not one word in the whole of the New Testament—nothing about purgatory, or masses, or the power of the popes, or anything of the kind is at all mentioned by the sacred writers. Hence Protestants infer that all these things were unknown and unthought of in the early days of the Church, and are entirely an invention of man in later ages; and they are convinced, that if any one in Peter's lifetime had supposed him to possess this wonderful power, and had come and offered him MONEY (as is done to the popes, who claim to be his successors), to release the souls of their friends from torment, he would have been likely to answer, "Thy money perish with thee!" "Do you think," he might have added, "that if I had the power to deliver thousands of souls from unspeakable misery, I would wait to be paid for it?—to be paid for releasing a few, whose friends were able and willing to afford the cost, instead of at once, and without pay, delivering, by one stroke of a pen, ALL souls from purgatory?"

Protestants, therefore, feel assured that no such applications were ever made to Peter, nor any such doctrine taught by him.

OBJECTION 47.—Protestants will not allow, that minute sins, in which the servants of God chance to die, will hinder them from going straight to heaven, or make them liable to punishment from the justice of God.

Their Bible on the contrary teaches (Rev. xxi. 27), speaking of the heavenly Jerusalem, that there shall in nowise enter thither anything that defileth. Now, every sin, be it ever so small, certainly defileth. Hence, we learn from St. Matt. xii. 36, that we shall be accountable, and consequently punishable for every idle word: and from many other texts we learn, that God will render to every man according to his works; and, consequently, will punish all the evil works, though ever so minute, in which a person dies without repentance.

REPLY.—Repentance is (as the original word implies) a change of mind; and if a man be so changed in mind that he is no longer disposed to commit sins great or small in the future state, then he is fit to go straight to heaven. But if he is not so changed, purgatory cannot help him, unless the pains of purgatory produce such a change. Now, if the pains of purgatory are necessary to work such a change, why do the popes and Roman Catholic priests take money to free people from those pains which are necessary to making them fit for heaven? And if those pains are not necessary, why may not such a saving change be wrought by Christ "without money and without price," as well as by the Pope for money, and at a heavy price? Or, is there any text which says that God will punish all evil works, except the sinner or his friends pay for an indulgence? But the best Roman Catholic divines hold generally that the pains of purgatory produce no inward change of mind at all, but that a man must be fit (in his inward disposition) to go straight to heaven before he enters purgatory, or else can never be fit for heaven. In purgatory, they say, he only pays the penalty of his sins. Now, Protestants have learned from Holy Scripture that the penalty of sin has been borne by Christ, and that all that is required on our parts is to quit our sin.

BAPTISM OF BELLS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

MR. EDITOR—In reading, in your last publication, an interesting article on the baptism of bells, I was reminded of conversations I had held, when residing on the Continent, with different persons there, on the subject of that strange ceremony, which, in Roman Catholic countries, is by no means uncommon. I learned from them circumstances connected with it which may readily account for a custom so little in accordance with the intellectual enlightment of the age, being still adhered to by the Roman Catholic clergy. It is customary on those occasions for the curé (parish priest) or the bishop, if present, to invite the richest lady and gentleman in the parish or neighbourhood to undertake the offices of sponsors. They, in return for this honour, feel themselves bound, by etiquette, if not by duty, to present their interesting god-child with a handsome pecuniary donation on the occasion of her baptism. She, on the other hand, with the most exemplary regard for her spiritual pastors and masters, leaves this money altogether at their disposal; so that this religio-comic ceremony can be traced to the same object as many of the other practices taught by Rome—namely, that of enriching her clergy. Often have I felt an earnest and affectionate desire that our dear Roman Catholic brethren would open their eyes to this painful truth, and, with candid impartiality, trace one by one the peculiar tenets of their creed to their real source. Then would they soon learn that the system by which they have been long deceived, deserves but too truly the title which the pious Napoleon Roussell has bestowed upon it, "La religion d'argent"—the religion of money.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

A LOOKER-ON.

IMAGE WORSHIP AND MIRACLES.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

SIR—The crowded state of your pages, and the mass of matter you must have on hand, has, no doubt, compelled you to curtail your remarks on the extraordinary letter of your correspondent "Sidrach" (vol. ii., p. 21). May I be permitted to add a few observations?

I. "Sidrach" quotes the decree of Trent on the subject of "sacred images," but he quotes only in part. The decree continues—"But because the honour which is shown unto them (the sacred images) is referred to the prototypes which they represent, in such wise that by the images which we kiss, and before which we uncover the head and prostrate ourselves, we adore Christ, and venerate the saints, whose similitude they bear."—Sess. 25.

This practice, in this very decree, the Council declared to be "according to the usage of the Catholic and Apostolic Church, received from the primitive times of the Christian religion, and according to the consent of the holy Fathers." And this 25th Sess. winds up with the grandiloquent words—"We all thus believe, we all think the very same: we all, consenting and embracing them, subscribe. This is the faith of blessed Peter and of the Apostles; this is the faith of the Fathers; this is the faith of all the orthodox. Thus we believe, thus we think, thus we subscribe. Amen: anathema to all heretics—anathema—anathema.!"

And thus "Sidrach," we presume, believes, excepting, perhaps, the kissing and prostrating part of the decree. But must he not accept the decree in its entirety, or not at all? And here let me remind him, that we (Protestants) do not kiss, or uncover our heads, or prostrate ourselves before the "statues of Wellingtons, Nelsons, Williams, Georges, and a host of other deified (?) personages." The parallel he would make does not hold good.

"Sidrach" has, doubtless, a sincere reverence for the "Fathers" and primitive writers invoked in the above decrees. Perhaps, however, he does not know that this very relative worship, so boldly advocated by the "Sacred Council of Trent," was the identical species of worship, or honour, which the primitive Christians most emphatically denounced. Let me take as examples Arnobius, Lactantius, Origen, St. Ambrose, and St. Augustine, and see how they opposed the reasoning of the orthodox heathen belief with regard to image worship.

Lactantius, about A.D. 300, said—"Beyond all doubt, wherever an image is there is no religion."—Lact. Divin. Instit., lib. ii., c. xix.

Arnobius, who flourished at the beginning of the third century, and had been himself a zealous pagan before his conversion to Christianity, thus remonstrated with the heathen idolaters—"You say, 'We worship the gods through the images.' What then? If these images did not exist, would the gods not know they were worshipped, nor be aware of any honour being paid to them by you? What can be done more unjust, more disrespectful, more cruel, than to recognise one as a God, and offer up supplication to another thing; to hope for help from a Divine being, and pray to an image which has no sense?"

Again he proceeds—"But ye say, 'You are mistaken: we do not consider materials of brass, or silver, or gold, or other things of which the statues are made, to be of themselves gods, or sacred divinities; but in these materials we worship and venerate these gods whom the holy dedication brings in, and causes to dwell in the images wrought by the craftsman."—Arnob., lib. v., c. ix. and c. xvii., Leipsic Edit. 1816.

Origen thus strongly condemns, by anticipation, this modern heathenism, in his writings against the heathen Celsus—"What sensible person would not laugh at a man (he says) who . . . . looks to images, and there offers up his prayer to them, or, beholding them, REFERS IT TO THE BEING CONTEMPLATED IN HIS MIND, to whom he fancies that he ought to ascend from the visible object, which is the symbol of him (whom the image is supposed to represent)?"—Cont. Cels., lib. vii., cxliv.

Saint Ambrose also thus speaks of this heathen worship—"This gold, if carefully handled, has an outward value; but inwardly it is mere ordinary metal. Examine, I pray you, and sift thoroughly the class of Gentiles. The words they utter are rich and grand; the things they defend are utterly devoid of truth; they talk of God—they worship an image."—Amb. ad Vaten. Epist., cap. i.—xviii. Venice, 1781.

Saint Augustine, arguing against the nice distinctions made by the heathen idolators of his day, and which your correspondent, "Sidrach," is perhaps prepared to defend, says—"But those persons seem to themselves to belong to a more purified religion, who say—'I worship neither an image nor a demon, but I regard the bodily figure as the representative of that being whom I ought to worship. . . . . And when, again, with regard to these, they [the more enlightened heathens] begin to be pressed hard on the point, that they worship bodies . . . . they are bold enough to answer, that they do not worship the bodies themselves, but the divinities which preside over and rule them."—Aug., in Psalm xcIII., part 2, vol. iv., p. 1261. Paris, 1679. "But some disputant comes forward, and, very wise in his own conceit, says—'I do not worship that stone, nor that insensible image; your prophet could not know that they have eyes and see not, and I be ignorant that that image neither hath a soul, nor sees with his eyes, nor hears with his ears. I do not worship that, but I adore what I see, and serve him whom I do not see.' And who is he?—a certain, invisible divinity, which presides over that image."—Aug., in Psalm xcvi., vol. iv., p. 1047. And, once again, Augustine says—"And lest any one should say, I do not worship the image, but that which the images signify, it is immediately added, and they worshipped and served the creature more than the creator. Now, understand well, they either worship the image or a creature; he who worships the image converts the truth of God into a lie."—Aug., Serm. cxcvII., vol. v., p. 905.

I might say much more on this, as also the entire repudiation by the early Church of the use of images in churches or elsewhere for religious purposes; but I think enough has been given to supply matter for grave consideration for any Roman Catholic desirous of learning what the primitive Christians taught with respect to images. Will "Sidrach" pronounce St. Ambrose, St. Augustine, Lactantius, Arnobius, and Origen arch-heretics, for thus writing? and is it possible that any of these great writers would have consented to the decree of the Council of Trent, which exhorted "all bishops, and others sustaining the office and charge of teaching, especially to instruct the faithful, that images of Christ, the Virgin, and other saints are to be had and retained, particularly in temples, . . . that due honour and veneration are to be awarded to them, because the honour which is shown them is referred to the prototypes which they represent; in such wise that the images which we kiss, and before which we uncover the head and prostrate ourselves, we adore Christ and venerate the saints, whose similitude they bear?"

II. "Sidrach" speaks, as the Council of Trent does, of the "due honour and veneration" which is to be paid to images; but who is to know what amount of religious worship is sanctioned by the Church of Rome under the word "due?" "Sidrach" may repudiate direct idolatry; but hear what Bellarmine says on this subject, and he cannot be accused of misrepresenting the tenets of his church. In his treatise on "Sacred Images," book ii., ch. 20, he thus discusses the subject:—"The question proposed is, with what sort of worship are images to be honoured? There are three opinions." The first he rejects—namely, "that the faithful ought to do no more, with regard to images, than to worship before them: not to worship the image, but the prototype, the exemplar, the original, the Being of which the image is the representation." The second opinion, and which is the one under consideration, he in no wise objects to, and which is, "that the same honour is due to the image as to the exemplar; and thence, that the image of Christ is to be worshipped with the worship of Latria (the species of worship rendered by Roman Catholics to the Most High God), the image of the Blessed Virgin with the worship of Hyperdulia, and the images of the other saints with the worship of Dulia." Under this class he ranks the famous Roman Catholic theologians and divines—Alexander, the "blessed saint, St. Thomas Aquinas," Cardinal Cajetan, the "blessed St. Bonaventure, Marsilius, Almayne, Carthusian, and others." With reference to Aquinas it may be as well to remark, that he justifies himself for giving the selfsame worship to the wooden cross as he gives to God himself by the ritual of his church. His words are—"We offer the supreme adoration of Latria to that Being in whom we place our hope of salvation; but we place our hope of salvation in the cross of Christ; for the Church sings, 'Hail, O cross, our only hope in this time of passion, increase righteousness to the pious, and grant pardon to the guilty.' Therefore, the cross of Christ is to be adored with the supreme adoration of Latria."—Thos. Aquinas, Theo. Sum., part iii., Rome, 1686, quæst. 25, art. 1—4; and see Lib. iii., Dist. ix., Salut. iv., Venice, 1780.

Lest it should be supposed that all this is mere figurative language, the "Pontificale Romanum" directs that the cross of the Pope's Legate be carried in the right hand, giving as a reason, "because Latria is due to it" [Quia debetur ei Latria. Romæ 1818, p. 468]. Aquinas belonged to the Order of Dominicans; so does the present Pope, and, if I mistake not, Dr. Wiseman also. Now, "in the Dominican Order, the degree corresponding to that of doctor in the secular clergy, and also this title, conferred on these by the Dominicans, through special privilege, is given upon a stipulation, ON OATH, to teach the doctrines of St. Thomas on every point."—Dublin Review for June, 1850, p. 476.

III. With reference to the pretended miracles of his church, "Sidrach" expresses himself with earnest and just indignation. He "utterly discards such absurd stories as the pretended miracles to which you refer, no matter how great the number of rogues or fools you name as a proof that they believed in them." He is too hasty in his condemnations. Does he not know that the present Pope himself admitted and recognised the truth of the wonderful winking statue of Rimini? Is he aware that as wonderful stories as that told by your correspondent, relative to the "black virgin" catching the enemies' cannon balls, are related in the Roman Catholic priests' "vade mecum," the Breviary? Can he be aware that, in Liguori's "Glories of Mary"—a book in Ireland more common than the Bible—is replete with such "lying wonders?" and yet this very book is not only printed with the sanction of all the Roman Catholic clergy, including Cardinal Wiseman* himself, but is also most unequivocally accepted by the whole Roman Church, which had declared that there is not one word in it worthy of censure.† Let "Sidrach" procure one of the Dublin editions of this work, and he will find that popes, bishops, and priests come within his sweeping condemnation as "rogues and fools." Had a Protestant used such language, he would have been called abusive and uncharitable.

I am willing to believe that your correspondent, "Sidrach," and many other of our Christian brethren, are Roman Catholics only from education, prejudice, and ignorance of the true Gospel of Jesus Christ; did they know the doctrines and teaching of their Church, and what true Protestantism is, they would cease to be members of the Roman Church; and may God grant that your efforts, Mr. Editor, through your excellent journal, may, through his gracious assistance, be the means of enlightening our Roman Catholic brethren to the truth as it is in Jesus.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

C. H. COLLETTE.

* Cardinal Wiseman has just put his seal of authority to the last edition of this work—London, Wallworth, 1852—"We hereby approve of this translation of the Glories of Mary, and cordially recommend it to the faithful. (Signed) N. Card. Wiseman, Archb. of Westminster."

ON DIVORCE.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

SIR—By reference to the leading article of my letter, published in the LAYMAN for December, 1852, it will be seen that I have admitted the connection of the Church of England with the State, and also the readiness of her ministers to re-marry divorced parties; but permit me to say, that I have yet to learn, for you have not explained, by what Scripture authority these marriages are sanctioned.

You say the legislature grants divorces in cases of adultery, and for no other cause. Our Saviour, in the Gospel, permits divorces for the same cause—adultery or fornication (Mat. v. 32); and hence it is plain, if a man put away his wife for any other cause, he cannot be said to have put her away by the authority of a divorce, or by permission either of the legislature or of the Church and ministers of Christ. If I understand you rightly, you assert that "the prohibition to marry applies only to her who is put away in this last-mentioned manner."

Now, this being the case, let me ask you, how can the prohibition to marry apply to her who is already married, and to whom neither the Church nor the State can grant a divorce?

The clause, "saving for the cause of fornication," is not an exception to any other principle or condition laid down by our Saviour in the text; neither can it be understood as permissive of a second marriage of the divorced parties; but it is evidently in antithesis with the causes of divorce allowed by Moses (Deut. xxiv. 1), and with the many other causes which were subsequently admitted, and which the carnal Jews considered they should be allowed at pleasure, as Josephus bears testimony.

For an additional illustration of this view of what you call a "special exception," allow me to direct your attention to (Mat. xix. 3, 9) where our Lord uses the same exception, "except it be for fornication," evidently as a precise, direct, and definite reply to the Pharisees' question, "Is it lawful for a man to put away his wife for every crime?" and thereby establish the fact, that for no cause, "except it be for fornication," shall he be allowed to put her away; and he adds, that "whosoever marrieth her that is put away doth commit adultery." Again (Mat. x. 2), the Pharisees "asked him, is it lawful for a man to put away his wife?" Our Lord, anticipating the tempting interrogatories of the Pharisees, declared, in his Sermon on the Mount, as explained above, that it cannot be lawful, "saving for the cause of fornication," and referring the Pharisees to Gen. ii. 24, for an answer; at the request of his disciples, when they were in the house alone, he explains the matter to them, as recorded in Mark x. 11, 12, omitting the exceptionary phrase. The exception is also omitted in Luke xvi. 18; but from the seeming discrepancy of diction between these two texts, I presume no man will maintain that the evangelists established conflicting points of doctrine, or that they did not all understand this subject in the same way. St. Paul (in 1 Cor. vii. 10, 11) inculcates the same doctrine, and he adds, "let her remain unmarried, or be reconciled to her husband."

Now, it is plain St. Paul never would have counselled the woman to be reconciled to her husband, without being re-married, if the first marriage had been dissolved by the separation or divorce of the parties.

I find the re-marrying of divorced parties strictly prohibited by the "canons ecclesiastical" of the Irish Church, to which I beg to call your attention.

The 55th canon provides, that "in all sentences pronounced only for divorce and separation, a Thoro et Mensa, there shall be a caution and restraint inserted in the act of the said sentence, that the parties so separated shall live chastely and continently; neither shall they, during each other's life, contract matrimony with any other person; and for the better observing of this last clause, the said sentence of divorce shall not be pronounced until the party or parties requiring the same have good and sufficient caution, and security into the court, that they will not any way break or transgress the said restraint or prohibition."

By your own admission, the doctrine of the Church of England at present, as regards divorces and the re-marrying of the parties, is entirely at variance with the dictates of this canon. Does not this look somewhat like a developing principle?

If, in the foregoing lines, I have mistaken your views of any point, I am open to conviction, and shall gladly acknowledge my error, if pointed out; and as my object is fair and impartial discussion, and studiously to avoid everything that might give offence, I hope I have used "the sound word that cannot be blamed" (Tit. ii. 8), that truth may be established, until we all meet in the unity of faith, and of the knowledge of the Son of God—Ephes. iv. 13.

I am, sir, with sincere regard,

Your obedient servant,

EDMOND POWER.

The subject referred to in the above letter was at first introduced by us incidentally and briefly, merely to illustrate another question. It was never intended by us as a prominent subject of discussion in our pages, to which it is not suited. We should have declined to continue such a discussion; but our correspondent's letter is written in so calm and candid a spirit of discussion that we are most unwilling to refuse insertion to anything that comes from him. We, therefore, insert his letter, with a brief reply to its arguments, which must conclude this subject; and we do so in the hope that our correspondent will then turn his attention to the greater and more important subjects, for the discussion of which our paper was established. In discussing those great subjects we shall be happy to have the assistance of a writer so dispassionate and so intelligent.

The strength of our correspondent's argument appears to us to lie in this—he rightly says that Christ's law does not allow of divorce except for adultery or fornication, and, therefore, if a man put away his wife for any other cause, &c., the marriage between them still exists. And he says—"Now, this being the case, let me ask you, how can the pro-hibition to marry apply to her who is already married, and to whom neither the Church nor the State can grant a divorce?" And hence he concludes, that our Saviour's prohibition to a divorced woman to marry cannot be intended of any but of her who is divorced for adultery. We hope Mr. Power will think this a fair statement of his argument; and we answer it thus—In the place in question (Matt. v. 31), our Saviour said—"It hath been said, whosoever shall put away his wife, let him give her a bill of divorce." And from St. Mark x. 3 and 4, we find that it was in the law of Moses that this was said: and if we look for it in the law of Moses, we find it in Deuteronomy xxiv. 1. In verse 2 we find that the woman so put away was permitted to be married to another man; or, at least, that such was the practice. We are satisfied that the former is the right interpretation of the verse, but the latter is quite sufficient for our present practice. So, when our Saviour spoke, it was a prevailing practice among those he spoke to, to marry women who were divorced from their husbands for other causes besides adultery. And could anything be more necessary than for our Saviour, in establishing his law, to forbid this practice for the future? This was the application which we gave of the passage. Mr. Power, in his argument above stated, thinks that there could not have been any room for our Saviour to have spoken the words in that sense; but we have shown that there was an absolute necessity for our Saviour to speak the words in that sense; and, therefore, we conclude that this really was the sense of them.

Mr. Power has mistaken the meaning of the 55th canon of the Church of Ireland, which he quotes. Any one conversant with the law of our courts will tell him that the "divorce" there spoken of is not meant of "divorce" in the sense of dissolving a marriage. It is, in fact, only a sentence of the court that neither party shall have a right to force the other to live with them; but the marriage still exists, notwithstanding such sentence: and, therefore, in such a divorce, security not to marry another is properly taken.

Our practice is this, and with the statement of it we must close the discussion of the subject; if the legislature grant a divorce "a vinculo matrimonii" for a cause for which Christ allows divorce to be granted, we consider that marriage at an end; for divorce puts an end to marriage. But if the legislature should grant a divorce when Christ forbids it, we conceive Church of England clergy would refuse to marry the parties to any others, because Christ says that is adultery; it is a marrying again, while a former marriage is still in force by the laws of Christ. But no such case as this has ever happened in the Church of England. We have already expressed our opinion that such cases have happened in the Church of Rome.

There is another point which Mr. Power would do well to consider; he says—"Our Saviour, in the Gospel, permits divorce for the same cause, adultery or fornication—Matt. v. 32." In this he is quite right. But the Church of Rome refuses to permit divorce for that cause. And why? because, they say, it would be contrary to the nature of marriage, as a sacrament instituted by Christ. Does the Church of Rome know the nature of Christ's sacraments better than Christ himself did? When her doctrines about marriage forces her to deny what Christ himself allows, is it not clear that her doctrine about marriage must be wrong? This is certainly a stronger proof against her doctrine than any that can be brought against the Church of Eogland and Ireland.

We trust we shall hear from Mr. Power in future, on some of the great questions which concern every man's faith and practice towards God. It was for the discussion of these that our journal was established.

ON THE FIVE DISPUTED SACRAMENTS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

SIR—I beg to refer your correspondent, "J. F. G.," to the following portions of Scripture, which (it is argued by individual Roman Catholics) sustain the Divine institution of the five disputed sacraments, viz:—

PENANCE.—John xx. 22, 23—"He (Christ) breathed on them, and he said unto them, Receive ye the Holy Ghost, whose sins you shall forgive they are forgiven them: and whose sins you shall retain they are retained."—See also 2 Cor. ii. 10.

MATRIMONY.—Matt. xix. 6—"Therefore now they are not two, but one flesh; what, therefore, God hath joined together, let no man put asunder."—See also Eph. v. 23, 24, 25, and 32.

CONFIRMATION.—Matt. xix. 13 and 15—"Then were little children presented to him, that he should impose hands upon them and pray, and the disciples rebuked them. But Jesus said to them, Suffer the little children, and forbid them not to come to me, for the kingdom of Heaven is for such. And when he imposed hands upon them he departed from thence."—See also Acts viii. 14, 15, 16, 17.

HOLY ORDERS.—Matt. x. 7—"And going, preach, saying, The kingdom of Heaven is at hand."—See also Acts vi. 6. and xiii. 3.

EXTREME UNCTION.—Matt. x. 1—"And having called his twelve disciples together, he gave them power over unclean spirits to cast them out, and to heal all manner of diseases, and all manner of infirmities." And 8th verse—"Heal the sick, raise the dead, cleanse the lepers, cast out devils: freely have you received, freely give."—See also James v. 14, 15.

Trusting that you, sir, or some of your correspondents, will analyze the above in such a way as to ascertain, by the assistance of God's Holy Spirit, where the truth is,

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

J. B.

In reply to the above letter, we would observe that, in considering the question of the sacraments of the Church of Rome, and the proof of those sacraments, we must keep in mind what the Church of Rome means by a sacrament.

They hold, first, that a sacrament must have been instituted by Christ himself. This is evident from their pronouncing a curse upon any one who denies that any of their seven sacraments was instituted by Christ himself.—Council of Trent, Sess. vii., Can. 1.

Secondly, they hold that two things are essential to the existence of a sacrament—namely, the FORM and the MATTER of the sacrament—"The matter and the form, in which the essence of a sacrament is perfected."—Council of Trent, Sess. xiv., Cap. 2.

Now, if a sacrament cannot exist without form and matter, it is clear that a sacrament cannot be instituted until the form and matter are instituted.

Take the sacrament of Baptism, for example. The form consists of the words—"I baptize thee in the name of the Father, and the Son, and the Holy Ghost." The matter is water, with which the person is baptized. Why do we say that Christ instituted this sacrament? Is it not because St. Matthew tells us that Christ appointed his Apostles to baptize with water (for so the Greek word expresses), using these words?

But if it did not appear that Christ ever directed these words to be used, or water to be so applied; and if it further appeared that neither these words nor water had been used in the Church for a thousand years after, could any one say that Baptism had been instituted by Christ? Would not every one say, that if the essence of the sacraments consisted in these words and this matter, that the sacrament itself could not have been instituted until this form and matter were introduced and commanded?

We, therefore, think it a self-evident maxim, that a sacrament can be instituted only by instituting and commanding the form and the matter.

If this be so, the question, whether Christ instituted any sacrament, is simply a question whether Christ instituted the form and matter of the sacrament.

Now, take the "Sacrament of Penance." What is its form? The Council of Trent answers—"The FORM of the Sacrament of Penance, in which chiefly its force is situated, is placed in those words of the minister, Ego te absolvo," &c. (that is, I absolve thee); and this is held of such importance that the great Doctor, Thomas Aquinas, says—"It would not be sufficent to say—Almighty God have mercy on thee, or, God grant unto thee absolution and forgiveness, because by these words the priest doth not signify that the absolution is done, but seeks that it may be done."—Thom., part 3, quæst. 84, art. 3, ad. 1.

Now, the question is, did our Saviour, in the passage which our correspondent quotes, appoint his Apostles to use the words—"I absolve thee"—as the form of a sacrament? If he did not, he did not institute the Sacrament of Penance as now held in the Church of Rome, because that sacrament consists chiefly in the use of those words. Now, this form of words is not there directed by our Saviour to be used; and we are certain that this form of words was never used by any priest in reconciling penitents for more than a thousand years after Christ. No ancient liturgy contains the form—"I absolve thee." All ancient liturgies contain the form, "God absolve thee," or "God forgive thee," which words, it is acknowledged in the Church of Rome, do not constitute a sacrament.

Here we conclude, that the modern Sacrament of Penance was not instituted by Christ in the above words, and that it never existed, or could exist, until the form, "I absolve thee," was introduced more than a thousand years after Christ.

The same may be said about the matter of this sacrament. The Council of Trent declares that "satisfaction" is part of the matter of the Sacrament of Penance. The Catechism of the Council of Trent, explaining this "satisfaction," says—"Satisfaction is the full payment of a debt; for when satisfaction is made nothing remains to be supplied . . . . Hence, theologians make use of the word satisfaction to signify the compensation made by man to God, by doing something in atonement for the sins which he has committed." Now, did Christ, in the words in question (John xx. 22, 23), appoint our own satisfaction for our own sins, or the atonement which men make for their own sins, to be the "matter" of a sacrament? There is not one word said there about any such "satisfaction;" and, on the contrary, we are taught, in many places, that Christ came to make atonement and satisfaction for our sins, because it was not possible for man to satisfy for sin himself.

Here we conclude again, that if Christ did not institute the "matter" of this sacrament as now held in the Church of Rome, he did not institute the sacrament itself, because a sacrament, according to the Church of Rome, can only consist in the "form" and "matter" of the sacrament.

It may be plainer to some persons to state the thing thus—"Is there one word in the passage under consideration (John xx. 22, 23) about penance at all? How, then, can these words be an institution of the Sacrament of Penance?"

We have spoken already of the real force and meaning of that passage, and we shall take an opportunity of doing so again shortly. It is sufficient for our present purpose to show that those words cannot be the institution of the form and matter of the Sacrament of Penance.

The passage which our correspondent refers to, from 2 Cor. ii. 10, plainly relates to excommunication, and restoring again to the communion of the faithful, which no one takes to be a sacrament.

MATRIMONY.

If our correspondent will examine the passage which he quotes (Matthew xix. 6), he will find that our Saviour was simply explaining the nature of God's institution of marriage at the creation of man, and restoring that institution to what God at first had made it. Will any one say that marriage, as it subsisted between Adam and Eve, was a sacrament of the Gospel? And if our Saviour only restored it to that same state in which it was at first instituted, how did that make it a sacrament?

Can any one tell us what are the "form" and "matter" of matrimony, as a sacrament in the Church of Rome? The Council of Trent did not venture to say anything of this. They say a sacrament consists in "form and matter;" but what can be the "form and matter" in matrimony they could not tell. How, then, could they know it to be a sacrament?

There are some curious things about this sacrament. Up to the Council of Trent, 1563, it was not necessary in the Church of Rome that marriage should be celebrated by a priest—any two persons making an agreement together between themselves to be man and wife, constituted a valid marriage. Was matrimony then a sacrament? It seems strange that any two persons could make a sacrament without a priest; but if it was not a sacrament then, how old is the sacrament now?

If sacraments "confer grace," as the Church of Rome says they do, it seems strange that it should be a holier state to be without one of the sacraments of the Gospel than to have it.

Our correspondent also refers to the Epistle of the Ephesians, chap. v., verses 23, 24, 25, 32. The whole force of this argument depends on the word "sacrament," in verse 32. We think the Greek word here should be translated "mystery." It seems to us wholly arbitrary to put in the word sacrament here, and evidently done to serve a purpose. This seems to us very important, because we believe this is the only place in the present Douay Bible in which the word "sacrament" occurs. It is so important that we will give it a separate paper to itself in our next number. We only say here, that St. Paul cannot mean to say that verse 31 is "a great sacrament," as the Douay Bible seems to say; because verse 31 is only the words of the original institution of marriage between Adam and Eve, which the Church of Rome herself confesses was not a sacrament at all. And St. Paul expressly says, in verse 32, that he speaks εις χριστον, και εις την εκκλησιαν, which can only mean "concerning Christ and the Church." We have an instance of this use of the preposition εις in Acts ii. 25—"For David speaks εις αυτον" which the Douay Bible translates "concerning Him" (Christ). It is certainly of the union of Christ and his Church that St. Paul says "it is a great mystery," and not of the marriage of a man and his wife.

Our space forbids us to enter on the other sacraments now, but we will consider them in our next number.

We cannot now conclude without expressing the great pleasure which we feel at the calm, and earnest, and dispassionate tone apparent in our correspondent's short letter. We hope to hear from him often in the same style. And we again commend this to his consideration, that if, as the Church of Rome says, sacraments can only consist in their "form and matter," then nothing can be a proof that Christ instituted a sacrament, unless it proves that Christ instituted the "form and matter" of that sacrament.

THE ROCK OF THE CHURCH.

Matt. xvi. 18—Douay Version.

SIR—It must be allowed that if St. Peter was to be the rock on which the Church was to be built, it would have been of vast importance that such a fact should be universally known. Is it possible, then, that not only St. Luke and St. John, but St. Mark also, who is supposed to have been with St. Peter when he wrote his Gospel, would have omitted in their narrations the only text in the Bible which can be at all supposed to convey such an idea? How do those who look to St. Peter as the rock of the Christian religion explain this?

Yours obediently,

"ARE THE MISSIONARIES DOING ANYTHING IN INDIA?"

THIS question was asked me by a lady not long since. "Why, madam, may I ask," I replied, "do you doubt their doing anything? Do you read the missionary registers and reports? "Sometimes I do; but Colonel C., whom I lately met, and who has just returned from India, after spending thirty years there, assured me he had never seen a missionary, and that I must not believe the reports which are got up in London, simply to rob simple folk of their money." It is hard to say in what part of India "Colonel C." may have served, or in what sort of society he took delight. If he was a gay and worldly man, who frequented balls and billiard tables, it is probable that he knew as little about the operations of missionaries in India as his Excellency's aid-de-camps at the Castle in Dublin are likely to know of those in Kerry or Connemara.

India is a large place, and the occupations of Europeans there are as diverse from each other as they are in Britain; and it is quite possible for an officer in the East India Company's Service to have lived at stations unoccupied by missionaries, or even if at the same station with them, to be unacquainted both with their persons and their operations. To show, however, that missionaries and their labours are not, in every instance, the mere produce of imagination, I will narrate a little incident which occurred to myself one morning in the month of February, A.D. 1851, in the vicinity of Ahmednugur, a large city in the presidency of Bombay.

My tents were pitched outside the town of Yewla, some miles north of Ahmednugur; the hour was early—the sun not long risen—and I had just returned from a ride, when, at the door of my tent, I was accosted, in the Maratha language, by a respectable looking individual, apparently a Bramin. I asked his business: he informed me that he was a Christian, converted by the American missionaries at Ahmednugur, and that he, with three other converts, were travelling through the country, selling books on account of the missions. After a little conversation on matters connected with the mission, Sukhopunt (for so I will call the Bramin convert) offered to bring me his store of books, in case I should wish to purchase any. I at first declined, and he left me: he had not, however, left me many minutes when I changed my mind, and sent a messenger after him, to invite him and his companions to my tent at ten o'clock, to display their books. My messenger returned after a little delay, and informed me that he had found the converts with some difficulty, as they were not lodging at the "Dhurmsala," (the usual halting-place for travellers), but that they had halted in the open plain outside the village, and that he found them preparing their breakfast under the shadow of their cart. At ten o'clock, a cart drawn by bullocks, drove up to the tent; in it I observed Sukhopunt and his three companions, one of whom was charioteer. They evidently were not "Bramins;" and observing the friendly terms on which they lived together, I was curious to know whether the latter were Hindoos of the working classes, or whether they belonged to the despised race of Pariāhs. They soon entered the tent, carrying in two large boxes full of books, and Sukhopunt introduced his three companions, whom I will call Lakhoram, Rama, and Krishna; the first was an elderly man, the last two were youths. They came up to me with smiling faces, and, in a friendly, though respectful manner, held out their hands (instead of raising them to their heads to "Salaam," as Asiatics usually do). I readily gave them my hand, and then asked them to be seated; and they forthwith, took their places on the ground, on each side of my chair. I found that Lakhoram and his two companions were by birth Pariāhs, and I was forcibly struck with the utter annihilation of caste prejudices in the mind of Sukhopunt, through which he had consented familiarly to associate with people whom no Bramin of Western India would, for any consideration, touch, and whose very shadow is considered a pollution.

But a more striking instance of the triumph of the Word of God, in this respect, remains to be told. I asked Sukhopunt why he and his companions had halted in the plain, instead of entering the village "Dhuem-Sala." "The reason is," he replied, "that these, my brethren, being Purwarees (i. e., Pariāhs) by birth, the villagers would not allow them to enter the Dhurmsalas; and as we are all brethren, I refuse to separate from them."

The circumstance of a Bramin thus claiming brotherhood with Pariāhs, and sharing hardship voluntarily with them, was the most striking instance that I had ever seen of the abolition of caste, through the genial influence of the Gospel.

The countenances of the three Pariāhs struck me forcibly, as evincing the power of religion to "make wise the simple." There was a modest, intelligent propriety in their appearance and manner, that strangely contrasted with the uncouth ignorance usual in men of their class. Lakhoram, the eldest, especially, struck me as superior in intelligence and demeanour. I asked him to tell me the history of his early life and conversion, which he did in nearly the following words:—

History of Lakhoram.—"When the great Wesley (the Duke of Wellington) conquered Holkar, I was 14 years old; I lived at Ahmednugur, of which my father was hereditary gate-keeper; it was about that time that a holy mendicant arrived at our city, and to him my father intrusted me, saying—'Take my son, and make him a holy man like yourself.' The next day I left Ahmednugur with my preceptor, and I commenced a life of travel with him from one shrine to another; we visited every sacred river, mountain, and temple, from one end of India to another, including Rameshwara, at the south, all the holy places in the Carnatic, Jugonath, Gaya, Benares, and various places in the Himalaya Mountains, beyond which mortal man cannot travel. We then travelled down to Dwarca, on the west coast, and, after a lengthened tour of several years, in which we visited hundreds of holy places, of lesser note, I returned to my native city, and sat down in the gate in which I was accustomed to play as a boy. My father was dead, and many other changes had occurred in Ahmednugur; the Peshwa's government had passed away, and the English had come in its stead. I saw in the gate a new gate-keeper, whom I presently recognised as one of my boyish companions. While conversing with him about the many changes which had come over my native city since I left it, another friend came up—the father of this lad (pointing to one of the converts), and, addressing me, he said—'Well, Mr. Pilgrim, you have spent many years visiting shrines, and rivers, and all sacred places, and you know the Holy Book Kubeer almost by heart: tell me, after all, what are you—are you a saint, or are you a sinner?' The strangeness of this question offended me not a little; however, as I had learned that anger was disgraceful to a holy man, I curbed my temper, and thought over his question—'Am I a saint, or am I a sinner? I have visited every shrine, and washed in every holy river; I have observed every fast, and every religious observance enjoined in Kubeer; I ought to be a saint; but then Kubeer says—'Anger, pride, lust, avarice, envy, &c., are sins, and till these are all driven out of the heart man is a sinner.' So, after a little reflection, I replied—'I am a sinner.' 'Indeed! (he rejoined), a sinner still, after so many religious deeds! When, then, do you expect to be a saint? and if you are not a saint, how do you expect to see God?' I answered out of Kubeer, of which I was very fluent, showing the various penances and mortifications that a man must perform to subdue sin, and to fit him for heaven. But he rejoined, 'well, but all these you have performed, and that for many years: what hope have you of attaining to holiness in future years, having so wholly failed in those that are past?' This question rather provoked me, the more so as it proceeded from an ignorant Pariāh who had spent all his life in the lowest menial occupations, while I had read, studied, and travelled, and expected to be regarded by my countrymen as a person of no small sanctity. The unlooked-for questions and objections, therefore, of Lukma set my mind at work with new thoughts and ideas. To his last question (above stated) I offered sundry replies, suggested by the book Kubeer, which I reverenced much, and on my acquaintance with which, as well as an attendance upon the duties therein prescribed, I fully depended for elevation to the highest station in the world of spirits. My replies, however, not appearing to satisfy Lukma, I, in my turn, asked—'How do you expect to see God and to attain heaven? have you reached sinless perfection?' 'Not I,' he replied; 'I am an unworthy sinner, but I believe that the Almighty became man, under the name of Jesus, the Christ, and that he died to bear the punishment of our sins, and that whoever believeth in Him shall obtain eternal life through his merits.' I now perceived that Lukma had forsaken the faith of his fathers, and adopted the religion of the English: looking upon him, therefore, as an apostate, I gave free vent to my anger, and out of this mouth many evil words went forth against him and against Jesus Christ! At length Lukma, finding that he made no impression on me, said—'There's no use in our talking; come to the Padree Sahib (the missionary), and hear what he has to say.' I went, and had a long conversation with the missionary. I often went to him after this, and had many arguments with him. For two whole years I fought with him, and at the end of that time the missionary (or rather God's Holy Spirit) conquered; and I have now for six years been the servant of Jesus Christ."

Thus ended the history of Lakhoram. And now, reader, what say you? On what do your hopes depend? On your own doings? What are they? Have they purified your heart? Remember what Kubeer says—and a greater than Kubeer—"By the works of the law shall no flesh be justified."

After hearing Lakhoram's history, I proposed to my four sable brethren that we should read a chapter in the Bible; each immediately produced his Maratha Bible, and we read the 12th chapter of Paul's epistle to the Romans (verse about), and then conversed upon it. I asked my new friends various questions regarding this interesting chapter, and their answers showed, with few exceptions, a clear understanding of its contents. The converts then produced Maratha hymn books, and we all joined in a hymn—Sukhopunt (the Bramin) leading. I then asked him to pray, which he did with much apparent fervour. My friends rose to depart; I parted from them with much regret. "When next we meet," I said, "we shall all speak one language; we shall be of one colour—all of one nation." "Amen," said Lakhoram. "Amen," said they all; and we separated, till we shall meet in that company whom no man can number—who have washed their robes in the blood of the lamb!

FARM OPERATIONS FOR MARCH.

(From the Irish Farmers' Gazette.)

Spring Wheat.—From the late fall of snow and continuous frost, the sowing of spring wheat must be much retarded; the early part of the month should, therefore, be devoted to getting in, with as little delay as possible, the usual breadths. In many cases this must be done by the spade and shovel, which will amply repay the farmer for the extra cost, as the land must be, in the greater number of instances, too wet and poachy to get in the crop with horses.

Winter-sown Wheats, if the land be dry enough, should be well harrowed, to break the crust formed by the winter rains, and mould the young plants, after which the application of the roller will be of service; but unless the land be sufficiently dry and firm, this work will be better left undone till early next month. The young wheat in drills may be horse or hand hoed, to destroy weeds and break the winter crust.

Oats may be sown any time during the month; but in medium dry soils, should be got in during the first fortnight. In lea land the oats are generally sown broadcast, on wide sets, and well harrowed in. In some localities the land is ploughed into ridges, from eight to ten feet wide, harrowed before and after sowing; and the furrows either dug with the spade or cut with the furrow-plough, and well pulverized by the drill-harrow, and then shovelled. Although a little more expensive, we prefer the latter mode of sowing lea oats; the seed is more evenly covered, it yields a better head with shorter straw, the crop ripens more evenly and earlier, the soda are better rotted, and the land turns up much cleaner and drier than if left flat. In broken land the same modes are applicable; but if the intention be to sow down with grass and clover seeds, it will be better to sow all corn crops in drills from eighteen to twenty-four inches apart.

Barley, in light, dry, early soils, may be sown by the middle of the month. It is the best crop to sow down grass and clover seeds, from the more ready nature of the straw and the small quantity of foliage it bears in comparison with oats.

Potatoes should now be planted with as little delay as possible. In damp soils they should be planted in lazybeds; in dry soils they may be planted in drills, twenty-eight inches apart.

Parsnips should be sown as early as possible in the month, in suitable, well-tilled soils (see Operations for last month); but when the land cannot be suitably prepared in time, it is a good plan to mix the seed with damp sand and store it in a dark, temperate place, till it shows symptoms of vegetating, when it should be sown. The mass should be turned over every second day for the first week, and every day after to prevent the seed from contracting blue-mould; and if found getting too dry, moistened with a little water, but not to saturation. In this way ample time may be obtained for preparing the land, and the quality of the seed proved, and an even crop insured.

Carrots may be sown between the middle and end of the month. The land should have been deeply ploughed and manured in the autumn. If not done at that time the manure should be well decomposed and deeply buried, or the roots will not be very long. In case the land cannot be prepared in time for this valuable root crop, the seeds may be prepared as directed above for parsnips, the object being to put the seeds in a way to germinate while the land is preparing, and thus time saved and a crop insured.

Cabbages should now be transplanted from the nursery beds for main crops, and make up the blanks in the autumn planted crops.

Cabbage Seeds of the flat Dutch, early York, and nonpareil varieties, should now be sown in well-prepared beds, for successional planting out by the end of May and in June.

Turnips or other root crops that remain undrawn or unstored, should now be drawn, or the land will be considerably deteriorated by the roots now vegetating rapidly, and the spring corn crops suffer proportionably. As soon as the roots are removed split the drills with the double mould-board plough, and harrow the surface well to distribute the manure equally before sowing the succeeding crops.

Ewes having lambed should have a moderate supply of turnips, with good sound hay. Some time previous to lambing, the shepherd should clip away any wool that may be on the udder, or the parts adjacent, least in the lamb's eagerness to suck it swallow some of the wool, which causes more fatality amongst lambs than anything else, the wool mixing with the coagulated milk, forming hard masses that are impossible of digestion. Comfortable quarters and shelter should be provided for the ewe and her new-born lamb, to protect them from the night frosts and piercing blasts which prevail at this time of the year.

Fat and fatting wedders should have abundance of turnips and hay; a little oil-cake or oats will be well bestowed, and salt should be given in their troughs: all parts subject to get foul and dirty should be kept trimmed and clean.

Milch Cows, those newly-calved, and springers will require more than ordinary care and attention. The milkers to have a sufficient supply of artificial food to keep them up to their milk in the harsh piercing weather henceforth to be expected; those newly calved to be kept warm and comfortable, and not exposed to chilling draughts, and have generous food, otherwise milk fever and paralysis are the usual results, which may be prevented by timely precaution; and the springers to have a moderate supply of roots with good hay.

Stall-feeding.—Now that the days are getting longer, and the air sharp and cold, the stall-fed cattle will require their quarters to be kept up to a comfortable temperature, otherwise they will go back, no matter what food is given them. Strict regularity should be observed in their feeding hours, and the food given in such quantities only as they will eat up cleanly, and any that remains after satiating their appetites immediately removed, which should be given to the stores. Keep their houses constantly clean, and the animals well brushed and curried.

Pigs.—Those put up to fatten should have a liberal supply of grain, to harden the flesh; and sows about farrowing should have abundance of succulent, nutritious food, and kept warm and dry.

Fences.—Finish without delay the formation and planting of new fences, and the plashing and laying of old ones; remove root and other weeds, and scour out the dykes.

Odds and Ends.—Turf for peat should now be cut. Repair roads; finish draining and subsoiling where necessary; scour out water-courses, ditches, and ponds; level and turn over old useless fences, mixing lime with them; quarry and burn lime for manure, and get into store all artificial manures wanted for the season.

SUNDAY READING FOR CHRISTIAN FAMILIES.

CONDUCTED BY

JOHN KITTO, D.D., F.S.A.

IN the hours not devoted to public worship and to the reading of the Scriptures there are intervals which must in some manner be filled up, if the Sabbath is not to be regarded as "a weariness," and which cannot properly be filled up by ordinary pursuits or recreations, or even from the resources of general literature.

The object of "Sunday Reading for Christian Families" is, therefore, to supply a felt want—to be useful—to afford instruction, and to furnish aid, under the Divine blessing, in building up the intelligent Christian character in knowledge and godliness. To these ends it must be read; to be read it must be readable and interesting; and to insure these essential conditions, the most effectual means will be adopted.

Each Number will contain, so far as can be embraced within its limits, A SHORT COMMENTARY UPON ONE OF THE LESSONS FOR THE DAY, and continuing in order; ARTICLES ON SCRIPTURE HISTORY, GEOGRAPHY, MANNERS AND CUSTOMS, NATURAL HISTORY, TRAVELS, &c.—all designed to form interesting elucidations of various portions of Holy Scripture; A NARRATIVE OF THE LIFE AND CHARACTER OF SOME REMARKABLE SCRIPTURE PERSONAGE; SHORT BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCHES AND ANECDOTES OF THOSE WHO HAVE BEEN EMINENTLY DISTINGUISHED IN THE CHRISTIAN CHURCH FOR THEIR SERVICES, HOLY LIVES, OR DEVOTED DEATHS; A PAPER ON RELATIVE AND SOCIAL DUTIES; SACRED POETRY; with A SELECTION OF MISCELLANEOUS ARTICLES, instructive and edifying. The writers, while traversing all the fields of knowledge for tribute to the Bible, and for nutriment on the "day of rest," will be deeply conscious of the responsibility they have undertaken, and will anxiously endeavour that "HOLINESS TO THE LORD" shall be plainly inscribed upon all the offerings they present to "Christian Families" for "Sunday Reading."

Each Number will be printed in a clear and beautiful type, cast expressly with a design for this work, and will contain Twenty-four pages of closely arranged matter. Sold also in Monthly Parts.

BRIEF HISTORY OF ST PATRICK'S PURGATORY, LOUGH DEARG, CO. DONEGAL.

The name of St. Patrick's Purgatory is, no doubt, familiar to our readers, as that of a place resorted to by hundreds of Irishmen, in the hope of obtaining a special cleansing from sin, through penitential exercises performed there, in conjunction with the merits and mediation of the Apostle of Ireland. In cases of compunction for sins of unusual magnitude, a penance of unusual efficacy is conceived to be found in a pilgrimage to the Island. The benediction of the great patron saint of the country is reckoned to have imparted to that spot a character of peculiar sanctity; and to have suffused its atmosphere with a kind of holy influence, which mixes, like sweet incense, with the petitions there presented to the Almighty, and causes the supplication of the sinful and unworthy who there confess their guilt and cry for mercy, to come with acceptance before the throne of the Majesty on high.

The history of this remarkable place is, however, but little known to people, generally; and we shall therefore, we trust, be doing a useful work, and rendering a service to the cause of truth, by putting our readers in possession of some facts, attested by Roman Catholic authorities of the highest character, which will enable them to form a better judgment as to how far the purgatory of Lough Dearg is entitled to any claims on our veneration from any real connection between it and the labours of St. Patrick; or as to whether it be a well-founded hope, or a spirit of delusion, that leads the poor sin-stricken pilgrim to look thither for consolation and relief, to be received in virtue of peculiar privileges bestowed on that island by the prayers and benediction of our Apostle.

The account which Dr. Lanigan gives of the place in his learned Ecclesiastical History of Ireland (vol. i., p. 368) is that which follows:—

"It will not be expected that I should waste my time with giving an account of the so-called Patrick's Purgatory of Lough Derg (Donegal), or examining if there could have been any foundation for attributing it to our Apostle. It is never mentioned in any of his Lives; nor was it, I believe, heard of until the eleventh century, the period at which the Canons Regular of St. Augustine first appeared. For it was to persons of that order, as the story goes, that St. Patrick confided the care of that cavern of wonders. Now, there were no such persons in the island in which it is situated, nor in that of St. Davoc in the same lake, until, I dare say, about the beginning of the twelfth century. This purgatory, or purging place, of Lough Derg, was set up against another Patrick's purgatory—viz., that of Croagh Patrick, mentioned by Jocelyn, which, however ill-founded the vulgar opinion concerning it, was less objectionable. Some writers have said that it got the name of Patrick's Purgatory from an Abbot Patrick that lived in the ninth century; but neither were there Canons Regular of St. Augustine at that time, nor were such abridged modes of atoning to the Almighty for the sins of a whole life then thought of. It was demolished in the year 1497, by order of the Pope, although it has since been in some manner restored."

The original Patrick's Purgatory, then, was at Croagh Patrick, in Mayo, near Westport, speaking of the pilgrimages made to which, the monk Joceline (in his Life of St. Patrick, written A.D. 1180, cap. 172) says that "Some of those who spent a night there stated that they had been subjected to most fearful torments, which had the effect, as they supposed, of purging them from their sins, for which reason also certain of them gave to that place the name of St. Patrick's Purgatory."

The account given in the Annals of Ulster (which Dr. Lanigan must have seen, though he does not quote it as his authority) of the destruction of the Lough Dearg Purgatory in the fifteenth century, with the reason assigned for the act, is curious enough in its way, and reads thus, as given by the learned Dr. O'Donovan, in his notes to the Annals of the Four Masters, at A.D. 1497:—

"A.D. 1497, - - - - - - The Cave of Patrick's Purgatory, in Lough Derg [i.e., L. Derg], was destroyed about the festival of St. Patrick this year by the Guardian of Donegal, and by the representatives [properly, representative] of the Bishop in the Deanery of Lough Erne [i.e. Cathal Maguire], by authority of the Pope, the people in general having understood, from the History of the Knight, and other old books, that this was not the Purgatory which St. Patrick obtained from God, though the people in general were visiting it."

We know of one old book, from which the people in general might have gotten that information, and which would have informed them, not only as to the History of the Knight, what was not, but also what was, the true Purgatory which St. Patrick obtained from God. Perhaps some of our readers, too, can tell what that old book is.

But what the History of the Knight was, we must confess we know not, and can only guess that it may have been Joceline's Life of St. Patrick, above cited, which might be so called, as having been written, as we know that it was, by Joceline, at the request of the famous knight, Sir John de Courcy.

It seems very probable that the destruction of the cave above described, by Papal authority, was brought about by the influence of that very distinguished individual, Cathal Maguire, who is said, in the passage just quoted, to have been one of the agents employed in the execution of the work; for he was a man of great eminence and learning, and "collected together many historical books," from which he compiled that valuable record, the Annals of Ulster, or rather the portion of those Annals preceding A.D. 1498, the year of his own death. He was also a Canon of Armagh and of Clogher, and Rural Dean of Lough Erne, as well as "representative of the Bishop," or perhaps his Vicar General, for fifteen years previously to his decease. His assistant in the destruction of the Cave was the Guardian, or head of the Franciscan Friary, of Donegal.

Thus, one might have supposed, there was an end to the concern:—"The people in general," exercising a wise judgment on the contents of what appeared to them trustworthy historical records, were convinced that it was a humbug; that the Purgatory to which Patrick had been directed by wisdom from on High was an altogether different one; and that the wrecking of this place, which they had been visiting under so false an impression, could be no act of profanity, nor occasion them any detriment. The Pope approved of the idea. And by two distinguished Irish ecclesiastical dignitaries the work of demolition was brought to a happy and successful termination.

But, however, the delusion revived—"The people in general" forgot what they had learned out of their old books; and in spite of Papal dooming and all, the idea of the sanctity of the station, as a proper place for salutary pilgrimages, has again taken hold of the popular mind; and so the place, as Dr. Lanigan says, "has been in some measure restored.' Of what vital consequence to the spiritual welfare and edification of Irish Christians the maintaining of the delusion was considered by some in high quarters, at the beginning of the seventeenth century, may be judged from a circumstance which we shall now mention.

By authority of the Lords Justices, who governed Ireland previously to the appointment of Wentworth as Lord Lieutenant in 1633, it appears that the Lough Dearg Purgatory was once more suppressed; a proceeding facilitated by the recent plantation of Ulster, including the parts about the lake, with Scotch and English colonists. But the sort of piety then fostered among the members of the Roman communion in Ireland could ill afford to resign without a struggle what was to them a source of so much consolation, so venerated a means of edification. And high influence was therefore to be called into action, to procure the reversal of the gloomy sentence which had fastened on "the so-called Patrick's Purgatory."

Under the protection of the Roman Catholic Queen of Charles I. of England, ecclesiastics of her communion were able to effect much at court. She herself maintained an agent at Rome, on a salary of £500 per annum. "And," adds the Rev. Mr. Gerrard, after communicating this fact to the Lord Deputy of Ireland, in a letter dated April 5, 1536—"We have had one here [i.e., at the English Court] above this twelvemonth, appointed by the Pope, a Roman born, and a priest; but what these men shall negotiate either there or here I know not."—Strafford's Letters, vol. ii., p. 2. Dublin. 1740.

One business, at all events, which "these men" set themselves to negotiate, was the revival of "St. Patrick's Purgatory," to effect which the Queen was gotten to address to the Lord Deputy of Ireland the following letter*:—

"My Lord Wentworth—I have before now addressed to you letters of recommendation, in regard to which I have observed on your part such a readiness to oblige me, that I am led to write to you myself, to convey to you my acknowledgments of your courtesy; and also to make a request of you, connected with a matter, in which you may further oblige me more than in anything besides; which is, that you will be pleased to allow, that the devotions which the people of that country have ever been wont to pay to a St. Patrick's place there, may not be abolished. They will make use of the permission so modestly that you shall have no reason to repent of having granted it; and you will do me a great pleasure. I have given the Earl of Antrim a commission to urge the matter with you; for which reason I shall add no more, than my assurance, that you shall find in me no ungrateful person, but one that will on all occasions give you proof of the desire she entertains to oblige you; and who will ever be

"Your very good friend,

"Henrietta Maria R."

The reply which the Lord Deputy gave to the above communication from her Majesty, was this which follows:—

"May it Please Your Most Excellent Majesty.—The gracious lines I received from your Majesty's own hands, concerning St. Patrick's Purgatory, I shall convey over to my posterity, as one of the greatest honours of my past life.

"For the thing itself it was by act of state decreed under the government of the late Lords Justices, before my coming into this kingdom; and since I read your Majesty's letter, I can, in truth, say, I am glad none of my counsel was in the matter.

"Yet, being now absolutely taken away, there will be a greater difficulty to restore it than would be barely to continue and tolerate such a devotion prohibited by a smaller power, or discontinued for a shorter time than this hath been.* Besides, the place is in the midst of the great Scottish plantation; and I fear, at this time, where some men's zeal hath run them already, not only beyond their wits, but almost forth of their allegiance too, it might furnish them with something to say in prejudice and scandal to his Majesty's government, which, for the present indeed, is by all means to be avoided.

* The original, in French, reads thus:—"Monsieur Wentworth, Je vous ay escrit cy devant pour des recommendations; ou je vous ay recogneu sy prompt a m'obliger, que cela me fait vous escrire moy m me, pour vous en remercier, et aussi pour prier d'une chose en quoy vous pouvez continuer a m'obliger plus qu'en aucune chose, qui est, que vous veuilles souffrir q'une devotion que le Peuple de ce Pais a toujours eu a une place a Saint Patrick ne soit point abolie. Je donne charge a Monsieur Antrim de solliciter l'affaire aupres de vous, c'est pourquoy je finiray en vous assurant, que vous ne trouverez point en moy une personne ingrate, mais une qui vous fera paroistre en toutes occasions le desir qu'elle a de vous obliger, et qui sera toujours

"Yet, considering we often observe, that may be had in due season with ease which, mistimed, may prove unsafe, and very difficult to obtain, my most humble opinion is, your Majesty might do passing wisely to let this devotion rest awhile, till there may be a fitter opportunity apprehended, by which to effect your Majesty's satisfaction therein; which gracious temper and forbearance shall also (in my judgment) dispose and bow all nearer your Majesty's desire, than any other ay that can for the present be taken.

"And I beseech your Majesty to honour me with this belief, that my duties, in fulfilling your commands, are so broad awake, that in all or any, where I may have the happiness or ability to serve to your Majesty's contentment, I shall not need the solicitation of my Lord of Antrim, or any other whatsoever, to incite me thereunto, there being nothing abroad which can put me so fast and diligently on, as my own great cheerfulness at home, which, unminded by any, shall, through all your gracious appointments, express me with all faith and attention.

"WENTWORTH.

The purgatory, then, had been for some years "absolutely taken away," by authority of the Irish government; and the Lord Deputy, though so anxious to oblige the Queen, was apprehensive that any attempt to revive the devotion there, with the sanction of the executive, would be attended with danger, from the feelings entertained on the matter by the inhabitants of the surrounding country; and yet, after this second suppression, the devotion has a second time been "in some manner restored," and multitudes throng to the place on the faith of a false tradition, so long since exposed and exploded by their own best authorities, in the hope of receiving healing virtues, and balm for their spiritual wounds, from its imaginary privileges. Three hundred and fifty years ago the Pope, the representative of the Bishop of Clogher, and the head of the Franciscans in Donegal, combined their efforts to put down the scandalous fabrication. But yet it remains to this day an object of cherished religious veneration, an object of confidence and faith, on which many a poor soul casts itself to find consolation and repose; and those multitudes of pilgrims, year after year, assemble there, no influence which they look to for guidance forbidding them, to do homage to the vain delusion.

And is there in this no danger to their poor, misguided souls? Or if there be, how is it that those violent efforts which we see so often applied—and so often, too, applied successfully—to prohibit the reading of the Scriptures of Truth, are never directed to the overthrow of what must now be acknowledged to be so manifest an impostnre? Why do none of those high authorities which are so earnest and zealous in the former cause, ever, even for decency's sake, direct their energies to enforce truth and circulate light in the quarter where it is so much wanted? When such pains are taken to watch Scriptural schools, and congregations of converts, in order to warn off from attending them any who may yet be in any measure under the influence of Rome, why is not a teacher appointed to reside on the way to the lake and island, whose duty it should be to tell all pilgrims going that way that they were trusting to an imposture, condemned by a Pope of their own, and having no other connection with St. Patrick than what was invented by the cunning of designing and covetous men, and received by the simple and credulous, in spite of the testimony to the contrary of the learned and respectable? And how excellent a work would it be, in connection with such negative teaching, to tell the poor people what was the real purgatory that God appointed for St. Patrick and for all mankind, to tell them that the Word which cannot lie assures us that the blood of Jesus Christ cleanseth from all sin; and that by it those that were afar off, in every place, without pilgrimage or visiting of sacred shrines, are brought nigh unto our Heavenly Father, and have secured to them acceptance, remission of sins, and unfailing peace.

* i.e., than 6 years or so at least. Viscount Wentworth having come over as Lord Deputy of Ireland in A.D., 1633, before which time the purgatory had been suppressed.

AURICULAR CONFESSION.

THERE is, perhaps, no point in controversy between the Churches of Rome and England, in which the laity have a deeper or, as it were, a more personal interest than that of the alleged necessity of the practice of confession, as at present enjoined by the Church of Rome. We propose to consider it with the same calm attention, and sincere anxiety to arrive at truth, which we hope has characterised our investigations upon the other points which from time to time have been treated of in our pages, and we invite the assistance of our able and learned correspondents in the discussion, convinced that whichever side truth lies on, cannot fail to reap the benefit of an earnest and searching examination, conducted in a candid and temperate spirit.

The Council of Trent, in its 14th Session, 1551. chap. v., as incidental to the (disputed) Sacrament of Penance, asserts that "the universal Church has always understood that the entire confession of sins was also instituted by the Lord, and is of Divine right necessary to all who have fallen after baptism;" and by its 6th canon decrees, that "if any one shall deny, either that sacramental confession was instituted, or is necessary unto salvation, of Divine right, or shall say that the manner of confessing secretly to a priest alone, which the Catholic Church hath ever observed from the beginning, and doth observe, is alien from the institutions and command of Christ, and is a human invention, let him be Anathema."*

Canon vii.—"If any one shall say, that in the Sacrament of Penance it is not, of Divine right, necessary unto the remission of sins, to confess all and individually the deadly sins, the memory of which, after due and diligent previous meditation, is held, even those which are secret, and those which are opposed to the last two commandments of the Decalogue, as also the circumstances which change the species of a sin; but that such confession is only useful to instruct and console the penitent, and that it was of old only observed in order to impose a canonical satisfaction: or shall say, that they who strive to confess all their sins, wish to leave nothing to the Divine mercy to pardon; and, finally, that it is not lawful to confess venial sins, let him be Anathema."†

Canon viii.—"If any one shall say, that the confession of all sins, such as the Church observes, is impossible, and is a human tradition, to be abolished by the pious; or that all and each of the faithful of Christ, of either sex, are not obliged thereunto once a year, according to the constitution of the great Council of Lateran, and that, on this account, the faithful of Christ must not be persuaded to confess during Lent, let him be Anathema."‡

We propose, in the first instance, to investigate the truth and accuracy of the assertion, that the universal church has always understood that sacramental, or secret confession to a priest, was instituted by our Blessed Lord, and is, therefore, of Divine right, necessary to salvation; and next whether it be true that the Catholic Church hath observed from the beginning the practice of confessing secretly to a priest alone. The importance of these inquiries we think cannot be estimated too highly, as, if they be once answered, on satisfactory evidence, in the affirmative, no one who believes in Christianity can refuse obedience to it as duty; and we shall begin by admitting in our judgment, the affirmative, if true, may be established, either by the express words of Holy Scripture, or by legitimate inference from what is written, interpreted by such an uniform understanding of the universal Church as is referred to in the foregoing passages.

The "quod semper, quod ubique, quod ab omnibus," what has been held "always, and everywhere, by all Christians," we at least ever shall deem worthy of the deepest respect, and presume to be true, till the contrary is demonstratively established.

The first question, then, is—Can there be found in the Holy Scriptures any clear or express institution of confession to a priest, by our blessed Lord or any of his Apostles? The second is, Is it capable of proof that the universal Church hath always considered as divinely instituted, and as such always observed, from the times of our Lord and his Apostles, the practice of confessing secretly to a priest alone?

I. As to the first question, we may observe, that the proof of the affirmative does properly lie with those who assert that such a passage is to be found in the Scriptures. The Council of Trent relies alone upon the 20th chapter of John, 22nd verse, which we shall presently consider; but it may perhaps, be satisfactory to our Roman Catholic readers first to know what eminent Roman Catholic writers have said upon the subject, which may assist them in considering both questions with greater freedom, than if we were to rely exclusively on our own reasonings, or merely Protestant authorities on the matter.

Maldonatus,* the Spanish Jesuit, a very learned writer and celebrated divine of the 16th century, who died in 1583, reckons up seven different opinions about confession, among the writers of the (Roman) Catholic Church—1. Of those who denied it to be of divine right, but held it to be useful in the Church, as Rhenanus and Erasmus. 2. Of those who make it to be only of ecclesiastical institution, and this, he says, is the opinion of all the canonists. 3. Of those who thought it came in by apostolical tradition, of which he reckons Theodore, Archbishop of Canterbury. 4. Of some divines who hold it to be instituted only by St. James. 5. Of others who hold it to be of Divine right, and not instituted by the Apostles, but insinuated by Christ, and for this he quotes Alexander Hales and Bonaventure. 6. Of some who thought it instituted in the Old Testament. 7. Of those who hold it instituted by Christ, but not as a precept, but by way of counsel or advice only, and for this he mentions Scotus and his followers

Natalis Alexander, a Roman Catholic theologian of high character (De Sacr. Confess., p. 229), admits that, from the ninth to the thirteenth century, many Catholics did hold that confession to God alone was sufficient to obtain remission of sins.

Peter Lombard,† generally called the Master of the Sentences, Bishop of Paris in the twelfth century, tells us that learned men were of different opinions, because the doctors of the Church seemed to deliver not only divers things, but contrary things—(i.e., they had no certain or constant tradition about them)—St. Ambrose, St. Chrysostom, and Prosper being in favour of confession to God only, while St. Augustine and Leo the First seemed against it; and Gratian, in his Decretum, (which was presented to Pope Eugenius III., who is said to have testified his approbation by conferring on him the Bishopric of Chiusi),‡ de. Pœniten. Dist. 1, states the authorities both ways, as to whether confession to a priest be necessary, or whether confession to God alone be sufficient, and, after summing up all the arguments and authorities, both from the Scriptures and the Fathers, concludes all by leaving the matter to the reader's judgment; for both opinions, he saith, had wise and pious defenders,§ adding in chap. 90, from the Penitential of Theodore, Archbishop of Canterbury, A.D. 690, that "some say that we ought to confess only to God, others that we ought to do it to the priest too, for each is not without great fruit in the Church; so that, let us confess our sins to God, who is the forgiver of sins, saying with David, 'I have made known my transgression to thee, and mine iniquities have I not hid. I said, I will confess my sins unto the Lord, and so thou forgavest the wickedness of my sin' (32nd Psalm)—yet, nevertheless, the institution of the Apostle should be followed by us, that we should confess our sins one to another, and pray for one another, that we may be saved. Therefore, confession which is to God alone purges away sins, but that which is made to the priest teaches how they are purged; for God, who is the author and giver of health and salvation, sometimes gives (this medicine of penitence‖) by an invisible administration of his power, and sometimes by the operation of physicians."

The Council of Cavaillon, in the days of Charles the Great (Charlemagne), A.D 813, held nearly the same words, stating that some confessed their sins to the priests, but not fully, acknowledging that it still remained a question whether men should confess to God only, or to the priests also; we give their words in the note.¶ It is abundantly clear, we think, from the foregoing authorities, that the doctrine of the divine insti- ¶ Sed et hoc emendatione egere perspeximus; quod quidam, dum confitentur peccata sua sacerdotibus, non plenè id faciunt. Concil Cabilon II., cap. 32. Sacr. Concil., Tom. 17, Lut. Paris, p. 1278. Quidam solummodo Deo confiteri debere dicnnt peccata, quidam verosacerdotibus confitenda esse percensent: quod utrumque non sine magno fructu intra sanctam sit Ecclesiam; ita duntaxat, ut et Deo, qui remissor est peccatorum, confiteamur peccata nostra, et cum David dicamus, Delictum meum cognitum tibi feci, et injustitiam meam non abscondi. Dixi, confitebor adversum me injustitias meas Domino, et tu remisisti impietatem peccati mei, et secundum institutionem apostoli, confitemur alterutrum peccata nostra, et oremus pro invicem ut salvemur. tution of auricular confession, whether true or not, was for many centuries disputed in the Church, and was far from being held "always and everywhere, by all Christians." Let us return now, however, to the Council of Trent.

The Council of Trent, we have observed, based the institution of confession, by Divine right, on John xx. 22—"Whosoever sins ye remit, they are remitted unto them, and whosoever sins ye retain, they are retained." If they could have found, in the whole body of Scripture, any text more to their purpose, we may fairly conclude, they would have founded the institution on it, and not on John xx. alone.

In our last number, in treating of the Power of the Keys, we gave our readers important extracts from Roman Catholic divines, going some way at least to the explaining of that text; but what we have here to consider is, whether it teaches the duty of Auricular Confession, as insisted on by the Council of Trent. That it does not do so expressly, or with that clearness which our Lord used in the institution of the undisputed sacraments of Baptism and the Lord's Supper, is plain, for not a word either of penance or confession is to be found in the passage; and Cardinal Cajetan, in his notes on this text, confesses, "that no precept of sacramental confession is contained in it," which subsequent writers, such as Vasquez, try to explain by saying that Cajetan means no more than that it cannot be proved out of this place. Ambrosius Catharinus*, Bishop of Minori, however (on Cajetan, p. 444), says, "that neither there nor in any other place doth Cajetan allow that Auricular Confession can be proved out of Scripture."

St. Bonaventure†, a learned writer and Cardinal, denies that Christ himself appointed the confession of sins, and, in commenting on this passage of St. John says, "it was not enough to have it implied in the priest's power, because it being a harder duty than absolution, it required a more particular command, which even Cardinal Bellarmine himself admits (De Pœnit., l. 3, c. 12, p. 451), when he says, "it is one of the most grievous and burdensome precepts, and, therefore, it must have a Divine command to enforce it"—a mode of reasoning in which we cannot agree, deeming St Bonaventure's argument to be much the stronger of the two—viz., that the harder the duty was, the more clearly it ought to have been expressed.

Bellarmine's words are so remarkable, that our readers may think them worth quoting at length.‡

Alexander de Hales§, a celebrated divine, known by the title of the Irrefragable Doctor, who died in the Franciscan monastery at Paris, in 1245, observes, in opposition to those who said that Christ instituted confession when he conferred the power of the keys, that if Christ had intended a command of confession, in John xx., it would have been expressed to those who are to confess, and not to those who are to absolve, as he did to those who were to be baptized, in John iii. Except a man be born of water, &c., so Christ would have said "Except a man confess his sins," &c., which we confess we think is an argument not without show of reason.

But if the doctrine in question cannot be found by these eminent writers of the Roman Church itself, in the express letter of Scripture, still it may be said that it is to be inferred from thence by what may be called necessary implication. We think our readers will be rather disposed to agree with St. Bonaventure, that it is not enough to have auricular confession implied in the priest's form of absolution; and Gabriel Biel• confesses he cannot find sufficient force to conclude the necessity of confession from the power of absolution being granted; to whose authority we might add many others, such as Nicol de Orbellis, Scotus, Guido Brianson, and Jac. de Almain, who all debate the matter at large, and give up the point, that Christ's granting a power of absolution makes it by implication a duty to confess to a priest; the last, De Almain (in 4 Dist. 17), admitting that "it is a false proposition that, when a form of judging is given, others are bound to submit to it; for all that follows is, that their sentence is valid if they do submit."

Having thus shown what eminent Roman Catholic writers have said, as to this mode of proving, by inference, that confession to a priest is a duty of Divine institution, perhaps we may venture to add something of our own on the matter, first premising that it may be fairly asked, when we are urged to rely for proof on a mere inference—1, Whether that can properly be said to be of Divine institution, and necessary to salvation, which depends on an inference, and is proved only by an inuendo? 2, Whether it be reasonable to assert that our Saviour there institutes a sacrament of penance, including auricular confession, when not only auricular confession, but the whole matter of such a sacrament is left undefined? As to the first, we think it will not be denied that the word "institution" means the expression of a positive command, in contradistinction to a mere moral or natural duty; and as the whole reason of such command lies in the will of the legislator, if that be not plainly discovered, the command cannot be said to be instituted. "Where there is no law there is no transgression," and a law is, in effect, no law if it be not sufficiently promulged. Is it not a strange thing then, to tell us of an institution by implication only, and yet at the same time to tell us that the matter so (pretended to be) instituted is no less than absolutely necessary to the salvation of sinners, as the Council of Trent does in the decrees in question?

As to the second question, the Council of Trent itself lays it down that this sacrament of penance consists of matter and form; the form is the priest's absolution, but the matter or materials of this sacrament are contrition, confession to the priest, and satisfaction, in performance of the penance enjoined by him. Now it is evident that not only auricular confession, but also contrition and satisfaction, are wholly omitted and passed over in silence by the Evangelist St. John. And is it not a very strange thing that our Saviour should be supposed to have instituted a new sacrament without alluding to the matter or materials of it at all, saying nothing either of the form or of any one of the three matters in which this sacrament of penance was to consist?

We have still, however, to meet the argument, that as our Lord hath made the priest a judge of men's consciences and conditions, it is necessary, in order to prevent him from proceeding blindly and indiscriminately, that he should know the merits of the cause, and not only understand the matter of fact, but all circumstances which may aggravate or extenuate it, which can only be attained by the confession of the party. Therefore (it may be argued), auricular confession is as necessarily implied in the text as absolution or retention of sin is expressed by it.

Those of our readers who have perused, in our last number, the article on the Power of the Keys, will, perhaps, think that the judicial character of the priesthood is not a matter to be assumed as proved, even according to ancient Roman Catholic writers, much less that they are exclusive judges of the state of the consciences of all their fellow-men, and that without appeal to the judgment of God himself. We think we have demonstrated, not only by the Holy Scriptures but the Fathers, that God alone can truly be said to forgive sins, and that the power of the priest is to declare forgiveness conditional on true faith and true repentance, and that, even such declaratory sentence is not infallible, but subject, like all other things human, to error, and therefore limited by the clause "clave non errante," meaning that it is only of force when the matter is judged with right judgment and no error is committed in the use of the keys.

We would, however, wish to go farther, and ask first—Is it certain that, even on such a confession as the Council of Trent requires, the priest will be able to form such a judgment as can be safely depended on, considering especially the intricacy of some cases and the ignorance of some priests? The great St. Augustine, at any rate, did not think so, when he said—"To what purpose do I confess my sins to men who cannot heal my wounds? To a set of men inquisitive in inquiring into the lives of others, but indolent to amending their own. And how shall they (who know nothing of my heart but by my own confession) know whether I say true or no? For no one knows what is in man but the spirit of man that is in him"• We shall presently see what St. Chrysostom and others say on the same subject. But we would ask secondly—What proof is there that the priest is made a judge of secret sins in thought only, as well as of open sins and public scandals, of which the Church took cognizance for the good of society, and the public honour of God? If a certain class of sins is reserved for the bishop why should not sin in thought only be properly reserved for the tribunal of God? Thirdly—We would ask, why, if it be true, as the Council of Trent admits, that sins might be, and were remitted, before the times of our Saviour, upon contrition only and confession to God, why might not confession to God now be sufficient, without confession to the priest also, since remission does not, in the nature of the thing itself, by their own confession imply confession to a priest? It is scarcely to be believed that pardon under the Gospel is not to be procured upon as easy terms, at least, as it was before, unless, indeed, the contrary be shown very plainly and by something stronger than a mere inference, even if the inference were of a much more stringent and unavoidable character than we have shown it to be.

II. We admit, however, that we have still to inquire historically, whether it be true that the Catholic Church has always observed from the time of our Lord and his Apostles, the practice of confessing all sins secretly to a priest alone?

This we shall not evade, but we are compelled, by the length to which this article has already run, and the importance of the subject, to postpone considering the historical question until our next number.

TALK OF THE ROAD—NO. XI.

Well, on Monday evening, the 4th of April, Pat was walking out to Jem's house, and he fell in with Jem, leading home a pair of Mr. Nulty's horses from the harrow.

"Why, is it working you were to-day, Jem?" said Pat.

"Deed is it," said Jem; "sure there's plenty to do, and the work so backward."

"Well," said Pat, "there was not a turn doing in Kilcommon to day; so I thought I would walk out, and have a bit of talk with you."

"And what are they idling for in Kilcommon," said Jem, "more nor here?"

"Sure it's keeping Lady-day we were," said Pat, "and Father John wouldn't allow plough or harrow to work itself."

"Well, now," said Jem; "I heard the queer talk to-day, between Mr. Nulty, that lives in this parish, and Mr. Smith, that holds the big farm in Kilcommon parish. Mr. Smith was coming up the road, and he stopped to speak to Mr. Nulty; 'and is it working you are to-day, Nulty?' says he. 'Yes,' says Mr. Nulty, 'sure Father Sheridan gave it out in our chapel yesterday that we might all work to-day, for he said the crop was too late.' 'Well, I'll bet you sixpence,' says Mr. Smith, 'that Father Sheridan has farming of his own to do.' 'Indeed he has,' says Mr. Nulty, 'as much as any of us.' 'Ay, that's the reason of it,' says Mr. Smith, 'and that's always the way whatever's their convenience is our duty; and if I'd only known that this morning,' says he, 'I'd have had every plough in Kilcommon at work.'† 'And why shouldn't we work to-day, and the work so backward?' said Mr. Nulty; 'ne'er a priest in Ireland should stop me, to please himself.'"

So then Pat and Jem had some talk about why Lady-day could not be kept on the 25th of March, because it was Good Friday; but we need not tell what they said about that, because we see one Brannigan has written a letter about it.

"And then," says Jem, "I wonder did God Almighty mean that the priests should be laying down laws for us to work, or not to work just as it suits their own convenience and their own crop."

"Well," says Pat, "if he did, wouldn't he put it in the Bible, or wouldn't the blessed Apostles say something about it? And there isn't a word about it in the Bible, that I can find; and sure, if it was in the Bible, wouldn't the priests tell us that much out of the Bible anyway? But I know what is in the Bible, and we are not to work on the Sabbath-day, and we are given leave to work on the other six."

"Ay," said Jem, "it's not much the priests seem to think about that; sure there isn't a shop in Ballyboy that isn't open on Sunday, ("and its worse in Kilcommon," said Pat,) and every one doing his business; and the publicans busier nor any other day, selling their whisky; and how can it be right for the publican to be selling his whisky, and doing his business any more than for the farmer to be sowing his ground and doing his? And who ever heard tell of a priest saying it was against the law of God for a shopkeeper to be doing his business on Sunday? But if any one of us goes to earn a shilling on a holyday to keep the children from dying of hunger, they are ready enough to tell us that it's against the law of the Church, and to put their curse upon us, and to take the bread out of the children's months for it; for who will give us a day's work when they do that on us?"

‡ "The second reason is taken from the difficulty of confession; for if there be any one matter in the Catholic Church more grave and difficult than another, without any doubt, that thing is confession. For what can be more troublesome, what more burdensome, than that even the most powerful kings and princes should be compelled to unfold to priests (who are men like themselves) all their sins, however secret, however base, however shameful, however dreadful even to him who confesses them, and to abide by the judgments of these same priests, and to undergo the penalties prescribed by them? So great is the difficulty of the whole thing, that it is altogether incredible, either that the prelates of the Church would have dared to impose such a law, or that the people would have been persuaded to receive it, and to observe it for so many centuries, unless it had been of Divine command, of Divine institution, of Divine promise. Therefore, the authority was Divine."

† Such a conversation did take place between two farmers on that day, who lived in different parishes.

"Well," said Pat, "and isn't it what they would do? Sure it's to think of the Church, and not of the Scriptures, that they want us; and why wouldn't they be harder on us about the laws of the Church, that they make themselves, than about the laws of God, that he wrote in the Bible? But I wonder which will be most thought of in the day of judgment, whether we kept the laws of God himself, or the laws of the priest."

"Well, then," said Jem, "If God's to be the judge, maybe he will think most about his own laws. And if that's to be the way, isn't it better for us to read the Bible now, and find out his laws for ourselves, if the priest is too busy about his own, to tell us what God's laws are?"

"Well, Jem," said Pat, "I'm thinking we'll have to keep to the Bible to know them; and sure enough that's just what I came to talk to you about. Do you mind what I said to you the last talk we had, how the Rev. Mr. Owens asked me would I be ashamed of Christ and of his word; and would I make Christ be ashamed of me? and what he showed me in the Bible about it? Well, I couldn't get it out of my head at all; and it was turning up in my mind every minute, that if I met Father John I'd be ashamed of Christ's Word, and that Christ would be ashamed of me, and I couldn't tell what I would do at all. Well, I was walking along the road on Saturday, thinking what would I do at all if Father John taxed me with reading the Bible; and while I was studying it, who should come up but Father John riding along, and when he saw it was ma, he just pult up along side of me, quite sudden. 'Is that you?' says he. 'It is, your reverence,' says I; and indeed, it's I that would be glad to say that same time that it wasn't. 'And what are you doing now?' says he. 'I'm working with Mr. Connor, of Kilcommon,' says I. 'That's not what I mean,' says he; 'you know what I mean,' says he; 'what are you doing now?' says he. Well, I didn't know what to say, and I hadn't a word in me at all, good or bad; and says he, shouting at me, that it would make you afeard to hear him, 'Is it reading the Bible you are?' says he. Well, it just came in my mind that minute—would I be ashamed of Christ's own Word, and would I make him ashamed of me? and my mind was just riz in me that minute, and so I up and told him, 'It is, your reverence,' says I, 'reading the Bible,' says I. Well, with that he got so angry you never saw Father John so like himself in all your life; now, you never seen a man so boisterous. And when his reverence got something easy within himself, with letting it out, he says to me, says he, 'And it's the heretic Bible you're reading, going to turn heretic,' says he. 'No, indeed, your reverence,' says I; "It isn't the heretic Bible, it's only the Douay Bible,' says I. 'And where did the likes of you get a Douay Bible?' says he. 'I got it from the Rev. Mr. Owens,' says I. 'And what business has the likes of him giving you the Douay Bible?' says he; 'why didn't he give the heretic Bible? like a heretic as he is,' says he. "It's ranter your turning,' says he. 'No, please your reverence,' says I, 'I don't rant none; and sure your reverence,' says I, 'the Douay Bible would not make ranters of us,' says I. 'It's a swaddler you are,' says he. 'and a jumper, and it's to the soup-kitchen you're going,' says he, 'and to hell; and it's spiritual prostitution,' says he, 'and it's taking bribes you are, and selling your faith, and your soul, and your God,' says he, 'for base lucre. But I'll be up to you now,' says he; 'I'll just give you your choice,' says he; 'there's the Bible and there's me,' says he, 'and which of us can do you most harm?' says he; 'so now make you choice—will you have me or the Bible,' says he, 'or will you give up the Bible or will you give up me?' says he. Well, now, I felt in myself that I was getting bolder and bolder all the time he was talking, and so, when he left a bit of room for me to put in a word, I just says to him, says I, 'since your reverence is so good as to give me my choice,' says I, 'I think I'll just stick to the Bible,' says I. Well, with that he took on so, that you wouldn't believe; and just then there was a parcel of the Kilcommon boys coming up the road, and he just turns to them, and says he, 'This is a souper,' says he, 'and a ranter, and a swaddler,' says he, 'and a jumper,' says he, 'and Judas that sold his soul for soup,' says he, 'and denied his God here to my face,' says he. 'No, indeed, your reverence,' says I, 'I got no soup at all, nor nothing else, nor I don't mean to look for any, nor take it if it was offered to me, and indeed it was not,' says I. 'Well it's going to be a turncoat you are,' says he, 'that none of your people was before.' 'Indeed I'm not, your reverence,' says I, 'if you don't put me out, and turn me yourself; but sure,' says I, 'your reverence won't put me out and turn me only for reading the Catholic Bible,' says I, 'sure don't the Catholic bishops say, in the first page of it, that it's good for Catholics to read, and sure, your reverence, it can't make anything bad of me; and so your reverence,' says I, 'may as well just let me alone for reading it, and it's not going to turn at all I am,' says I. But he didn't listen to me at all, but just went on to the boys; and with that they set up a shout after me, that you wou'd hear from that to this, and called me all that Father John called me, and more foreby; and it's I that was glad, when I came to a bit of a loneing, to try to get out of their way as far as I could; and ever so far I'd hear them shouting ranter, and souper, and jumper, and Judas, after me, that you never heard the like."

"Well, Pat," said Jem, "you're in for it now, anyway; but it's my opinion, if you can only hold out for a while, you'll have a deal of the boys, and myself too, to keep you company."

So if we hear more of what goes on in Kilcommon, maybe our readers will like to know it.

ARE NUMBERS A TEST OF TRUTH?

We would invite the attention of our readers to a few observations upon an argument often urged in support of the truth of the Roman Catholic religion—the argument of numbers—which seems to be considered by some as one of the strongest and most practical tests of religious truth. It is not unnatural to suppose that ordinary minds would willingly lay hold of any mode of reasoning which, by affording a short cut to the end sought, would relieve them from the toil and anxiety attendant on more detailed and minute inquiries and conscientious examination; and we believe that there are many persons who actually do feel confident that their religion is true, simply because they believe that the numbers of their religion are more numerous than any other.

The question we would now consider is, are there any real and satisfactory grounds for believing the number of the adherents of any religion to be a test of the truth?

As truth is always the same, so we suppose the proof that a religion is true must be of equal force in all times and all circumstances. Can this be said of the argument of numbers?

The religion which God gave to the Jews was certainly true, yet the professors of it were always a very small minority of the inhabitants of the earth.

For many hundreds of years the Christians were a minority in every nation of the world into which Christianity had spread. Did that make men doubt of the truth of Christianity? or if it had, would Christianity ever have extended over the world? Let this fact be well marked—Christianity grew, and converted so many nations, by despising, denying, and rejecting this argument of numbers, as a test of religious truth. How, then, can Christianity ever adopt the argument of numbers as the test of its truth?

If Christians, however, at the present day, should be so senseless as to adopt that test in rejecting which the ancient Christians conquered, they would only be condemned by it, for there are still more heathens in China and India alone, perhaps, than there are Christians in the world. God's Word tells us that this shall not be always so, but we know that it is so still.

Is the counting up of numbers any better argument among the different divisions which now exist among Christians? There are many who think it is. But what we want to see is, the reason and the truth of it, and how the fact really stands.

How far from home must a man go to count? will it do to count his own parish? and then, by the same rule, have to change his religion if he go into another parish? Will it do to take Ireland, and say, Here are four millions of Roman Catholics and only two millions of Protestants, so the Roman Catholic religion must be true? And, then, what should a man do in England, where the Protestants are twenty to one?

It is clear that if we take this argument at all for our guide, we must take all Christendom, and see who are the most numerous.

Now, is this an easy argument to decide by? How many of those who rely on the proof of numbers could give us even a guess at the numbers of the different divisions of Christians?

For the benefit of those who may fancy this method of deciding the question of religious truth, we give here an estimate of the numbers in almost the whole of Europe, and America besides. We take the population of each nation chiefly from Alison's History of Europe, a work of the highest authority in such matters. We take the proportions of the religious persuasions from various sources, and we think our estimate will be thought fair by those conversant with such subjects:—

France,	...	30 millions,	1-6th Protestants.
Great Britain and Ireland,	...	30 do.	5-6th Protestants.
Austria,	...	35 do.	1-5th Protestants.
Holland,	...	2½ do.	nearly all Protestants.
Sweden,	...	4 do.	do. do.
Norway,	...	1¼ do.	do. do.
Denmark	...	2 do.	do. do.
Switzerland	...	2 do.	2-3rds Protestants.
Prussia	...	15 do.	2-3rds Protestants.
Italy,	...	19 do.	1-9th Protestants in Piedmont &c.
Spain,	...	14 do.	all Roman Catholics.
Russia,	...	64 do.	4 millions Roman Catholics, nearly all the rest Greek Church.
Greece	...	3 do.	nearly all Greek.
Canada,	...	1¼ do.	half and half.
United States	...	21 do.	1-7th Roman Catholics.

South America, Mexico, and Cuba, 6 millions of Europeans and mixed races, nearly all Roman Catholics. As for the slaves in South America, being kept up by continued importations from Africa, we can hardly count them Christians.

We have not counted here the lesser states of Germany, in which the great majority are Protestants, nor the Greek Church in Turkey, Circassia, Georgia, &c., which are very numerous. Yet how stand the numbers now? Total, 250 millions, of whom are Roman Catholics, 103 millions; Church of England and Greek Church, 142 millions.

We do not rely upon this as a test of truth, but we commend it to the consideration of those who do.

We do not overlook the argument by which these numbers may be met. It will be said that the Roman Catholic Church is, at least, the largest body, taken by itself. We doubt the fact very much. The Greek Church is, perhaps, nearly as numerous. It may be said, too, that the Roman Catholic is the most united in itself. That, too, we deny. We shall take an early opportunity of showing that there are differences in it as great as any that exist among Protestants.

But let us take the argument as it is stated by Bishop Milner, the great English Roman Catholic controversial writer. He says that the word Catholic "is derived from the Greek word which means universal, and accordingly it has ever been employed to discriminate the great body of Christians, under their legitimate pastors, and subsisting in all nations and all ages, from those comparatively small bodies of Christians who at certain places, and in certain times, have been separated from it." Are the 142 millions really comparatively small bodies? or can the above be any sound reason for calling the Roman Church Catholic, and refusing to call the Greek Church Catholic, when it is notorious that the Greek Church is as old as the Roman and little less numerous. And when those two Churches parted asunder from each other, the Greek Church was certainly the more numerous of the two.

We place no reliance on this argument of numbers, because we believe it to be false—that is, we think it wholly without proof from reason or Scripture that the division of Christians which can count the greatest number of adherents must needs be right in everything which it holds and teaches.

But we are far from despising or undervaluing the testimony of the great body of the Church, and of Christians in all ages and all countries, to the cause of truth. The multitude in any nation, or in any age, may hold many errors; but that which has the testimony of the Church in all ages, and all countries, is deserving of respectful attention. This is far different from saying that the majority in any one age must be right in every opinion they hold

Now, is there anything which has had this general and agreeing testimony in all ages? The Catholic creeds, and those alone. The Whole Church, for 1500 years, agreed in testifying that those creeds contained the whole Catholic faith, pure and undefiled. The Church of England, the Greek Church, almost all Protestants agree in this to this day. We might almost claim the Church of Rome herself as still joining in this testimony now, as she did for so many centuries; for the Council of Trent, at their first meeting, recited the Nicene Creed, and testified that it was "That chief thing (principium) in which all who profess the faith of Christ do of necessity agree—that firm and only foundation against which 'the gates of hell shall never prevail!'"*

Yet it has come to be the great question at this day, between the Church of Rome and those who protest against her, whether that creed do or do not contain the whole Catholic faith. The Church of Rome now says it is not enough to hold that creed, unless we also hold what Pope Pius IV. added to it; and they give in this argument of numbers, that the largest single body of Christians at this day do hold that Creed of Pope Pius; and to this we reply, that the whole Church, for 1500 years, and a majority of the Christian Church at this day, and the confession of the Council of Trent itself, do all proclaim that the ancient Catholic creeds do contain the whole Catholic faith, complete and unmixed with error.

Hence it may be judged which of us has the best right to use the argument of numbers, and which of us uses it best.

* See Catholic Layman, Vol. ii., No. 14, p. 22.

And yet we do not receive that faith on the authority of any number of men. We receive it because we know alike from creeds and Scripture that it is the faith which Christ and his Apostles taught, and that it has come down to our times from them.

As for the argument of mere numbers, we again say, we distrust it, because we know it cannot stand at the judgment of Christ hereafter; and no argument can be worth anything now which cannot prevail in the judgment then. Suppose any poor mortal should then presume to say to the Great Judge, "I always tried to be of the religion of the majority," will not Christ say to him, with truth, "I gave you this warning from the beginning, and if you had searched the Scripture you would have found it—'Enter ye in at the narrow gate; for wide is the gate and broad is the way that leadeth to destruction, and many there are who go in thereat. How narrow is the gate and straight is the way that leadeth to life; and few there are that find it.'" *

WHAT TRADITION TELLS US OF THE BLESSED VIRGIN MARY—No. III.

CLEMENT OF ALEXANDRIA—TERTULLIAN.

In our last volume we inserted an article, headed, "What Scripture tells us of the Blessed Virgin," in which we printed all the passages of the New Testament in which we found any mention made of her. For the satisfaction of those who might be discontented with the meagreness of the Scripture accounts of her, we determined to publish, in a series of articles, all that we could learn on the same subject from tradition; and we have already given, in two articles, all that we could find concerning her in several Christian Fathers of the first and second centuries. To complete our account of the writers of the second century, it only remains for us to notice the two whose names we have placed at the head of this article—Clement of Alexandria and Tertullian.

We confess that in this examination we have some fear of being tedious. We have brought forward Father after Father only to say—"We can find nothing in this writer about the Blessed Virgin." It must be rather tiresome for a jury when a counsel puts witness after witness on the table, each of whom has nothing to say but—"I know nothing of the matter you have summoned me here to give evidence about." Our readers may ask—"why do you not skip over all the Fathers who say nothing about the Virgin Mary, and come at once to those who have something to tell concerning her?" This is the plan adopted by Roman Catholic collectors of quotations from the Fathers. They know very well that, with the generality of people, one Father is just as good as another, and that if they can produce a strong passage from any one in their favour, few will inquire in what century the writer lived, or whether he invented the doctrine himself or found it in the writings of his predecessors. Accordingly they are quite satisfied if they can produce a sufficient number of Greek or Latin authors in their favour, although, perhaps, they have not brought forward anything to their purpose from any writer who lived within four hundred years after our Savour's birth.

We, however think it very little use to inquire what was said on this, or on any other religious subject, in the sixth century, until we have first examined what was said on it in the first and second: for we are not bound to believe every doctrine that any pious person thinks proper to hold, but only such doctrines as he can show to have been handed down to him from our Saviour. We think it will appear from the present series of articles, that there is still extant enough of works written in the first three centuries to enable us to judge of the views held in their days with regard to the Blessed Virgin. The writers of the works referred to were so eminent that they could not have been ignorant of the doctrines then held by the Church, and the subject is so important that they would not be likely to pass it over in silence, had their views been the same as those now entertained in the Church of Rome. We have more than once remarked before, that we have had many proofs lately, that bishops who believe the Virgin to be the Queen of Heaven—the paramount intercessor with her Son—the most effectual help in all emergencies—do not think it right to abstain from frequently impressing on their people the duty of constantly having recourse to this means of obtaining assistance.

But CLEMENT of ALEXANDRIA certainly did not think it any part of his duty to give instruction to those whom he taught on the duty of seeking the intercession of the Virgin. This eminent Christian philosopher flourished at the close of the second century, at the head of the great Alexandrian cathechetical school, which attained so much celebrity, under the direction successively of Pantænus, Clement, and Origen. The writings of Clement which remain are sufficiently voluminous, and contain much valuable information as to the doctrine of the Church in his time. He speaks in them of our Lord's being born of a virgin, but he does not mention his mother with peculiar titles of honour, nor does he once hint at the addressing of prayers to her. And the following is one of several passages from which we conclude that in his time the Church offered no prayers to any but the Supreme God:—

"It is the extreme of ignorance to ask from those who are not gods as though they were gods. . . . . Whence, since there is one only good God, both we ourselves and the angels supplicate from him alone, that some good things might be given to us, and others might remain with us."—Stromata, book vii., p. 853, Oxford, 1715.

You are not to suppose that the heathen with whom Clement had to argue were so unenlightened as to worship other deities as equal to the Supreme God. They did, indeed, offer prayers to the spirits of deceased virtuous men, or to demons as they called them. We quote Clement's account of the defence which the heathen made for this practice, and we invite our readers to compare it with what is now said by Roman Catholic divines in defence of the worship of the saints—

"But they think that it matters nothing whether we speak of these as gods or as angels, giving to the spirits of such the names of demons, and teaching that they should be worshipped by men as having, by Divine Providence, on account of the purity of their lives, received authority to be conversant about earthly places, in order that they may minister to mortals."—Stromata, Book vi., p. 755.

Having failed to extract anything from Clement more to our purpose than the passages cited, we proceed next to TERTULLIAN, the celebrated Presbyter of Carthage. Of the general estimation in which this light of the African Church was held, we can give no better testimony than the anecdote which St. Jerome records of St. Cyprian—

"I saw one Paulus, who had seen Cyprian's secretary at Rome, who used to tell him that Cyprian never passed a single day without reading Tertullian, and that he often said to him 'Give me my master,' meaning Tertullian."—Jerome; vol. iv., part ii., p. 115.

Tertullian in his later years became a believer in the pretensions to inspiration of a fanatic, named Montanus. His later works must, therefore, be cited with caution. This circumstance, however, does not affect the value of his evidence on the subject we are discussing, since there is no difference in this point between Tertullian's earlier works and his later, and it does not appear that the Montanists had any disagreement with the orthodox relative to the Blessed Virgin.

Well, then, in all Tertullian we do not find a single allusion to the offering of prayers to the Virgin by any sect of Christians in his time; and, on the contrary, we find that he, as well as Clement, was possessed with the prejudice that prayers should be offered to God only. He says—

"These things I cannot ask in prayer from any other except him from whom I know that I shall obtain; because he is the one who alone grants, and I am one whom it behoveth to obtain by prayer."—Apology, p. 27, Paris, 1675.

And, again, he makes the following remarks on our Lord's command to pray in secret:—"By this precept he required in a man faith to believe that both the sight and the hearing of the omnipotent God are present under our roofs and in our secret places; and he desired the lowliness of faith, that man should offer his worship to him alone who hears and sees everywhere."—On Lord's Prayer, p. 129.

Our business, however, being more particularly with what this Father thought of the Virgin Mary, we shall quote his commentary on one of the passages of the Scripture in which she is mentioned. Although we printed it already in the first article of this series, yet, to make this Father's comment more intelligible, we print it here again:—

"While he yet talked to the people, behold his mother and his brethren stood without, desiring to speak with him; then one said unto him, Behold thy mother and thy brethren stand without, desiring to speak with thee: but he answered and said unto him that told him, Who is my mother and who are my brethren? And he stretched forth his hand to his disciples, and said, Behold my mother and my brethren. For whosoever shall do the will of my Father which is in heaven, the same is my brother, and sister, and mother."—Matt. xii. 46-50.

A Roman Catholic cannot deny that the first view of this passage presents him with difficulties. We find Jesus, who is commonly represented by them as ready to grant anything, no matter what, to the slightest wish of his mother, here refusing even to come out to speak to her; we find him, instead of pointing her out to his disciples as an object of their special veneration, and as holding a place in his dispensation which no other mortal was to attain unto, on the contrary, leading them to suppose that their place in his favour was determined, not by the closeness of their earthly relationship to him, but by their readiness to do his Father's will; and we find the Virgin Mary herself, instead of being among the most attentive hearers of her Son's discourses, "standing without," and summoning him away from his preaching. To those, therefore, whose principle it is to interpret Scripture according to the consent of the Fathers, we feel that we shall be doing a service if we lay before them what some of the most eminent of them have thought of the passage we have just referred to. The following is Tertullian's comment on it (De Carne Christi, vii., p. 315):—

"But what reason is there for the answer which denied his mother and his brethren? The brothers of our Lord had not believed on him, as it is contained in the Gospel. His mother, in like manner is not shown to have adhered to him; whereas other Marys and Marthas were often in his company. By this passage, finally, their unbelief is made evident. Whilst he was teaching the way of life, whilst he was preaching the kingdom of God, whilst he was engaged in curing sickness and evils, at a time when strangers were fixedly intent upon him, these persons, so nearly related to him, were absent. At last they come up, and stand outside the door, and do not enter—not thinking, forsooth, of what was going on there; nor do they wait; just as though they were bringing something more urgent than the business in which he was engaged—nay, moreover, they interrupt him, and endeavour to recall him from so great a work.

"Now I pray you, Appelles, and you, Marcion, if perchance, when you were playing at chess, or disputing about players, or charioteers, you were called away by such a message, would you not have said, 'Who is my mother and who are my brethren?' And whilst Christ was preaching and setting forth God, fulfilling the law and the prophets, dispersing the darkness of so many eyes, did he undeservedly employ this saying to strike at the unbelief of those who stood without, or to shake off the importunity of those who were calling him away from his work?"

The same writer says elsewhere on this passage—"Christ with reason felt indignant that whilst strangers were bent intently on his discourse, persons so nearly related to him should stand without, seeking, moreover, to call him away from his solemn work."—Adv. Marcionem, iv. 19, p. 433.

Here, then, we have Tertullian putting on the anecdote recorded in the Gospels the construction the least respectful to the mother of our Lord. He represents her as, at the time, not being a believer in her Son; he speaks of her absence from his preaching as censurable, and her attempt to interrupt him as deservedly calling forth the rebuke which it met with. When we find an eminent writer of the second century adopting views so unlike those now entertained in the Church of Rome, it is proper to ask—Does he fairly represent the sentiments of the Church in his day? Now, as we have pointed out the fact, that Tertullian became a schismatic in his later years, we think it necessary to show that his interpretation of this passage was that adopted by distinguished writers for very many years after; and though it somewhat interrupts our following the chronological order, we shall give the comment of St. Ambrose and St. Chrysostom on the same passage.

St. Ambrose says (vol. i., p. 1392)—"Whereas our Lord was about to instruct others, that one who would not leave his father and mother is not worthy of the Son of God, he first subjects himself to this same rule; not that he might disclaim the kindnesses of maternal piety (for his own rule is, He who honoureth not his father or mother, let him die the death), but because he acknowledges that he owes more to the mysteries of his Father than to the affections of his mother. Nor are parents unjustly discarded here; but the ties of the mind are represented as more obligatory than the ties of the body. They ought not to stand without who seek to see Christ; for if parents themselves, when they stand without, are not acknowledged (and, perhaps, they are not acknowledged for an example to us), how shall we be acknowledged if we stand without?"

But Chrysostom's comment on the same passage uses far stronger language (vol. vii., p. 407, Benedictine edition, 1718):—

"What I lately said, that if virtue be absent all besides is superfluous, this is now proved abundantly. I was saying that age, and nature, and the living in a wilderness, and all such things, were unprofitable unless our principle and our purpose were good; but today we learn something more, that not even the conceiving of Christ in the womb, and bringing forth that wonderful birth, hath any advantage if there be not virtue: and this is especially manifested from this circumstance—'Whilst he was yet speaking,' says the Evangelist, some one says to him—'Thy mother and thy brethren seek thee: and he said, who is my mother and my brethren?' Now, this he said, not because he felt ashamed of his mother, nor with the intention of denying her who brought him forth—for had he been ashamed he would not have passed through her womb—but it was to show that she would derive no advantage from this unless she did her duty in everything. Now, what she was then undertaking was the effect of EXCESSIVE AMBITION; for she wished to show to the people that she commanded and controlled her son, she having as yet formed no high opinion of him; consequently, she comes to him unseasonably. Now, see the foolish arrogance both of herself and of them!* Whereas they ought to have entered and heard him with the multitude; or, had they been unwilling to do this, to have waited till he had finished his discourse, and then to have approached him, they call for him out; and this they do before all, exhibiting their excessive ambition, and wishing to show that they commanded him with great authority—a point which the Evangelist marks with disapprobation; for it was to intimate this that he said, 'Whilst he was yet speaking to the multitude;' as much as if he had said—What! was there no other opportunity? What! could they not have conversed with him in private? And what after all did they want to say? If it was on the doctrines of the truth, then it was right he should propound to all in common, and to speak before all that others also might be benefitted. But if it was on other subjects of interest to themselves, they ought not to have been thus urgent. For if he would not suffer a man to bury his father, that his following of him might not be broken off, much more ought his address not to have been interrupted for things which were not of interest to him. Hence it is evident that they did this solely out of vain glory. And John shows this when he says—'Neither did his brethren believe on him!' And he records some words of theirs full of great folly, when he tells us that they took him to Jerusalem, not for any other purpose but that they might themselves derive glory from his miracles. If thou do these things, said they, show thyself to the world; for no one doeth anything in secret and seeketh himself to be conspicuous. At which time he rebuked them for this, reproving their carnal mind. For when the Jews reproached him, saying—'Is not this the carpenter's son, whose father and mother we know? and his brethren, are they not among us?' they, wishing to get rid of the charge, from the meanness of his origin, excited him to a display of miracles. He, therefore, gives them a repulse, wishing to heal their malady, since had he desired to deny his mother, he would surely then have denied her when they cast the reproach. On the contrary, he shows himself to have entertained so great care for her, that on the very cross he intrusts her to the disciple, who was his best beloved of all, and leaves many kind injunctions concerning her. But he does not so now, and that because of his care for her and his brethren; for since they approached him as a mere man, and were puffed up with vain glory, he expels that disease, not by insulting them, but by correcting them. . . . . And why did he chide her? He did not wish to excite doubt in her mind, but to remove the most tyrannical of passions, and, by little and little, to lead to a correct estimate of himself, and to persuade her that he was not only her son, but her sovereign Lord.* You will thus see that the rebuke was eminently becoming in him, and profitable to her, and withal contains much of mildness. So likewise when the woman cried out—'Blessed is the womb that bore thee,' he says not—'She is not my mother;' but, 'if she wishes to be blessed, let her do the will of my Father: for such a one is my brother, and sister, and mother!' Oh, how great an honour! How great a virtue! To what an exalted eminence does it carry one who embraces it? How many women have called that Holy Virgin and her womb blessed, and have longed to be such mothers, and to give up everything besides! What is there to hinder them? For behold he has cut out for us a broad way, and it is in the power not of woman only, but of man also to be placed in such a rank as that—rather in a much higher one; for this far more constitutes one his mother than did these labour pangs. So that, if that is a cause for calling one blessed, much more is this, inasmuch as it is paramount. Do not, then, merely desire, but also with much diligence, walk along the path which leads to the object of your desire."

* Lest our readers should entertain any doubt as to the accuracy of our translation, we give the original text of this sentence, with a Latin version—

Here, then, we find St. Chrysostom imputing to the Blessed Virgin "excessive ambition," "vain glory," unbelief in her son. It was no wonder that the Benedictine editors, though they do not ordinarily give marginal annotations, here cannot keep silence, but exclaim "Fair words, Chrysostom," when even Calvin puts a construction on the passage far more honourable to the character of our Lord's mother. But, however we interpret this passage, we have said enough to show that Tertullian's interpretation was not heretical, but was followed by the most eminent doctors of the Church. And we have said enough to show that the views held in that age, with regard to the Virgin's character, were very different from those entertained in the Church of Rome. Now-a-days, men would fain represent her as free from original sin. In the fifth century, and those preceding, the saints of the Church were so far from having any tradition to this effect, that they imputed actual sin to her without scruple. It seems needless to ask whether any of them addressed prayer to her. However, we hope in a future article to continue this investigation, in the case of the Fathers of the third century.*

ἐβούλετο γὰρ ἐνδείξασθαι τῷ δήμῳ, ὅτι κρατεῖ καὶ αὐθεντῆι τοῦ παιδὸς, οὐδὲν οὐδέπω περὶ ἀυτὸν μέγα φανταζομένη· διὸ καὶ ἀκαίρως προσῆλθεν. Ὅρα γοῦν καὶ αὐτῆς καὶ ἐκείνων τὴν ἀπόνοιαν.

Nam quod illa fecit, ex nimia ambitione proficiscebatur; volebat enim populo sese ostentare ac si imperaret illio, de quo nihil adhuc magnum imaginabatur, ideoque importune accesit. Vide ergo et ejus (matris ac.) et fratrum arrogantiam.

At nunc non similiter facit, ut illi (matri sc.) et fratribus suis recte consuleret. Quia enim illum nudum hominem consebant, atque inani gloria agebantur, morbum illum depellit, non ad contumeliam, sed ad emendationem. . . . . Et quid volens increpavit? Non enim ut illam (matrem, sc.) in dubium conjiceret, sed ut a tyrannico morbo liberaret, eo paulatim induceret ad congruentem de se opinionem, suaderetque ipsi, se non modo filium ipsius esse, sed etiam Dominum.

* The reader desirous of further information will find it in Mr. Tyler's work on the worship of the Virgin, in which he has collected with great industry the testimony of the Fathers on this subject. We have been much indebted to his work in these articles; and as far as we have followed his steps, we have not been able to find that he has omitted any important passage in which the Blessed Virgin is spoken of.

THE MORTMAIN COMMITTEE.

In our February number we noticed the well-known case of Metairie v. Wiseman, as illustrating the extent to which clerical influence is exercised by Roman Catholic priests in extorting dispositions of property in their favour from persons weakened by disease and old age. And we added the observation, that as the property so obtained was retained by those who, by their position, possessed undoubted control over the agents employed in the transaction itself, we have a right to assume that these means of procuring property are sanctioned by the doctrines and rules of that Church over which they preside. The next case pointing to the same conclusion, is that of Mr. Taylor, Weybridge. That gentleman, who had a family of two sons and three daughters, when in the 77th or 78th year, and in the full possession of health and vigour of mind, made his will, by which he gave the whole of his estate amongst his children, absolutely. About four years afterwards, when in his 81st year, and after a protracted illness of twelve months, and within three months before his death, in 1846, he made a new will, by which, after leaving all his property to his children successively, for their lives merely, the ultimate reversion in all was given to Dr. Griffiths, the Vicar Apostolic of the London district, and to his successors for the time being. And at the time of the discussion of this case before the Mortmain Committee, this ultimate reversion was vested in Dr. Wiseman.

The son of Mr. Taylor, from whose examination the foregoing facts are stated, and who is himself, of course, a Roman Catholic, states that, previous to the making of that last will, his father had stated to himself as well as to many others, that he would not think of leaving anything to the Church—that it was the most foolish thing in the world. He further stated, that at the time when his father first communicated to him his intention of making the will in favour of the Church, he could not think of reasoning with him on the subject, because he found him in that state that he was incapable of holding anything like an argument upon it; and that although naturally a very strong-minded man, from his long illness he had become exceedingly changed. As evidence of the extent to which that change had gone, he says that his father, at the same time that he declared the disposition he proposed to make, was for the benefit of his soul, and for the benefit of all their souls, assured him that he had left to his son personally £100,000, though his whole estate would not, if sold, realize anything like that sum, even including the devise to the Vicar Apostolic, and was, therefore, a mere delusion on the part of the testator.

Such was the evidence as to the circumstances under which this will was made. It did not appear by whom the will was suggested, nor whether there was any direct interference on the part of any spiritual adviser. It appears, also, that the other members of Mr. Taylor's family were so much under the clerical influence, and in so precarious a state of health, that Mr. Taylor, the gentleman examined, had determined to abstain from appealing to the law against the disposition made by his father.

In consequence of this indisposition on the part of the person most deeply interested in disputing the will, this case, at the time it occurred, did not come before the public. And the manner in which ultimately it was brought forward certainly reflects no little discredit on Cardinal Wiseman, and is in our judgment as remarkable an instance of equivocation as ever came before our notice.

It appears that in 1850, during the excitement consequent on what is called by Protestants the Papal aggression, the circumstances of the above case began to be whispered abroad. It was said that four children of an aged father had been disinherited, and that the Cardinal and his Church were to reap the benefit. Upon this an English Dissenter, a Mr. John Dean, who had heard the rumour, took the straightforward course of writing to the Cardinal, mentioning the report, and saying that he would be glad to be put in a position to contradict it. To this application the Cardinal did reply in a letter from which the following are extracts:—

"Dear Sir—I am much obliged for your manly and straightforward application to me. I never in my life saw nor spoke to nor corresponded with the late Mr. Taylor. I am not named in his will. Since coming to London I have had the pleasure of making the acqnaintance of Mr. Taylor's excellent family. I have visited them at Weybridge. I am on terms of perfect good understanding with Mr. James Taylor, the supposed disinherited son, who with his sisters, enjoys every farthing of his father's property."

Now, could any one, after reading that letter, have for one moment supposed that Mr. Taylor had in truth made a will disposing of his property substantially in favour of the Church, and that that substantial gift was, at the very time of writing the letter, vested in the Cardinal? and yet the letter is so worded that it is verbally true. The gift was not by name to Cardinal Wiseman, but by description it then belonged to him. The son and his sisters did then enjoy every farthing of the present income of their father's property; but yet, if that property had then been sold and distributed between the tenants for life, and those entitled in remainder, two-thirds of the proceeds would have gone into the pocket of the Cardinal. Now, what meaning did Cardinal Wiseman intend to convey to his correspondent? Mr. Dean, unaccustomed to the casuistical refinements which draw a distinction between a denial "simpliciter" and a denial "secundum quid," forthwith sent the Cardinal's letter to a dissenting journal. "The British Banner," who at once published it, with observations denouncing the report in question as a malignant lie. And we believe every honest-minded individual would have drawn a similar conclusion, and, trusting to the written statement of Cardinal Wiseman, have discredited the whole report.

Unfortunately for the Cardinal he trusted too much to the unwillingness of Mr. Taylor's son to bring before the public the wrongs that he had received; for, trusting to that gentleman's submission to his spiritual rulers, he incautiously ventured, in his letter to Mr. Dean, to refer to Mr. James Taylor, the son, as offering to give any contradiction he (Cardinal Wiseman) pleased to the calumny. This was going rather too far, and Mr. Taylor, although unwilling to involve himself and his family in litigation, still could not suppress altogether the feelings of disappointment and annoyance which his father's will had necessarily produced. He, therefore, published a letter, very different indeed in its tenor, from that which the Cardinal calculated on eliciting. He says:—"The bulk of my father's property is left to his children for their lives only; and upon their decease is given to the use of the late Dr. Griffiths, if living, and if not to the then Vicar Apostolic, for the London district, (then Dr. Wiseman) for the time being. The will contains no power enabling me to make any provision whatever in favour of a wife or children; but, on the contrary, my life estate is coupled with very stringent provisions against any attempt at incumbrance or alienation. Such a will appeared to me to create not a supposed, but a real and effectual disinheritance; and such I have always felt it to be. I should add, that the will was executed by a most kind and affectionate parent, after he had attained the age of 80 years and upwards, and when his mind was affected by severe illness, and in immediate contemplation of that great change, the approach of which renders the strongest and best prepared wholly unable to resist any influences which may be brought to assume the sanction of religion." Such is the mild unexaggerated statement of a son, who, when asked if there had ever been any interruption of filial confidence between him and his deceased parent, was able to answer—"I never to my knowledge had a word with him in the course of a long life."

And with such facts before us, may we not well urge our Roman Catholic brethren to examine diligently and earnestly the truth of those doctrines of their Church which place in the hands of the priesthood such powerful means of augmenting the wealth of the Church, at the expense and to the injury of those entitled by every tie of affection to the remembrance and consideration of their dying relatives? And ought they not vehemently to suspect the motives of those who, in maintaining these doctrines, thereby retain the power and ability of converting the fears and the weaknesses of their dying penitents into an unfailing fountain of wealth and influence for that great clerical corporation of which they form a part?

THE WORD "SACRAMENT."

The word "sacrament" only occurs once in the Douay Bible—viz., Epistle to the Ephesians, v. 32.

St. Paul wrote this epistle in the Greek language, and the word he wrote was μυστηριον; written in English letters this word would be "mysterion."

We promised in our last number to examine whether the Douay translators have done right in translating this word "sacrament."

First, we observe, that this Greek word "mysterion," occurs twenty-seven times in the writings of the Apostles and Evangelists—that is, in the New Testament.*

In twenty-six of these texts, the present Douay Bible translates the word "mystery;" in one place only (that place which we are now considering, Eph. v. 32), do they translate it "sacrament."

Now, if they themselves do thus acknowledge that the word must be translated "mystery" in twenty-six places out of twenty-seven, why do they translate it "sacrament" in the twenty-seventh place? If it was the common use of the sacred writers to use that Greek word to express the meaning of "mystery," as we see that they themselves confess it was, why do not they always translate it so?

It would take some very good reason to justify translating it "sacrament," in one place, when they themselves confess that "mystery" is the right translation in twenty-six other places. Have they any good reason to give?

We expect that some learned Roman Catholic will tell us, that it was the Latin translation of the Bible, commonly called the Vulgate, which the Douay translators professed to translate. They will tell us that this Latin translation was established by the Council of Trent, as the authorized Bible of the Roman Catholic Church, in these words:—"The Holy Synod determines and declares that this old and Vulgate edition itself, which is approved by the long use of so many ages in the Church itself, shall be held for authentic in public lectures, disputations, preachings, and expositions; and that no one shall dare or presume to reject it on any pretext whatsoever."—Session IV. They will tell us that this Latin translation, being thus the authorized and authentic Bible in their Church, it was the business of the Douay translators simply to translate this Latin Vulgate version into English, and that the proper English translation of this Vulgate edition is the true Bible in English, in the eyes of all Roman Catholics. And they will say that, since the Latin Vulgate version has the Latin word "sacramentum" in the place in question (Eph. v. 32), the proper English translation must be "sacrament."

We think we have here stated their argument as well as they would wish to state it themselves. And we now proceed to examine it, and to inquire whether they themselves think this a good and a certain rule, to translate the Greek word "mysterion," by the word "sacrament," wherever the Latin version has translated it "sacramentum."

We have already said that the Greek word "mysterion" occurs twenty-seven times in the Greek New Testament. Now, we find that the Vulgate, or Latin translation, translates this Greek word by the Latin word "mysterium" in nineteen places out of the twenty-seven; and in the other eight places it translates the same Greek word by the Latin word "sacramentum," and yet, when we come to examine the present Douay Bible, we find "mystery" in twenty-seven places, and "sacrament" only in one! So we find that in seven places where the Latin Vulgate puts "sacramentum" for "mysterion," the Douay translation gives "mystery" and not "sacrament;" and how, then, can they tell us that "sacramentum" being in the Latin, is a good reason for putting "sacrament" in English?

Why did they turn the Latin word "sacramentum" into the English word "mystery" in seven places, and translate it sacrament in only one place?

We shall tell the reason of this presently; but we must tell a little more of the history of this translation first.

The first Roman Catholic translation of the New Testament into English was published in 1582. It was then called the Rhemish, simply because it was published first at Rhemes; but it is the same translation since called the Douay, as we shall hereafter show.

In that translation they followed the rule of putting the English word "mystery" whenever the Vulgate had the Latin word "mysterium," and the English word "sacrament" whenever the Latin had "sacramentum." They did this in every place but one—viz., Apoc. or Rev. xvii. 7—"I will tell them the mystery of the woman and of the beast that carrieth her." In that place the Latin vulgate has "sacramentum," but they thought it too bad to put "the sacrament of the woman," because this woman is described, in v. 6, as "drunk with the blood of the saints," and to talk of her "sacrament" would have shown at once that the Latin word "sacramentum" does not mean what we understand by the word "sacrament" now; so they put "mystery." But in the seven other places where the Latin Vulgate had the word "sacramentum" they put "sacrament" for the English. Any one may see this who will examine that English translation published in 1582, in the places following—viz., Eph. i. 9; iii. 3, 9; v. 32; Col. i. 27; 1 Tim. iii. 16; Apoc. i. 20; xvii. 20. In all those places that first edition, and all the Douay Bibles, we believe, for long after, had the word "sacrament" in all those places, because the Latin Vulgate had "sacramentum." Yet, in every one of those places now except one (Eph. v. 32), in the present Douay Bible, this word sacrament has been put out, and the word "mystery" has been put in its place; as any one may see by looking at any of the Douay Bibles now published!

With what face, then, can they tell us that the word "sacrament" must be the proper translation in this place, because the Latin has "sacramentum," when they themselves confess that this rule led them astray in six other places, which they have felt constrained to correct by leaving out this word "sacrament," in spite of this rule? How can they tell us that our translation must be wrong, in having the word "mystery" in this place, when they themselves have felt constrained to alter their translation to "mystery" in six other places?

But why did they feel constrained to give up this rule, and alter their translation in six places out of seven? We believe it was simply because in those six places, they found it impossible to apply the word "sacramentum" in any one place, to any one of their seven sacraments! and it seemed, no doubt, dangerous to them to have the word "sacrament" six times standing for other things besides their seven sacraments, while in one place only could it be twisted to apply to one of their seven sacraments. So they altered their Bible in six places, so as to make it agree with the Protestant Bible, for fear it should be found out that the Latin word "sacramentum," in six places out of seven, meant other things besides the seven sacraments. For instance, look to Ephesians iii. 3, 4, in both verses the Greek has "mysterion;" the Latin has "sacramentum" in the 3rd verse, and "mysterium" in the 4th. The old Douay Bible had "sacrament" in the 3rd verse, and "mystery" in the 4th: but which of the seven sacraments could that be? Is it not clear that the Latin translators thought it quite indifferent whether they put the word "sacramentum" or "mysterium" for "mysterion" in the Greek? So the correctors of the Douay Bible in modern times put the word "mystery" in both verses. Again, in Ephesians i. 9, the word sacramentum was in the Latin, and sacrament in the old Douay Bible: but which of the seven sacraments could this verse mean? So it is now put out, and "mystery" put in its place.

In Colossians i. 26, 27, the Greek has "mysterion" in both verses, the Latin "mysterium" in v. 26, and "sacramentum" in v. 27. The same thing precisely occurs in 1 Timothy iii. 9, 16, and in Apocalypse or Revelation xvii. 5, 7, proving to demonstration, that the Latin translators used the word "sacramentum" merely in the sense of a mystery, and not at all in the sense of what we call a sacrament. As we have said before, the correctors of the Douay Bible have actually acknowledged this in every place but the one, by putting "mystery" in English for the Latin "sacramentum;" and with what reason can they now say that "sacrament" must be the right translation in Ephesians v. 32, merely because the Latin is "sacramentum?"*

The reason for believing that mystery is the proper translation in this place, we stated in the end of our reply to "J. B.'s" letter in our last number; we beg now to refer our readers to it again, and we venture to hope they will give it a fair consideration, now that we have shown them that, in twenty-six other places, the present Douay Bible has confessed that "mystery" is the proper translation of the same Greek word, even though "sacramentum" should be the word in the Latin, as it is in seven of those twenty-six places.

* Vis., Matthew xiii. 11, Mark iv. 11, Luke viii. 10, Romans xi 25, also in xvi 25; 1 Cor. ii. 7, and iv. 1, xiii. 2, xiv 2, xv. 51; Eph. i. 9, iii. 3, 4, 9, v. 32, vi. 19; Col. i. 26 and 27, ii. 2, iv 3; 2 Thes. ii. 7; 1 Timothy iii. 9, v. 16; Apocalypse i 20, x. 7, xvii. 5, 7. The reader will do well to examine all these places, and see whether "mystery" be not the right translation, and whether "sacrament" would make sense.

* Dr. Francis Patrick Kenrick, Roman Catholic Bishop of Philadelphia, whose recent translation of the New Testament, published in New York, in 1851, we have frequently noticed, has candidly translated the remaining passage (Ephesians v. 32), mystery, not sacrament; and states in a note, p 395, that he has preferred the literal reading of the Greek, lest he should seem to seek support for the sacramental character of marriage in an ambiguous word.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

Several valuable communications, from Mr. Power, Mr. Collette, and others, are necessarily postponed till our next, for want of room.

We have also been obliged to postpone the remainder of our reply to the letter of "J. B.," on the Disputed Sacraments, though in type, for the same reason.

We fear we have mislaid a letter of "Philalethes;" if so, another copy would oblige.

All letters to be addressed to the Editor, 9, Upper Sackville-st.

No anonymous letter can be attended to. Whatever is sent for insertion must be authenticated by the name and address of the writer, not necessarily for publication, but as a guarantee for his good faith.

We would request our valued correspondents, both Roman Catholics and Protestants, to limit the length of their communications, and not to discuss a variety of distinct topics in one letter.

Contributors of £1 per annum will be furnished with six copies, any of which will be forwarded, as directed, to nominees of the subscriber. Any one receiving any number of the Journal, which has not been paid for or ordered by himself, will not be charged for it, and may assume that it has been paid for by a subscriber.

The Catholic Layman.

DUBLIN, APRIL, 1853.

SEVERAL months ago the newspapers contained an account of a very remarkable circumstance, which was said to have taken place in the south of France, near Grenoble. The Blessed Virgin, it was stated, had appeared to two peasant children on the top of a mountain, called La Salette, and had communicated to them some mysterious revelations. The matter was much talked of, and quickly reached the ears of the Bishop of Grenoble, who examined carefully into all the circumstances of the case. The result was, that he professed himself perfectly satisfied of the truth of the miracle, and authorized the erection of a chapel on the spot where the miraculous appearance of the Virgin was said to have taken place. Numbers of pilgrims quickly flocked to this new shrine, attracted by the fame of the miracle, and deposited their gifts and offerings in the chapel of our Lady of Salette. The supernatural vision was, doubtless, often urged by the Bishop and Roman Catholic clergy as a lively and convincing proof of the lawfulness and propriety of offering up prayers to the Virgin, who had afforded such remarkable evidence of her power to hear and assist her worshippers.

But, alas! the brightest prospects will sometimes become dark and clouded; and so it was with the dawning fame of this new miraculous shrine. Cardinal de Bonald, Archbishop of Lyons, and Primate of the Gauls, was not so credulous as the Bishop of Grenoble. Whether it was that the clergy of the diocese of Lyons looked with wistful eyes at the streams of wealth which were fast pouring into the coffers of their brethren at Salette, and urged their diocesan to interfere, or whatever else the cause may have been, certain it is that a coldness sprung up between Cardinal de Bonald and the Bishop of Grenoble, which was followed by a sharp controversy as to the authenticity of the supposed miracle. At length the Cardinal issued a letter to his clergy, cautioning them against false miracles, which was published in a French periodical, called La Semaine Religieuse, from which the following is an extract:—

"In times of perplexity, pious, but imprudent, persons are found, who wish to have it thought that God interferes in a visible manner in human affairs. An effect produced by a natural cause, which is to them a mystery, is by them transformed into a prodigy; and without waiting to examine into it, or consult men of knowledge, they allow themselves to be deceived by false appearances, and declare miracles to be true which are very questionable. Some pecuniary speculations which intrude themselves into everything, seize upon this imaginary fact, and at the expense of the credulous, turn it into profit. Men greedy of gain soon dress out the history of these false miracles, and accompany them by false indulgences. What, then, is their grand object, but to procure dishonest gains, by trafficking in objects of superstition. We, therefore, forbid the publication of any miracle from the pulpit without previous permission, should its authenticity be attested even by another bishop."

We make no apology for introducing these excellent remarks of CARDINAL DE BONALD to the notice of our readers, some of whom may be disposed to attach far greater weight to his authority than to any comment which we could offer. We have marked one or two passages in italics, as it is possible that some persons may consider them applicable in other instances nearer home. And now, we beg to call the attention of our readers to this significant illustration of the boasted unity of the Church of Rome. We see here that two eminent Roman Catholic prelates are at open variance with regard to the truth or falsehood of a recent miracle; and the Cardinal goes so far as to assert pretty plainly, that the Bishop was issuing "false indulgences," and that "his grand object was to procure dishonest gains, by trafficking in objects of superstition." When we learn, on such unquestionable evidence, that these questionable things are done in the diocess of Grenoble, we are tempted to ask, is Ireland altogether free from the evils which Cardinal de Bonald so vividly describes? Is there among us any "trafficking in objects of superstition," whether by priests or bishops, "for the sake of procuring dishonest gains?" We sometimes hear that indulgences are issued in various dioceses in Ireland; and it is a serious subject of inquiry, are they, too, false, like those of the Bishop of Grenoble? These questions, we fear, will excite uneasy doubts in the minds of many of our readers; but we entreat of them again to remember, that we have not advanced these charges—they rest upon the grave and unimpeachable authority of CARDINAL DE BONALD.

To return, however, to the miraculous vision of the Virgin:—When we behold two Christian bishops flatly contradicting each other with regard to this event of such recent occurrence—the one asserting, the other denying, its truth—is it not a melancholy sight, and one calculated to afford a temporary, though disastrous, triumph to scoffers and unbelievers, and other enemies of our holy faith? Let us suppose that two of the early preachers of the Gospel, St. Peter and St. Paul, for example, differed in the same way about the truth of one of our Lord's miracles, what would the Jews and the heathen have said? "But," perhaps one of our Roman Catholic readers may reply, "St. Peter and St. Paul were inspired, and, therefore, there was no fear of their disagreement. Well! (it may be rejoined) what then? Does not the POPE claim to be infallible, and why does he not decide the point at issue? St. Peter, when he was alive, took special pains to assure his hearers that the miracles which he preached to them were not "cunningly devised fables" (Douay Bible, 2 Pet. i. 16); and he forewarns them that, in later times, "lying teachers should arise, who, through covetousness, should make merchandize of them with feigned words." —Ch. ii. 1, 3. When the Cardinal de Bonald testifies that these very evils now exist in the Church of Rome, why does not Pius IX., who claims to be the successor of St. Peter, lift up his voice and cry aloud, and tell the people of Grenoble, and the Christian world, whether the vision of the Virgin to the peasant children at La Salette is a miracle or a fabrication? But, alas! for all useful purposes, the chair of St. Peter has long been hopelessly silent.

THE TOUCHSTONE.

OBJECTION 48.—Protestants condemn the honour and veneration of angels.

Their Bible assures them, that God has given his angels a charge over us; and, consequently, expects that we should honour them as his ministers and our guardians. (Ps. xci. 11, 12.)—He shall give his angels charge over thee, to keep thee in all thy ways; they shall bear thee up in their hands, lest thou dash thy foot against a stone. (St. Matt. xviii. 10.)—Take heed that you despise not one of these little ones: for I say unto you, that in heaven their angels do always behold the face of my Father that is in heaven. (Exod. xxiii. 20, 21.)—Behold, I send an angel before thee, to keep thee in the way, and to bring thee into the place which I have prepared: Beware of him, and obey his voice, provoke him not, for my name is in him. Hence we read in their Bible, (Joshua v. 14, 15) that Joshua paid veneration to an angel, by falling on his face to the earth, &c.

REPLY.—Protestants do not say that God may not employ his angels to protect and save men; but as for worshipping them, we find it expressly forbidden.—Rev. xxii. 8, 9.

OBJECTION 49.—Protestants deny that it is lawful to make supplication to an angel,

Their Bible assures them that Jacob did it (Hosea xii. 4)—He had power over the angel, and prevailed; he wept, and made supplication to him.

OBJECTION 50.—Protestants condemn the invocation of angels as idolatrous and superstitious.

Their Bible recommends it by the example of God's servants, both in the Old and New Testament. Gen. xlviii. 15, 16. God before whom my fathers Abraham and Isaac did walk, the God which fed me all my life long until this day, the angel which redeemed me from all evil, bless the lads. And Rev. i. 4, Grace be unto you, and peace from him, which is, and which was, and which is to come, and from the seven spirits which are before his throne.

REPLY 49, 50.—The word angel signifies a messenger. And hence, any person or thing employed by the Lord to convey any message of his to man, is called in Scripture "the angel of the Lord." Sometimes the Lord manifested himself in a human form; sometimes in a flame of fire; as he did to Moses in the wilderness. And the voice which came there to Moses said, "I am the GOD of Abraham, the God of Isaac," &c., yet this is expressly called by Stephen "the angel."

Acts viii. 30, 38.—And whenever we read, as we do in the Old Testament, of worship offered to an angel, it was always understood to be the Lord Himself. But as for those angels who are created persons, we have seen that the worship of them is expressly forbidden.

OBJECTION 51.—Protestants deny, that the saints departed have received any power from God over us which may entitle us to have recourse to their prayers and assistance.

The Bible teaches, that they have received this power. Revel. ii. 26, 27. He that overcometh and keepeth my word unto the end (as all the saints have done) to him will I give power over the nations, and he shall rule them, even as I received of my Father.

REPLY.—Protestants would not scruple to ask one of the Apostles to pray for them, if present before them; as Simon the sorcerer did to Peter, and was not censured for it. But to suppose that saints can, after death, hear the addresses of millions of votaries in all parts of the world, is to attribute to them the power of the all-present God. And if it had been the practice of the primitive Church to invoke departed saints, we should surely have found mention of invocations of the Apostle James, the brother of John, after his being slain by King Herod (Acts xii. 1, 2.) and of invocations of the Virgin, &c.

OBJECTION 52.—Protestants are not willing to own, that the angels and saints make intercession for us, or offer up our prayers to God.

The Bible declares that they do. Zech. i. 12. The angel of the Lord answered and said, O Lord of Hosts: how long wilt thou not have mercy on Jerusalem, and on the cities of Judah, against which thou hast had indignation these threescore and ten years? Rev. v. 8 The four and twenty elders fell down before the Lamb, having every one of them harps and golden vials full of odours, which are the prayers of the saints. And Revel. viii. 4. The smoke of the incense with the prayers of the saints ascended up before God, out of the angel's hand.

OBJECTION 53.—Protestants are not willing to own, that the departed saints may receive us into everlasting habitations.

Their Bible expressly affirms it, St. Luke xvi. 9. Make to yourselves friends of the mammon of unrighteousness, that when ye fail, they may receive you into everlasting habitations.

REPLY 52, 53.—Protestants do not undertake to deny that angels and departed saints may make prayers for us; but for us to invoke them, implies that they can hear and know all that we say; which is in fact to make them gods. And they may welcome us into the "mansions" of bliss to which not they but Jesus Christ has "gone to prepare a place for us.' But as He alone is the giver of everlasting life, and as He alone is the one "by whom we have access unto the Father," to whom "no man cometh," says He, "but through me," and it is He who we are assured can hear us, we "come boldly unto the throne of grace, that we may find help in time of need."

OBJECTION 54.—Protestants deny, that the angels and saints know what passes amongst us; though they are ready enough to own that the devils know our works, and hear the petitions of their impious invokers.

Their Bible declares (St. Luke xv. 10) that there is joy in the presence of the angels of God over one sinner that repenteth; which could not be, if they did not know what passes amongst us: and how can any one imagine that they who see God face to face and know even as they are known (1 Cor. xiii. 12), that they, I say, who enjoy the Light of Glory, can be more ignorant of what passes amongst us than the devils who have no more than the light of nature?

REPLY.—For aught we can tell, everything that passes on earth may be known to some angel or other, who may be invisibly present, looking on at the occurrence. But we have no example in Scripture of any one paying adoration to an angel (except when it was a manifestation of the Lord himself) without being immediately rebuked and forbidden. As to saints, there is no reason for believing that they can be present here as well as in heaven.

OBJECTION 55.—Protestants generally are not willing to acknowledge that there is any particular respect due to the blessed Virgin Mary; or that she is any more than any other woman.

Their Bible plainly signifies that there is: in which she is declared by the angel Gabriel, and by Elizabeth, inspired by the Holy Ghost, blessed among women (St. Luke i. 28 and 42) and that all generations shall call her blessed, ver. 48. And whence is this to me, says the same St. Elizabeth (ver. 43), that the mother of my Lord shall come to me?

REPLY.—Protestants acknowledge that the Virgin Mary was "blessed among women;" but they hold that God only is to be worshipped and prayed to. And they find no mention of adoration paid to her in the New Testament.

OBJECTION 56.—Protestants believe that it is a dishonour to God, and reflecting upon his mercy, to have recourse to the prayers of his saints.

Their Bible demonstrates, that God is pleased that we should have recourse to their prayers, and will more readily hear them, than if we were only to pray for ourselves. Go to my servant Job, says God Almighty (Job xlii. 8) to Eliphaz and his friends; and my servant Job shall pray for you for him will I accept: lest I deal with you after your folly, in that ye have not spoken of me the thing that is right, &c.

REPLY.—If God had told any persons, instead of going to Job, and asking his prayers, while he was alive, to address him when he was, perhaps, a thousand miles off, or after he was dead, this would give some countenance to the practice of calling on departed saints. And we should thence have inferred that Job must have been a Divine being; but, as it is, the passage is nothing to the purpose. A Protestant would not scruple to ask a friend, whom he believed to be a sincere and pious Christian, to pray for him; though, after all, none but the all-seeing God can be sure of any one's piety and sincerity, unless he has, as Job's friends had in this case, God's own assurance of it.

OBJECTION 57.—Protestants deny, that God is pleased to work miracles by the bones or other relics of his saints.

The contrary appears from their Bible, where we read, (2 Kings xiii. 21), of a dead man raised to life by the bones of the prophet Elisha; and (Acts xix. 12), that from the body of Paul were brought unto the sick handkerchiefs or aprons, and the diseases departed from them, and the evil spirits went out of them.

REPLY.—Protestants never deny that God has, on many occasions, wrought miracles in various ways: but they refuse to believe any accounts of miracles that are not well attested.

OBJECTION 58.—Many Protestants deny, that it is lawful to have images in churches.

Their Bible expressly declares, that God commanded Moses to make two cherubims, or images of angels, and to place them at the two ends of the mercy-seat, over the ark of the covenant, in the very sanctuary itself, or the holy of holies—(Exod. xxv. 18, 19, 20, 21.) And there, says he. (ver. 22), will I meet with thee, and I will commune with thee from above the mercy-seat, from between the two cherubims, which are upon the ark of the testimony, of all things which I will give thee in commandment unto the children of Israel

REPLY.—Protestants do not object to images or pictures, in churches or elsewhere, provided they can be sure that no kind of adoration is paid to them, whether called Latria, Dulia, or Hyperdulia. The distinctions between these they hold to be not only unwarranted, but also such as the generality of the unlearned among the Roman Catholics themselves do not understand. Who will maintain that they do? And yet Roman Catholic divines hold that understanding, and attending to these distinctions, is essential for the avoiding of idolatry. Hence, when Protestants perceive any danger of any kind of adoration being paid to any image, they think it right to deal with it as Hezekiah did with the brazen serpent which Moses himself had made by divine command. He does not appear to have inquired whether they burned incense before it with Latria, or Dulia, or Hyperdulia; but he at once brake it in pieces. As for the cherubim there was no such danger from them, because they were kept in the holy of holies, to which none of the people had access.

OBJECTION 59.—Protestants deny the supremacy of St. Peter; that is, they deny that he was made by Christ the rock or foundation; or the chief Governor, and chief Pastor of his church.

Their Bible affirms it, (Matt. xvi. 18, 19), Thou art Peter [that is, thou art a rock] and upon this rock will I build my church, and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it. And I will give unto thee the keys of the kingdom of heaven; and whatsoever thou shalt bind on earth shall be bound in heaven: and whatsoever thou shalt loose on earth shall be loosed in heaven. Where our Lord, under the metaphor of the keys, declares his making Peter the chief governor of his church; as when the keys of a city are delivered to a man, he is made ruler or governor of the city. And that St. Peter was made chief pastor or shepherd of the whole flock of Christ, is evident from St. John xxi., 15, &c., where our Lord, after having asked him, Dost thou love me more than these? thrice committed to his care all his lambs and all his sheep—that is, his whole church.

Reply.—The charge given to Peter was afterwards given to all the rest of the Apostles also—Matt. xviii. 18. But supposing (which there is no reason to doubt) that he was the chief of them, answering to the chairman, president, speaker, &c., of any college or assembly, it is plain that he did not rule them as Sovereign, dictating to them their faith and conduct. We find Peter (Acts viii. 14) not sending them, but sent by them, along with John, to Samaria. And we find St. Paul openly withstanding him when he was to be blamed. By preaching to the Jews on the day of Pentecost, and afterwards to Cornelius, Peter did lay the foundation of the Christian Church among Jews and Gentiles. But if he, or any supposed successor of his, had had authority to decide infallibly all doubts and disputes among Christians throughout the world, St. Paul, when taking leave of the elders at Miletus, and foretelling their dangers (Acts xx., 28) would certainly not have omitted to refer them to Peter, or the Pope, or the Church of Rome.

Objection 60.—Protestants will have it that the Pope or Bishop of Rome is Antichrist.

The contrary is evident from their Bible (2 Thess. ii. 4) where it is said of Antichrist, the man of sin, that he opposeth and exalteth himself above all that is called God, or that is worshipped; so that he as God sitteth in the temple of God, shewing himself that he is God. No pope ever did this. Item 1 John ii. 22, where it is said that Antichrist denieth that Jesus is the Christ, which the Pope confesseth and maintaineth, and therefore cannot be Antichrist.

Many more articles might be alleged, in which the doctrine or practice of Protestants is condemned by their own Bible; but these sixty points are more than sufficient to convince all sincere lovers and seekers of truth, that the Word of God is on the Catholic side.

Reply.—If any man presumes, without being able to show any warrant for it in Scripture, to call himself Christ's Vicar and Vicegerent upon earth, and pretends to have the power of delivering souls from suffering in the other world (by the indulgences which he either gives or sells), this does look something like exalting himself into the temple of God.

Many passages, besides, might be cited from Scripture, to show that the Church of Rome has greatly departed from God's Written Word. But we have thought it best at present to confine ourselves to those which the Roman Catholics have themselves made choice of in this tract. And they invite all sincere lovers and seekers of truth to judge for themselves on which side the Word of God is; in which invitation we heartily concur.

THE USE OF BELLS IN IRELAND.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

Sir—As probably some of your readers may be ignorant of the importance of bells, in the eyes of no inconsiderable portion of the Roman Catholic population of Ireland, and others may feel a curiosity, at least, to know what pretence there is for baptizing them, as, it appears, is still the practice in some places, I beg to call your attention to the fact, which probably you are already aware of, that bells have always been deemed objects of peculiar, and even superstitious reverence by the Irish, and are so to this day, at least in some places.

If Father Colgan be to be credited, which no doubt he is, at least to the extent that the wonders he relates were extensively believed in his day, many notable miracles were, in old times, worked by bells, and bells were oftentimes consecrated by the Pope and sent to saints for men to swear by.

Colgan, in his "Acta Sanctorum," a volume now becoming very scarce and costly, tells us, that the Irish had a great reverence for bells up to his day; and that their most solemn oaths were by them. St. Gildas's bell was consecrated by the Pope, and sent to St. Cadoc for men to swear by. Various miracles were wrought by St. Ultutus's bell, and a King of Dublin was cured by applying St. David's bell to his cheek; to say nothing of the bell of St. Fursæus, that was miraculously sent by him, in token of fraternity, to St. Cuanna, from Peronne, in France, and was seen by him and his disciples, when they were together in the fields, hovering over them like a bird, which, says the good Father, comforted them very much;* nor of that of St. Fechinus, by which he brought Tyrechannus from Rome to Cashel, more than 1500 miles.† But I cannot pass over a still more remarkable instance of the importance in which bells were held by Irish saints, related at large by Colgan in his Life of St. Moedoc.

St. Moedoc was one day troubled that he had not asked St. David (whose bell cured the King of Dublin, before mentioned) who was to be his confessor in Ireland. Upon this weighty business, away he walks over the sea, towards Wales; an angel met him upon the sea, and chid him for his boldness, whereupon the saint plainly told the angel he trusted to God's omnipotency and goodness. But the angel (whom some will, doubtless, deem little better than a heretic for so doing), replied, that he went upon a needless errand, for he needed no confessor besides God himself; but if he would have a witness of his conscience, he should choose Molua. Upon this he resumed his journey (or voyage) home, but scarcely had returned when straightway he bethinks himself that his bell was in Britain (how he came to leave it behind him is somewhat unaccountable, especially as he had already worked great miracles with it—see Colgan, p. 210, ch. 19—unless it were to give occasion for the joyful and unexpected miracle which restored it!) for, lo! no sooner had he need of it than he beheld the cymbal forthwith coming over the sea to meet him! "which he receiving so miraculously," says Father Colgan, "gave God thanks for it."*

Such miracles or superstitions as these, collected among many others. In so grave a writer as Father Colgan, who obviously believed and intended his readers to credit every one of them,† will make more credible a story told by Bishop Jeremy Taylor, who was Bishop of Down and Connor in the year 1661, and whose name has several times been made honourable mention of, and sometimes by Roman Catholic writers, in your pages. See the 10th volume of his works, preface, p. cxxii. Ed. 1828.

"I was lately," says the good bishop, "within a few months, very much troubled with petitions and earnest requests for the restoring a bell, which a person of quality had in his hands in the time of, and ever since the late rebellion. I could not guess at the reasons of their so great and violent importunity, but told the petitioners, if they could prove that bell to be theirs, the gentleman was willing to pay the full value of it, though he had no obligation to do so, that I know of, but charity; but this was so far from satisfying them, that still the importunity increased, which made me diligently to inquire into the secret of it. The first cause I found was, that a dying person in the parish desired to have it rung before him to church, and pretended he could not die in peace if it were denied him; and that the keeping of that bell did anciently belong to that family, from father to son; but because this seemed nothing but a fond and unreasonable superstition, I inquired further, and at last found, that they believed this bell came from heaven, and that it used to be carried from place to place, and to end controversies on oath, which the worst man durst not violate if they swore upon that bell, and the best men amongst them durst not but believe him; that if this bell was rung before the corpse to the grave it would help him out of purgatory; and that, therefore, when any one died, the friends of the deceased, whilst the bell was in their possession, hired it for the behoof of their dead, and that, by this means, that family was in part maintained. I was troubled," adds the Bishop, "to see under what spirit of delusion those poor souls do lie, how infinitely their credulity is abused, how certainly they believe in trifles, and perfectly rely on vanity, and how little they regard the truths of God, and how not at all they drink of the waters of salvation. For the numerous companies of priests and friars amongst them take care they shall know nothing of religion but what they design for them. . . . . I speak that which I know to be true by their own confession, and unconstrained and uninvited narratives. . . . . and if this be religion, it is such a one as ought to be reproved by all the severities of reason and religion, lest the people perish, and their souls be cheaply given away to them that make merchandise of souls who were the purchase and price of Christ's blood."

The following paragraph I think deserves to be added, and does honour to the heart, as well as the discernment of the good prelate—

"Having given this sad account, why I did consent to be engaged in controversy, otherwise than I love to be; and since it is not a love of trouble and contention, but charity to the souls of the poor deluded Irish, there is nothing remaining but that we humbly desire of God to accept and to bless this well-meant labour of love, and that by some admirable ways of his Providence he will be pleased to convey to them the notice of their danger and their sin, and to de-obstruct the passages of necessary truth to them; for we know the arts of their guides, and that it will be very hard that the notice of these things shall ever be suffered to arrive to the common people; but that which hinders will hinder until it be taken away. However, we believe and hope in God for remedy, for, although the emissaries of Rome use all arts to keep the people from the use of the Scriptures, the wells of salvation, and from entertaining notice of such things, which from the Scriptures we teach; yet, as God found out a remedy for the Israelites of old, when the Philistines would stop the Patriarchs' wells, and the wicked shepherds of Midian would drive their neighbours' flocks from the watering troughs, so He will also for the poor, misled people of Ireland, and He will take away the evil minds, or the opportunities of the adversaries hindering the people from instruction, and make way, that the truths we have here taught may approach to their ears, and sink into their hearts, and make them wise unto salvation. Amen."

That your ably and temperately conducted publication may be extensively useful in furthering the prayer of this eloquent and pious man, Bishop Jeremy Taylor, is the sincere wish of your constant reader,

ON IMAGE WORSHIP.

25th March, 1853.

Sir,—I did not intend to have made any farther remarks on the subject of my former letter, image worship and miracles, but Mr. Collette's letter in the March number of your journal, has induced me to recur to it again.

My letter was a simple explanation of the relative respect which Catholics pay to images—similar, in fact, to the respect paid to the representations of those dear to us, and greater in proportion as those represented are more venerated, and that we are not called upon to believe in those miracles, which you seem to point out as essential to our faith. Mr. Collette concludes his letter with this charitable remark—"I am willing to believe that your correspondent Sidrach, and many other of our Christian brethren are Roman Catholics only from education, prejudice, and ignorance of the true Gospel of Jesus Christ; did they know the doctrines and teaching of their Church, and what true Protestantism is, they would cease to be members of the Roman Catholic Church." I agree with Mr. Collette, that if the teachings of the Catholic Church are such as you and he describe them to be, the sooner we leave her the better; but, without meaning any disrespect, I cannot take you as exponents of our doctrines, and be assured that if they were so much opposed to Gospel truth and common sense, as you suppose them to be, the many learned men who are daily overcoming education and prejudice would not embrace them. I know as a Catholic what I am bound to believe, but you fall into a grave error in not distinguishing between articles of faith, in which all Catholics must believe, and scholastic opinions or private considerations of which every individual may judge for himself. The respect for images is no article of faith, but a pious practice, recommended by the Church, and we find that it prevailed from the earliest period. We learn from Tertullian that it was usual in his time to represent our Saviour on the chalices as the good Shepherd (lib de Pudicitia). Eusebius speaks of an image of our Saviour in brass, which had been erected by the woman who was cured by the touch of his garment, and the historian Sozomen relates that the fragments of this statue were collected by the Christians and placed in their Church. Eusebius and Chrysostom tell us that the figure of the cross was held in great veneration; and even Martin Luther warmly defended our doctrine respecting crosses and images against Carlostadius. Dr. Hawarden teaches with Delphinus that if in any place there is danger of real idolatry or superstition from pictures, they ought to be removed by the pastor, as St. Epiphanius destroyed a pious picture, and as Ezechias destroyed the brazen serpent; and as Dr. Milner says, if you should become a Catholic, as I pray to God you may, I shall never ask you if you have a pious picture or relic, or so much as a crucifix in your possession, neither will you be required to believe in wonder-working pictures and statues. You will ask me on what ground would I defend making pilgrimages to the winking image at Rimini, or to the image in the Casa Santa, at Loretto. I do not believe in any power in those images,

Tunc Angelus venit ad eum, dicens, magnam audaciam fecisti. Respondit ei S. Moedoc dicens, pro audacia non fecit, sed pro Dei potentia et benignitate. Dixit ei Angelus non est tibi necesse habere patrem alium confessarium præter Deum. † As Colgan's work is so scarce, and some of our educated readers may feel curious to see in his own words the various uses to which bells were applied in his day, we think it may be acceptable to them to give the following passage in the original Latin. [Ed. C. L.]

"Tintinnabulum quo in variis usibus, more sanctorum totius patriæ et sæculi utebatur, c. 12.

"Frequentissima mentio tintinnabulorum, cymbalorum, et campanarum in vitis Sanctorum gentis nostræ et Britannicæ: utebantur istis in primis pro signo officii divini, tempore vicenti pro discipulis aliisve vocandis; item inter invocandum nominis auxilium contra ecclesiæ vel servorum Dei oppressores contemptores, vel aliter aliquid contra immunitatem ecclesiasticam attentantes. Et quis tunc, dum pulsabantur plurima fiebant miracula, in similium pœnitione experunt postea esse to magna veneratione apud populum, et plurima non solum contra ecclesiasticæ immunitatis violatores sed et in infirmitatibus curandis, in furtis et perjuriis detegendis aliisque omnis generis per ea fiebant miracula. Diebus nostris extiterunt plurima alia in Hibernia auro, argento et gemmis tecta, quæ magna experte ab hæreticis, luti auro et argento labentibus, sunt destructa; partim tempore persecutionis custodientium timore in puteos et cavas conjecta, vel alia negligentia deperdita, ex aliqua etiam parte pia Catholicorum devotione preservata, in magna habentur devotione."—p. 142.

but I consider that it is quite consonant with the religious feelings of those who believe that God has displayed extraordinary manifestations of his power in particular places, to visit such places, and pay to God there the tribute of their devotion; but not to pay it to images on any account, even though they stepped down from their pedestals and walked.

SIDRACH.

The remarks which we made in the November number of our journal (page 122). as well as our observations on the former letter of "Sidrach," have already put our readers in possession of our views on the important subjects which he discusses; and we do not deem it necessary to repeat them now. We have only space to make one or two brief observations on the new topics which "Sidrach" has introduced in his present communication.

He says that we have "fallen into a grave error in not distinguishing between articles of faith, in which all [Roman] Catholics must believe, and scholastic opinions or private considerations." This charge must have been advanced through inadvertence; inasmuch as, in all our discussions of the points of difference between the two churches, we have studiously endeavoured to guard ourselves against the very error which "Sidrach" condemns. Let him turn, for example, to the article on "Auricular Confession" in our present number, and he will find that in this, as in all other instances, we have been careful, not only to assign a prominent place to the decrees of the Council of Trent, but even to quote their exact words. If "Sidrach" will refer us to any other more authoritative exposition of the creed of the Church of Rome, we shall readily bring it forward. In the course of our arguments, indeed, it is sometimes difficult for us to avoid noticing "private" or "scholastic" opinions. Roman Catholic controversialists are so fond of insisting on the unity of their own Church, and the divisions of Protestants, that we have occasionally felt it necessary to prove that the Church of Rome has, from time to time, been rent asunder by as deep dissensions as any which can be alleged against other branches of the Catholic Church; but we have ever been careful to avoid the error of imputing the extreme opinions of individuals to the whole Roman Catholic body.

"Sidrach" goes on to state. that "the respect for images is no article of faith, but a pious practice recommended by the Church." This assertion of our correspondent surprised us not a little. We opened the decree of the Council of Trent (Sess. xxv.), which, after reciting that "due honour and veneration is to be paid to the images of Christ, the Virgin, and other saints," in the next paragraph adds the significant words—"If any person shall teach or think contrary to these decrees, let him be accursed." (Si quis autem his decretis contraria docuerit aut senserit, anathema sit.) Is the Church o Rome wont to recommend her pious practices to her people under the dread alternative of an anathema? We always believed that this terrible sentence was reserved for those obstinate heretics who rejected articles of faith. Yet here we see, that it is denounced against all who even think that "due honour and veneration" (whatever that may mean) is not to be paid to the images of the saints. Either. therefore, image worship is an article of faith, or else the Church of Rome is more uncharitable than our correspondent would willingly have her thought.

The next plea urged by "Sidrach" on behalf of this practice is. that it prevailed from the earliest period; and in proof of this he adduces some passages from Tertullian, Eusebius, and other writers. It is a dangerous thing to quote isolated allusions from ancient authors in support of opinions which they would be the first to condemn. We are sure that if our correspondent had ever read the following extract from Tertullian, he would scarcely have relied upon his authority in support of image worship. "When the devil," says Tertullian (de Idol. p. 86, Par. 1675,) introduced into the world manufacturers of statues, and images, and representations of every description, that rude trafficking of human calamity derived both its name and its profit from idols Hence every act which produces an idol, in whatsoever manner, becomes the head of idolatry. . . . . Consequently, every form or diminutive image must be called an idol. . . . . Wherefore, to eradicate the very basis of idolatry, the divine law proclaims: 'ye shall not make an idol;' and it forthwith subjoins; 'nor the likeness of the things which are in heaven, and which are in earth, and which are in the sea.'"

We invite the attention of our readers to this remarkable passage. Not only does Tertullian interpret the second commandment literally, as we have done—in accordance with the great body of English Divines, and against the decrees of the Council of Trent—but he goes much further, and does not hesitate to assert, that the devil was the author of the arts of statuary and painting. This very exaggeration adds to the value of his testimony against the prevalence of image worship in his day; for he never would have used such strong language in condemnation of these arts, if the Christians, in his time, notoriously venerated images. If "Sidrach," instead of relying on the authority of Bishop Milner, had taken the trouble to refer to the passage of Tertullian which he cites, he would have seen what little support it lends him. (The words are these (p. 563.), "cui si ille forté patrocinabitur pastor, quem in calice depingis . . . de quo nihil libentius bibas, quam ovem pœnitentiæ secundæ.") The allusion to the sheep renders it probable, that the cup referred to by Tertullian represented a scene from our Lord's well-known parable, not a personal likeness of the Saviour. but even granting that the latter is his meaning in this passage, which must be admitted to be very obscure, Tertullian does not assert that this was a prevalent custom in the Church; nor does he give the least hint that any special reverence or veneration was paid to this figure; on the contrary, he plainly intimates his disapproval of such representations, by adding the words, "Ast ago ejus pastoris Scripturas haurio, qui non potest frangi." "I," saith he, "imbibe the Scriptural representations of that Shepherd, who cannot be broken"—i.e., the history of Christ in his holy Word, the superiority of which Tertullian contrasts with frail, perishable memorials of wood or metal. To this picture of our Lord—a picture drawn by the pencil of the inspired Evangelists—we would earnestly invite the attention of "Sidrach," and of our other Roman Catholic readers. It is one which they cannot study too often, or prize too highly.

Eusebius is "Sidrach's" next authority, which he borrows, like the former, from Bishop Milner, who, as usual, overstates, or rather misrepresents the meaning of the original Eusebius does not assert that a brazen image of our Saviour was erected hy the woman whom he cured. He saw a brazen statue, indeed: but he takes care not to pledge himself to the truth of the story, for he twice uses the cautious phrase "they say," (ἔλεγον). Eusebius. as is well known, lived about three hundred years after our Lord, in which period many false stories and legends would naturally arise. He further adds, at the end of the chapter, a pretty severe condemnation of this practice of erecting statues, which he traces back to the times of heathen superstition. "It is probable enough," he says, "that those ancients, according to the custom of the heathens, were wont, unadvisedly, to honour all those after this manner as saviours, by whom they have been any ways benefitted." The Greek word is ἀπαραφυλάκτως, which Valesius (the eminent Roman Catholic editor of Eusebius) translates, "inconsiderate et imprudenter, contrá vetcrem disciplinam,"—i.e., inconsiderately, unadvisedly, contrary to the doctrine of the ancients. So much for the testimony of Eusebius.

We cannot now discuss the other passages cited by "Sidrach." from Bishop Milner. but we hope, on some future opportunity, to return to this subject. Meanwhile, we would request our correspondent (whose good temper and moderation we gladly acknowledge) to read the original authorities himself; and, unless we are greatly mistaken, he will see much reason to distrust his clever and plausible, but very unsafe guide.

TRANSUBSTANTIATION.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

SIR,—You will excuse the presumption of a layman if I protest against your tacit acquiescence in the view incidentally put by "Catholicus," of the question of Transubstantiation. I cannot believe it to be a question of figurative or literal interpretation of our Lord's words on the institution of the Eucharist. I deny that Roman Catholics interpret them as literally as Protestants, or that Protestants resort to as many figurative interpretations as Roman Catholics. To rest so momentous a question on any delusion of words is most dangerous. Misplaced epithets generate false ideas.

Both sides are too apt to think that the whole question in dispute turns on the "material" instead of the "spiritual" presence of our Lord's body and blood. The Roman Catholic controversialist thinks he has proved all when he advances his arguments in favour of the material presence. To me it appears that all that is worth disputing in his faith yet remains unproved. I am firmly convinced that the material presence is a mistaken view; but yet it appears to me a mere matter of abstract theory, not directly influencing practice or involving religious guilt.

The dead body of our Saviour, deprived of his "soul and Divinity" (the mere flesh), was not worshipped when laid in the tomb (1), nor the blood that flowed from his wounds on Calvary. Were a portion of one substituted miraculously for the consecrated wafer, and of the other to fill the chalice in place of the wine, it would, indeed, literally and exactly fulfil the words of the text, but it would form no grounds for believing that either or both of them were the actual Deity incarnate. We may believe the bread to be His body without perilling our souls upon our judgment; but we cannot offer the adoration that is due to God alone to the consecrated bread, without a tremendous risk.

This is the important point that controversialists usually omit. What exact name should be given to such an act of adoration, assuming it to be founded in error, I do not pretend to say. It may not, perhaps, be actual idolatry, for it is offered under the conception that the Deity himself is its object; but it certainly very nearly approaches it, and must, at least, involve an awful responsibility. The commands to worship none but God himself, "in spirit and in truth'—no material emblem of him—are plain and peremptory. We need commands as express to justify our adoration of aught in apparent violation of these. The onus is thrown on those who make an exception to a plain precept, to show that they do not bow down before senseless matter.

Bearing this in mind as the most momentous point in the doctrine of Transubstantiation, let us see whether the "literal" meaning of the words will justify such a dogma of the Divine and adorable presence, or whether the Roman Catholic doctrine be not only figurative, but even imaginative.

Let us take the words of institution in St. Matthew (2), as well as the explanatory version in the Corinthians, and then place after the text the authoritative definitions condensed from the Council of Trent (3).

St. Matthew says—"As they were eating," &c.

Council of Trent—"It must not be after eating, but after fasting."

St. Matthew—"Take eat," &c.

Council of Trent—"Not only eat this, but ADORE it as the Deity, and offer it as the same SACRIFICE that was offered by our Saviour on the cross."

St. Matthew—"Drink ye all of it," &c.

Council of Trent—"Do not ALL drink of it; let only the few who are ecclesiastics drink of it."

St. Matthew—"This is my body," &c.

Council of Trent "This is not my body, but my body AND blood, my soul and Divinity—the Deity."

St. Matthew—"This is my blood of the New Testament, &c.. and St. Paul and St. Luke—"This is the New Testament in my blood," &c. (4).

Council of Trent—"This is not my blood, nor is it the New Testament; but it is my blood AND body, my soul and Divinity—the Deity."

St. Matthew says—"I will not drink of this fruit of the vine," &c.

Council of Trent—"The fruit of the vine of which I speak is NOT the fruit of the vine: but is this Jesus Christ, who hold it in my hand, and say, I will not drink of it till," &c.

St. Paul says—"Is it not the communion of the body of Christ?" (5).

Council of Trent—"Is it not the body itself, and NOT our communion of (κοινωνια)—participation in—the body?"

N.B.—The sacrifice, or victim, and our participation in it, or its benefits, are two very distinct matters.

St. Paul says—"My body which is broken," &c. (6).

The Council of Trent says—"This is not that which Christ 'brake'—it is not το κλωμενον—not that which is, but that which shall be broken" (7).

St. Paul and St. Luke say—"Do this in remembrance of me."

Council of Trent—"Do not do this in remembrance of him who 'sits for ever at God's right hand,' but in his actual presence, with human body and incorporated Divinity."

St. Paul says—"For we being many are one bread and one body; for we are all partakers of that one bread" (8).

Council of Trent—"Neither of the breads here spoken of are literal, neither of them means bread, and both figurative meanings are different."

St. Paul says—"This bread," &c.; (9) but the Council of Trent says—"This bread, referred to thrice by the Apostle, after its consecration, does not, any one of the three times, mean LITERAL bread."

St. Paul says—"Not discerning the Lord's body."

The Council of Trent says—This is spoken of the unworthy; but it is only figurative, as neither worthy nor unworthy do literally discern (10) the Lord's body, which, though there. can never be discerned."

I trust, sir, that till "Catholicus" can explain these vital discrepancies we shall hear no more of the Roman Catholic being the literal interpretation! Whether it be the natural one is another matter—that we can argue separately; but the vulgar are apt to assume, that however that part of the argument might lean to the Protestant views, the letter of the text is with Roman Catholics. I cannot see any foundation for such a prejudice.

But for the space I have already occupied I should proceed to show that the Protestant interpretation flows

(1) We find Mary Magdalene sitting at the sepulchre (Mat. xxvii. 61). but worshipping him on his appearance after the resurrection (xxviii. 9).

( ) xxvi 26.

( ) I need hardly say, that the words themselves are not here copied, but what appears to be their short effect, as given in the Council, and as developed in the Catechism.

(4) 1 Cor. xi. 25. Luke xxii. 20.

(5) 1 Cor x. 16.

(6) 1 Cor. xi. 24.

7) This change of tense is made because it is supposed to identify the Eucharist with Christ's actual body that should be broken on the cross It is curious that it was not observed that it would have just the opposite effect. Christ's body was not broken on the cross; and some stress is laid on the fact by St. John, xix. 33—'They brake not his legs," and v 36—"That the Scripture might be fulfilled, a bone of him shall not be broken"

(8) Cor. x. 16.

(9) 1 Cor. xi. 26, 27. 28

(10) Whatever different translations may be given to this word, it cannot be literally understood by Roman Catholics from the words—ex vi terminorum: so that it is not fair to represent it as figurative. The word "is" has not been used simply for "represent;" the latter would not convey the whole meaning, nor could our views have been expressed consistently with the Jewish notions of the times—in any other words but those which inspiration has here employed.

In the sacrifice of the Passover the one victim was slain for the entire household: none participated in its benefits who did not partake of the flesh; to eat it was the mark of those who joined in it. The passage in the sixth chapter of St. John, does not refer to the Eucharist; but as both passages relate to the offering up of our Lord's body and blood upon the cross, both have parallel expressions of harmonious import. Except we eat of the great victim, except we participate in the great atoning sacrifice, we have no life. In this sense the Eucharist is—not represents—what St. Paul declares it to be, our "participation in the body and blood of Christ" (11). But this branch of my argument cannot be more than suggested, without trenching unreasonably on your space.

FONTICM PETITOR.

ON AURICULAR CONFESSION.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

SIR—Having read, in your February number of the CATHOLIC LAYMAN, what you have quoted from the "Touchstone," and your reply concerning private confession, you appear to me to think that no such practice existed in the Apostolic age; and I believe, from what I have seen of your research, that you are a competent person to tell when and where the practice began, &c.

I, though a member of the Roman Catholic Church, would be anxious to ascertain the truth, and would, therefore, feel greatly pleased and truly thankful if you would give your readers a historical specimen of the whole matter.

I have seen a statement made in a catechism, written by the Rev. E. Norman, Rector of Brosna, relative to Auricular Confession, which is as follows:—

"Q. When was auricular or whispering confession introduced?

"A. In the year 1215, at the fourth Lateran Council it was commanded as an ecclesiastical constitution, but not made necessary to salvation till the Council of Trent, about 1546."

But I am of the opinion that it was in existence long before that; for I remember to have read in a Protestant author—Bishop Burnet's "Exposition of the Thirty-nine Articles," p. 363—as follows:—"Penitents were enjoined to publish such of their secret sins as the penitentiary priest did prescribe. This happened to give great scandal at Constantinople, when Nectarius was bishop there, in the fourth century."

Again, I have read, from Bishop Chaloner's "Catholic Christian Instructed," p. 99, edition 13, Dublin. Speaking of Confession, he says—"We conclude with St. Augustine, that to pretend it is enough to confess to God alone, is making void the power of the keys given to the Church," &c. In proof of this, a reference is made to Homil. 49, inter alios. 50.

From these testimonies I have some reason to believe that private confession is of very early standing, &c.

I sincerely hope you will do me the kindness of inserting these few lines, &c.

I am, &c., yours truly,

A NORTHERN READER.

[Our correspondent will perceive that we have commenced the subject of confession in our present number, but have been obliged to postpone the historical part of it till our next, in which we hope to give him the information he very reasonably requires.—ED.]

ON JAMES V. 14, 15.

SIR—Permit me to express a different opinion from you on the interpretation of the text—James v. 14, 15—given in a paper headed the "Touchstone," in the February No. of the CATHOLIC LAYMAN, page 20, objection 36.

I shall first quote the text in full, then quote the interpretation you have given, next advance reasons which compel me to dissent from this, and afterwards propose a paraphrase expressing my own view.

"Is any sick among you, let him call for the elders of the Church, and let them pray over him, anointing him with oil in the name of the Lord, and the prayer of faith shall save the sick, and the Lord shall raise him up; and if he have committed sins, they shall be forgiven him."

The interpretation given is—"The gift of miraculously healing the sick, which is evidently what the Apostle is speaking of."

The following are some of my objections to this interpretation:—

1. It does not appear to me that gifts of healing were ever possessed generally by the Church to the extent which this interpretation supposes. It would imply that in every congregation, in every possible illness, of every individual, a miracle might be expected. The Apostles themselves do not appear to have possessed this power (2 Tim. iv. 20), where the Apostle Paul says he left Trophimus sick at Miletus.

2. It appears strange that if such a power existed in any individuals of each congregation that it should be necessary to tell them to apply for the exercise of such a gift. The people themselves must know it, and would be ready enough to use it.

3. It would appear from 1 Cor. xii. 9, 28, 30 and from ecclesiastical history (if dependence can be placed on it in this respect), that the gift of healing did not always reside in the ministers of the Church; but that laymen, and even women, possessed this power. It seems strange that these should not be alluded to.

4. The constant use of prayer, as the means of working the miracles spoken of, seems contrary to the general manner of God's dealing in this matter. The majority of miracles appear to have been suggested by Divine impulse. See among other places Acts xiv. 8; the use of prayer seems the exception.

5. The same argument may be applied to the use of oil. There is no instance after the ascension where oil was used.

6. The precept under consideration comes in among a number of precepts obligatory on the Church to the present day. It seems strange that one precept, the use of which was very shortly to cease, should be introduced among them.

These reasons render it impossible for me to receive the interpretation proposed in the LAYMAN, though it corresponds with that proposed by all the interpreters I can recollect, including Poole, who, however, hints another.

I, therefore, venture to suggest another—premising that though the style of St. James is very abrupt, and the transitions from one subject to another very rapid; yet that frequently we are able to discover a connection, or at least imagine a connection, in the mind of the Apostle. In this respect the Epistle is similar to the Book of Ecclesiastes. The connecting link in the mind of the Apostle in this case appears to be.—"Let a spirit of true religion, or a recollection of God as the providential ruler of the world, influence you under all dispensations." (I commence the paraphrase at verse 13.) "(Therefore) is any afflicted (in mind or estate) let him pray (to the author of the affliction). Is any (prosperous, and therefore inclined to be) merry? let him sing psalms (and thus acknowledge God as the Author of his prosperity). Is any sick among you (and therefore more especially under the hand of God, let him acknowledge God more especially, and to do this) let him call for the elders of the Church, and let them pray over (for*) him, (making use of the best means of cure, such as) anointing him with oil, (not with Jewish incantations, but) in the name of the Lord; and the prayer of faith shall (frequently) save the sick, and the Lord (by his blessing on the means used, or providential circumstance) shall raise him up: and if (the sickness has been sent, not merely as a trial of his faith, but because) he has committed (some particular) sins (1 Cor. xi. 30), they shall be forgiven him, (and his being raised up when this event does take place may be accepted as an evidence of God's forgiveness)."

The above paraphrase is somewhat long, but I have made it so in order to leave no doubt as to the meaning I endeavour to convey. I was anxious also, to use every word of the Authorized Version, and I have only in this respect made the alteration of the subjunctive into the indicative mood. I don't think it at all necessary to suppose that the elders were the persons who anointed, though the construction might seem to imply that. That might be the act of any individual connected with the sick man. Prayer was the especial duty of the elders.

If you cannot adopt this interpretation I hope you will at least excuse my sending it to you. This is the explanation I always give my own congregation, and I generally follow it up by some observations on the propriety of sending for a clergyman in case of illness, and not waiting till the last moment.

Yours, &c.,

J. M.

We freely lay the foregoing before our readers, and think it well deserving of attention. The passage cannot be deemed free from difficulty, and the most clear thing in it is, that it does not refer to Extreme Unction, as contended for by the author of the Touchstone, for the simple reason we have already given, p. 20 Roman Catholic priests administer Extreme Unction without any hope of being able to "raise up" the sick man; and, indeed, only when they believe him to be past recovery.—ED.

ON LADY DAY AND GOOD FRIDAY.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

SIR,—I'm entirely astray about Lady-day. I'm a poor man that doesn't know much, but I gets your newspaper (thanks be to them that sends it to me), and maybe you would ease my mind, for sure you know more about our religion than I do. Your honour knows that Lady-day always comes on the 25th of March, and it's the greatest holiday we have at all; there's nothing a man can do worse nor to work upon it. Stealing is nothing to it; why, it's worse even than eating meat on a Friday.

Well, your honour, Good Friday is no day with us at all; we never were asked to go to mass and we may work, or amuse ourselves, or do any idling the boys please.

Well, they say it's the day that our Blessed Saviour was crucified for us; and, indeed, many's the time it seemed strange to me, that we wouldn't be asked to say our prayers that day. But now it seems worse entirely; for this year Lady-day and Good Friday come on us altogether, just on the one day; and it's the great day for religion and mass, is Lady-day; and it comes about, that just because it's the day that our Saviour died for us there's no mass nor prayers at all, not on Lady-day itself. For sure we had no mass, and everybody was labouring or diverting themselves this Lady-day, just as if it was a common day; and a farmer beside me, that's cousin to the priest, had all the men in this side of the country setting his praties, just as if it wasn't Lady-day at all; and that's just what he would be read out in chapel for doing any other Lady-day that ever come. And all because it's the same day, too, that our Saviour died for our sins! Well, now, I want to know, when the Blessed Virgin was standing by the cross and watching him at his death, didn't she pray at all? And would she tell us that we musn't pray on that day? And the blessed Apostles, and the holy women that was looking on, didn't they pray? And why wouldn't we pray on that day now? Why, if Lady-day was ever so good a day for religion, how could it be spoiled entirely by being the same day that Jesus Christ died for our sins? and why would we have no religion at all on that day more nor any other day?

Your honour's obedient servant,

PETER BRANNIGAN, of Meath.

We have heard of this strange fact already, but we are rather at a loss to explain it or account for it. We do not suppose that the priests wish to prevent people from praying on Good Friday; but why do they refuse them public service just because it is Good Friday? We have just heard that there is a rule that they may not celebrate mass on Good Friday—a very strange rule, if true. We would be glad if any of our readers could tell us if there be such a rule, and, if so, if they could give us any authorities to show how old this rule is.

But even if there can be no mass, why should there not be public prayers on such a day? But we forgot—the prayers are in Latin, and the priests may think that when there is no mass, it can hardly be worth while to bring the people to the prayers that they cannot understand. Alas! for the ancient Church!

FARMING OPERATIONS FOR APRIL.

(From the Irish Farmers' Gazette.)

FROM the unusually great inclemency of the weather, farming operations of every description have been so much retarded as to increase the labour and render the next few months a time of anxious care and thought to the farmer, and require considerable exertions in pushing on the general routine work to make up for lost time; at the same time, we would recommend the exercise of the utmost care and caution, and rather do the work well and carefully than do it ill and hurriedly; for though early sowing is much to be encouraged, still it will be better to wait a few days (which may be confidently done) for weather to dry the land sufficiently to enable the harrows to work freely to get in and cover the spring corn, than to do so while the land is wet and poachy; and the same remarks are applicable in the preparation of the land for green crops, which cannot be pulverised as it should be if the land be not sufficiently dry to permit the harrows and grubbers to work freely.

Oats sowing should be proceeded with as the state of the weather and land will be found dry enough. In the poorer class of soils it will be necessary to increase the quantity of seed as the season advances.

Barley.—During this and the beginning of next month is the proper time for sowing spring barley. This species of grain delights in a well-pulverized and sharp, yet rich, soil. Its place in the rotation, like all other grain crops, is after green crops (turnips, &c.). Very often, however, we find the wheat or oat stubble set apart for barley, particularly the former, which in all likelihood had also followed a grain crop, but manured on the stubble. This is very bad farming, and no one who wishes to keep his farm in good order, or to reap the greatest amount of produce which it is capable of producing, will pursue such a practice. When barley is to be sown after potatoes, or such green crops as are raised at the end of the year, the land must receive a winter ploughing, clearing out all the furrows to prevent water from lodging, and in spring let it be cross-ploughed: after this, harrow and then plough the seed furrow. This treatment, if the ploughing has been sufficiently deep, will bring the land into a finely-pulverised state, and the crop will be stronger and more equal than if ploughed with only one furrow.

Top-dress wheat and other grain crops and meadow lands with guano, soot, superphosphate of lime, &c., in wet weather, or on the approach of rain.

BISHOP JEWELL'S CHALLENGE.

THERE has been proclaimed to the world, now nearly for 300 years, and never yet taken up, and responded to, by the party whom it concerns, this challenge, to which we solicit the serious attention of our Roman Catholic correspondents—

"If any learned man of our adversaries, or if all learned men that be alive, be able to bring any one sufficient sentence, out of any old Catholic Doctor, or Father, or General Council, or Holy Scriptures, or any one example in the Primitive Church, whereby it may clearly and plainly be proved, during the first six hundred years,

"1st, That there was at any time any private masses in the world: or,

"2ndly, That there was any communion then administered unto the people under one kind: or,

"3rdly, That the people had their common prayer in a strange tongue that the people understood not: or,

"4thly, That the Bishop of Rome was then called an Universal Bishop, or Head of the Universal Church: or,

"5thly, That the people were then taught to believe that Christ's body is really, substantially, corporally, carnally, or naturally in the sacrament: or,

"6thly, That his body is, or may be, in a thousand places at one time: or,

"7thly, That the priest did then hold up the sacrament over his head: or,

"8thly, That the people did then fall down and worship it with godly honour: or,

"9thly, That the sacrament was then, or ought now to be, hanged up under a canopy: or,

"10thly, That in the sacrament, after the words of consecration, there remaineth only the accidents and shows, without the substance, of bread and wine: or,

"11thly, That then the priest divided the sacrament into three parts, and afterwards himself received alone: or,

"12thly, That whosoever had said that the sacrament was a figure, a pledge, a token, or a remembrance of Christ's body, had therefore been adjudged for an heretic: or,

"13thly, That it was lawful then to have thirty, twenty, fifteen, ten, or five masses said in the same Church in one day: or,

"14thly, That images were then set up in the Churches, to the intent the people might worship them: or,

"15thly, That the lay people were then forbidden to read the Word of God in their own tongue: or,

"16thly, That it was lawful then for the priest to pronounce the words of consecration closely, or in private to himself: or,

"17thly, That the priest had then authority to offer Christ unto his Father: or,

"18thly, To receive the sacrament and to communicate for another: or,

"19thly, To apply the virtue of Christ's death and passion to any man by the means of the mass: or,

"20thly, That it was then thought a sound doctrine to teach the people, that mass 'ex opere operato' (that is, for even that it is said and done) is able to remove any part of our sins: or,

"21stly, That any Christian man then called the sacrament his God: or,

"22ndly, That the people were then taught to believe that the body of Christ remaineth in the sacrament as long as the accidents of bread and wine remain there without corruption: or,

"23rdly, That a mouse, or any other worm or beast, may eat the body of Christ (for so some of our adversaries have said and taught): or,

"24thly, That when Christ said, 'Hoc est corpus meum,' the word 'hoc' pointed not to the bread, but to an 'individuum vagum,' as some of them say: or

"25thly, That the accidents, or forms, or shows of bread and wine be the sacraments of Christ's body and blood, and not rather the very bread and wine itself: or,

"26thly, That the sacrament is a sign or token of the body of Christ, that lieth hidden underneath it: or,

"27thly, That ignorance is the mother and cause of true devotion:—Then, the conclusion is, I shall be content to yield and subscribe."—Sermon preached by Bishop Jewell, on March 31, 1560 (being the second Sunday before Easter). Vide Jewell's Works, Parker Society Edition, vol. i., pp. 20-21.

IS THE PROTESTANT BIBLE A CORRUPT AND MUTILATED VERSION OF THE HOLY SCRIPTURES?

THE authorised or Protestant translation of the Holy Bible into the English language, is often accused by Roman Catholics as being corrupt and false. We need hardly give many proofs of such a charge; and most of our readers will probably recollect the case of the monk who, about a year ago, was convicted at the Mayo Assizes, for having publicly burnt a Protestant Bible in that county.* He said it was not God's Book, but the devil's book that he was burning. We should not have mentioned this case, but have treated it as the act of a fanatic, which all sober men would join in reprobating; but that, after the monk was tried and convicted for the offence, the act was loudly applauded in the Tablet newspaper, which is the favoured organ of Dr. Cullen, Dr. M'Hale, Dr. Cantwell, and most of the Roman Catholic bishops. We shall not here repeat what we have already given at length in a former number, but shall merely say, that the Tablet praises the monk for what he did, saying, that it was indeed the book of the devil which Father John burned, and not God's book.

Now, this does not very greatly concern the discussions carried on in the CATHOLIC LAYMAN, because, as our readers must have observed, the writers in this journal do generally quote Scripture from the Douay Bible. Still the question is one full of interest, and is deserving of careful examination, whether the Protestant Bible be indeed a mutilated and corrupt translation.

We propose to give this question a full and candid examination. The charge of "mutilation" is commonly founded on the authorized Bible not giving the Apocryphal books as Scripture given by inspiration of God. We shall consider that question at an early period. We propose now to inquire whether the authorized translation of those books which both Churches admit to be inspired Scripture, be indeed a corrupt or a fair and honest translation.

We must consider briefly the history of the Bible in English.

When Saxon was the language spoken in England, there were translations of the Bible in the Saxon tongue, which were freely permitted to be read by the people. That was before the Church of Rome had taken up some of the doctrines she now holds, and before she claimed all the power she now claims.

There were several English translations made before the year 1407, one of which was by Wickliffe, a priest of the English Church. A council, held at Oxford in that year, forbad Wickliffe's translations to be read, but allowed of others sanctioned by the provincial councils.

At the time of the Reformation all these translations had disappeared from public use. The clergy had taken no pains to keep up a supply of English Bibles, and no man could read a word of the Bible for himself, unless he knew Latin, except a very few, who still preserved some of the old copies in their families.

It was then the great object of all who wished to restore the purity of doctrine, and to weed out errors that had crept in, to produce an English translation of the Bible.

There were several editions of the Bible in English published by the Reformers, from the beginning of the Reformation to the year 1580—that is, in about 50 years.

The Roman Catholic translation of the New Testament only, was first published in the year 1582. The translators were Cardinal Allen, Dr. Gregory Martin, and others.

They say, in the preface, that they have the Old Testament lying by them for lack of means to publish the whole, so they publish only the New. This they did at the town of Rhemes, in Flanders, in the year above mentioned, 1582. The Old Testament, though then prepared, was not published until twenty years after. It was then published at Douay, from whence came the name of the Douay Bible. The New Testament was at first called the Rhemish Testament, from the town of Rhemes; but the translation was in fact all one, and when both Old and New were published together, the whole was called the Douay Bible.

The translators have told us, in the preface of that first Rhemish Testament, the reason of their making this translation—"Which translation we do not, for all that publish upon erroneous opinion of necessity, that the Holy Scripture should always be in our mother tongue . . or that we generally and absolutely deemed it more convenient in itself, and more agreeable to God's Word and honour, or edification of the faithful, to have them turned into vulgar tongues, than to be kept and studied only in the ecclesiastical or learned languages. Not for these, nor any such like causes, do we translate this Sacred Book; but upon special consideration of the present time, state, and condition of our country, unto which divers things are either necessary or profitable, or medicinable now, that otherwise, in the peace of the Church, were neither much requisite nor, perchance, wholly tolerable."

So it seems they thought it would have been better if they could have gone on without any English translation at all. If the Church could have been kept in peace (that is, without any searching of the Scriptures at all), then it would not have been "wholly tolerable" to have published even the Douay translation of the Bible.

But they go on to say that there is no way of meeting false translations of the Scriptures but by giving true ones, "which causeth the Holy Church not to forbid utterly any Catholic translation." So it seems that, only for the necessity of giving a true translation, in order to meet false ones, the Church of Rome might, perhaps, have "forbid utterly" a Catholic translation. They go on to speak with great approbation of "the order which was taken by the deputies of the late famous Council of Trent, and confirmed by supreme authority, that the Holy Scriptures, though truly and Catholicly translated into vulgar tongues, yet may not be indifferently read of all men, nor of any other than such as have express licence thereunto of their lawful ordinaries or bishops." Although they lament that this rule, "in these days of ours, cannot be so precisely observed as in other times and places where there is more due respect of the Church's authority, rule, and discipline," they go on to praise the good old times, when Bibles were only "in libraries, monasteries, colleges, churches, in bishops, priests, and some other devout and principal laymen's houses and hands;" and, to show the great advantage of that state of things, they say—"The poor ploughman could then, in labouring the ground, sing the hyms and psalms, either in known or unknown languages, as they heard them in the Holy Church, though they could neither read, NOR KNOW THE SENSE, MEANING, AND MYSTERIES OF THE SAME."

They evidently thought it would have been a fine thing if the poor ploughmen could have gone on this way for ever, repeating holy words like parrots, without knowing what they meant; for they go on to say—"The wise will not here regard what some wilful

* See 1st Vol. CATHOLIC LAYMAN, p. 41.

People do mutter, that the Scriptures are made for all men, and that it is of envy that the priests do keep the holy book from them. . . . . No, no; the Church DOTH IT to keep them from blind, ignorant presumption, and from that which the Apostle calleth knowledge, falsely so called; and not to debar them from the true knowledge of Christ."

It was not, therefore, from any desire that the people should be able to read God's Word that the Douay translation was made. It was simply because that was the only way to keep the people from reading the Protestant translations.

Of those translations, the Douay translators say, in this preface—"The Protestants . . . . have so abused the people, and many other in the world not unwise, that by their false translations they have, instead of God's law and testament, and for Christ's written will and word, given their own wicked writing and phantasies;" and they also charge them with "adding whole sentences, proper to their sect, into their psalms in metre, even into the very creed in rhyme, all which the poor deceived people say and sing, as though they were God's own Word, being, indeed, through such sacrilegious treachery, made the devil's word." So the poor monk, who was found guilty a few months ago of burning the Authorized Version, as being "the devil's word," was not guilty of an invention of his own, but was only following the Douay translators.

It is true, the Douay translators did not speak in that preface of the present Authorised Version, which was not published, as it now is, until the year 1610. They spoke of the former Protestant translations made before the year 1580.

We shall state in our next number how far the present authorized translation agrees with, and differs from, those former Protestant translations; and we shall continue the history of the Douay translation, and the changes that have since been made in it.

In the meantime, we ask our Roman Catholic readers, who are in the habit of referring to the Douay Bible, when reading our discussions, to observe this fact, that if it had not been for the Protestant translations, they would never have had the Douay translation of the Bible into English—they would never have been able to read a word of the Bible at all. It is clear that only for what is thus indecently called "the Devil's book," their Church would have been well content to leave them for ever without "God's Book." Thus the Protestant translations have done at least this much good, that they have been the means of getting for Roman Catholics the Douay translation of the Scriptures into their own tongue. This, at least, is a merit that should not be denied or forgotten, unless we will say, what we hope none of our readers will say, that it would have been better if the Douay translation itself had never been made, but that all who can speak English only should have been for ever debarred from reading the word of God.

THE STORY OF ST. EPIPHANIUS AND THE VEIL.

Having had occasion, in another column, page 56, to quote the letter of St. Epiphanius to John of Jerusalem, we give here, according to our promise, an extract, which will explain some of the circumstances which gave rise to the letter. "I heard that some are murmuring against me, for the following reason:—When we were going together, to the holy place, which is called Bethel, that I might there hold a service with you, according to the ecclesiastical custom, and when I had come to the village called Anablatha, I saw, as I was passing by, a light burning there; so I asked what place it was, and, being told that it was a church, I entered in, to pray there; and I found there a veil, hanging on the doors of the same church, dyed and painted, and having the likeness of Christ, I believe, or of some saint or other, for I don't exactly remember whose likeness it was. So, when I saw this—the likeness of a man hanging in the church of Christ, contrary to the authority of the Scriptures—I tore it, and I gave directions to the keepers of the place, to roll up some poor dead person in it, and bury him in it. But they murmured against me, and said, 'If you wished to tear our veil, it would be only right that you should give us another in exchange for it. So, when I heard this, I acknowledged that it was reasonable, and promised that I would give it, and would send one forthwith. Some delay, however, has taken place, because I was anxious to send a very good veil, instead of it, for I thought I ought to send one from Cyprus [his own diocese]; but now I send the best veil I could find, and I beg you will give directions, to the priests of that place, to take it from bearer, and will give orders that no veils of that kind, which are contrary to our religion, should henceforth be hung up in the church of Christ, for it becomes you to be more careful to take away this cause of offence, which is unworthy of the church of Christ, and of the people who have been committed to you."

We have thought this story worth translating because of the important light which it throws on the practice of the Church towards the end of the fourth century. We have here St. Epiphanius, one of the leading Bishops of the time, going into a church, and seeing there an innocent picture of Christ, or of a saint hanging up. It does not appear that any adoration was being offered to the picture, or that any other abuse was connected with it—the picture was there, that was all. St. Epiphanius does not examine whose picture it was; he considers it contrary to the authority of Scripture to have a picture there at all; he tears it, and orders a dead person to be buried in it. Well, then, the attendants of the church murmur at him. No doubt they do, one might say. No doubt, they say—"You sacrilegious wretch, who have dared to tear this holy picture, do you think we will be partakers in your vile impiety, or that we will employ the likeness of this blessed saint in the mean use you tell us to apply it to." Not so; the attendants of the church say no such thing. They merely say—"Will not your reverence pay us the price of the canvas you have spoiled."

Further, St. Epiphanius has so little notion that he has done anything wrong, that he sends a full account of his performances to a bishop who was not on the best possible terms with him, whom he was himself, in the very same letter, rating sharply for his too great leaning to the Origenist heretics, and who, one would think, would be glad of the opportunity of a countercharge against Epiphanius. And yet no such charge is made, and St. Epiphanius is not accused of the least irreverence in his conduct, which a present of a new veil amply atones for.

Finally, St. Jerome gets a copy of St. Epiphanius's letter, and in place of discreetly concealing the impiety of his friend, he makes a Latin translation of the letter, and hands down this anecdote of St. Epiphanius to perpetual memory.

Verily, the Catholic Church, at the end of the fourth century, had very different usages from the Church calling itself exclusively Catholic in our day. If St. Epiphanius could now be introduced into a Protestant church and a Roman Catholic chapel, the latter ornamented with handsome paintings of Christ and the Virgin, and perhaps, other saints—and that not merely for historical use, but bowed down to by the people—which do you think St. Epiphanius would take for the old Church?

DIALOGUE ON THE CONSTRAINED CELIBACY IN THE CHURCH OF ROME.

NO. II.

Eustachio—The saints of the ancient Church praised virginity and continency to the skies, and were not satisfied with words only. How many holy bishops were there, in fact, who, abstaining from marriage, lived holily in celibacy?

Salviano—Let all due praise be given, then, to virginity. Continency is a great virtue. Tertullian calls it the flower of customs, an honour to the body, the ornament of the sexes, the foundation of holiness, &c. And Cyprian calls chastity the ornament of the noble, the exaltation of the humble, the comfort of the sad, the embellishment of the deformed. Be it so then; it is true that these holy bishops did not marry, but it is no less true that they did not speak ill of marriage, nor condemn those who were married. On the contrary, the great Bishop of Hippo (St. Augustine) confutes the error of St. Jerome, who had allowed reproachful words to escape him concerning a state ordained by God. And Augustine selects this opportunity to show, in various ways, the utility of marriage. You say that there were many bishops who lived holily in celibacy, and we answer you that we can count up many who lived laudably in matrimony. Spiridion was father of St. Basil, and father-in-law of St. Gregory Nazianzen. In the family of Polycrates, Bishop of Ephesus, the bishopric was preserved, and had descended from father to son for eight turns, as Polycrates himself says, in writing to Victor, Bishop of Rome—"Seven of my ancestors were bishops in succession; I am the eighth." What shall we say, too, of Cheremon, Bishop of Egypt, who, with his aged wife and with many others of the faithful, was driven into exile and died in a mountain of Arabia? Clement, of Alexandria, exclaims concerning this—"Such was the marriage of the blessed." Hilary, a bishop, most celebrated for learning and for holiness, had a wife and children, of whom it is written that his family was no damage to him, nor was his wife, who was united to him in lawful marriage any hindrance to his ministry. Notwithstanding these examples, if a priest or a friar takes a wife, you look upon him as profane, you load him with abuse as the vilest man in the world. It was not so, however, my friend, in the primitive times of the Church of Jesus Christ. I have named to you many persons distinguished for holiness and for doctrine, who lived in lawful marriage. Now, we cannot find anywhere that those who lived in celibacy condemned or defamed those holy persons as you do in these days. But not only were the saints whom I have named hitherto married, but many of your popes themselves were sons of priests and begotten in lawful matrimony. We may instance, amongst many others—Boniface the First, Felix the Third, Agapetus the First, Adrian the Second, Agapetus the Second. Gratian, Platina and others bear witness to this. In fine, are there not many councils who make mention of the wives and children of bishops?

Eustachie—True, indeed; but there are, on the other hand, many other councils in which the contrary was ordained.

Salviano—You cannot bring forward even one, especially of the four universal and truly catholic councils. The devil, as the enemy of the Divine ordinances, did not fail, it is true, to suggest to many the prohibition of holy matrimony, in order that he might introduce into the Church of Jesus Christ fornications and adulteries. There rose up some in the first Council of Nice who were of opinion that marriage should be forbidden to the clergy; but St. Paphnutius advised the very opposite. Hear what Socrates says on this subject—"Some bishops wished to introduce a new law into the Church, by imposing it upon bishops, priests, and deacons not to live with the wives whom they had taken when they were laymen. Paphnutius, rising up among them, cried out, that "such a heavy yoke should not be put upon the most holy men, since marriage was honourable in all," &c. Socrates says that Paphnutius considered chastity to be living with a lawful wife. All the assembly consented to his opinion, and silence was imposed about the controversy, each man being left at liberty to abstain or not from living with his own wife. You may read to this effect Sozomen, Gelasius, Cyzicenus, Nicephorus, Cassiodorus, and others. In the fifth of the Apostolic Canons, these remarkable words are to be found—"A bishop, priest, or deacon shall not put away his wife under pretence of religion. If he sends her away, let him be separated from the communion; and if he perseveres, let him be deposed." Whether these canons be those of the Apostles or not, let those declare who boast of them. The Council of Gangra excommunicates those who condemn married priests, and in the fourth canon expresses itself as follows—"If any one thinks that a married priest cannot, because of his marriage, exercise his ministry, and abstains on this account from communion with him, let him be anathema." Moreover, the Trullan Council, A.D. 692, ordained (contrary to the Church of Rome) that whoever, in spite of the Apostolic Canons, should dare to prohibit commerce or living with a lawful wife, should be excommunicated; and this canon is expressed as well with regard to the clergy as to secular persons.

Eustachio—If the councils just now named by you grant marriage to ecclesiastics, there are, however, many others which are of our opinion, and forbid the clergy to marry and to have children. We may say, then, as it is commonly said—here is altar against altar, council against council; on which are we to pin our faith?

Salviano—You cannot err if you follow the Word of God and the practice of the saints of the Old and New Testaments. Who can ever take away from you that which God granted to the patriarchs, the prophets, the apostles, and the disciples? Follow the rule of those councils which follow the Word of God. St. Jerome, in his commentary on the Epistle to the Galatians, says—"The doctrine of the Holy Spirit is that which is declared in the canonical books, against which, if councils ordain anything, it is altogether wicked." But let us have recourse to your own practice. Since there is to be found in some acts of the councils a discordant opinion, we should hold to the sentence of that council the authority of which is the best founded and the most ancient. Do you wish to know, for instance, if images ought to be venerated? If you look to the councils you will find yourself somewhat puzzled—in fact, the Council of Elvira ordains that there should not be pictures in the Church. The Councils of Constantinople ordain the same thing, and the Council of Frankfort desires that images should not be venerated. But then, on the other hand, the second Council of Nice, the Roman and the Trent Councils, desire that images should be venerated. Well, then, it is very easy to know which of these councils have ordained the truth. He who is sincere will follow the first, since they follow in their decrees the Word of God and the practice of the ancient Church. He will do this the rather since, with regard to the matter about which we are in controversy, the councils adopted by your party, in favour of the celibacy of the clergy, are not in general opposed to those adopted by us nor are they in your favour.

Eustachio—What then? Is not the Council of Elvira on our side, which forbids, in one of its canons, the very same thing which our popes now prohibit? Here it is, word for word—"It pleases us altogether to command bishops, priests, deacons, and subdeacons to abstain from their wives and not to beget children." Can anything be clearer?

Salviano—No, dear friend; this canon is not at all in your favour, if you only quote the whole of it, as it stands in the volumes of the councils—"to bishops, priests, deacons, and subdeacons, positis in ministerio, while they are exercising their ministry." Thence it is clear that it was enjoined by the fathers on the clergy to abstain from their wives only while they were ministering or preparing for sacred duties. This is the true sense of many canons which you think favourable to celibacy. But how, I pray you, can canons of this sort be in your favour? How in the world do these canons forbid marriage to the clergy whilst they actually suppose that they are married already, and only command them to abstain from all commerce with their wives whilst they are preparing for sacred offices? To command the clergy to abstain from their wives when they were to officiate, is that the same thing as forbidding them to marry? To reason in such a manner is the same as to say—The priests of the Old Testament, when they were to sacrifice or perform any other function in the Temple, were not to come near their wives, therefore they were forbidden to marry. Be candid, my friend. Does not such a mode of reasoning appear to you ridiculous?

Eustachio.—This remark of yours is curious. Many obscure things may thus be made clear, by showing the agreement of those canons which seem to disagree. Prove to me now, however, that the councils really had this meaning when they ordered the clergy to abstain from their wives, &c.

Salviano.—Yes, such was the meaning of various councils, and they cannot be understood otherwise. We must thus understand the second canon of the second Council of Carthage, which is expressed in this manner—"It is pleasing to all that the bishops, priests, and deacons—those, in fine, who administer the sacraments—that they should observe chastity, and abstain, also, from their wives." To the same effect is the 8th canon of Gratian, which says—"Having heard of the incontinency of some of the clergy, though it be with their own wives, it is decreed that the bishops, priests, and deacons, according to their own statutes, should abstain from their wives." Therefore, according to these canons the clergy might have wives, provided they abstained from them according to their own statutes. What is the meaning of this? To say the truth, in reading these words—"Secundum propria statuta"—I myself did not know well, at first sight, what they meant. I observed, however, that in some canons, instead of the words above quoted, it was written, in propriis terminis." These canons mean, therefore, that the clergy should abstain from their wives whenever it came to their turn to perform ecclesiastical duties. Balsamo explains the fact so clearly as to take away every difficulty. In the fourth canon of the same council he says—"The synod does not forbid commerce with them except in their own terms—that is, on the days appointed for the turn of each of them." "Nisi in propriis terminis—id est, in præstitutis unius cujusque vicis diebus." We may add, also, the Trullan Council, 13th canon, which orders "the sub-deacons, deacons, and priests who administer the sacraments to abstain also from their wives in their own terms, knowing that there is a time for everything, especially for fasting and prayer; therefore, it is suitable for those who assist at the altars when they begin the sacred functions to be continent in all things."

Eustachio—But does the Greek Church also understand it thus?

Salviano—The Greek Church has better views than the Latin upon this point. To command priests to abstain from their wives when they were to preach the Holy Gospel, or to administer the sacraments, is quite a different thing from taking away their wives by forbidding them to marry according to an express law. The decrees of the above named councils are Catholic and praiseworthy. If, according to the doctrine of St. Paul, the husband should separate from his wife for a time, to give himself to fasting and prayer, why should not the minister leave his wife at the time when he is to fulfil the duties of his ministry? But your ordinances, on the contrary, are opposed to the Word of God, and to the practice of the Church of both testaments, and very far from being truly catholic, they may be considered quite heretical. As they derive their origin, moreover, from the impure sources of the Tatians, Siricians, and other heretics, so they cover all Christendom with impurity. Ah, if your Church had followed the doctrine of Jesus Christ as their pole-star, they would not have struck upon such rocks; they would not have been enchanted by the Siricians and the Callistians, as by so many Syrens; they would not have given up the valuable liberty granted to them by God himself, nor would they in fine, have cast up so many snares upon the necks of men to drag them into the most filthy lusts, and thence into eternal perdition.

Eustachio—In saying that our Church has not followed the doctrine of Jesus Christ, nor the practice of the Churches of the Old and New Testaments, you mean to insinuate that the law enacted against the marriage of ecclesiastics is quite a new thing; and you do this, perhaps, to make it odious to our young priests; but you ought to know that it dates many centuries back, and that for many ages it has been received by our Church and practised by her ministers.

Salviano—Your law is not only a new thing, but I must tell you, moreover, that it is not a law at all, since a rule is no rule if it be not according to the Holy Gospel. Admitting that your law has been introduced into your Church as long ago as you please, by artifice and trickery, still it is new for all that. We have marriage granted by God to the patriarchs, the prophets, the apostles, and the pastors, during the course of many ages, and this marriage was taken away by you in the ages that came after. This alone would be sufficient to prove that the celibacy of priests is quite a new thing; but I am not satisfied with this, and will prove it to you more fully at our next meeting. At present farewell.

THE OLD IRISH CLERGY.—No. I.

The following is one of the odd stories contained in that ancient and sufficiently curious compilation, the Tripartite Life of St. Patrick. That we do not err in styling it ancient, appears from the fact, noticed by Mr. Petrie, in his learned essay on the Round Towers, &c., of Ireland, p. 158, that "no writer, however sceptical, has ever ventured to assign it to a later period than the tenth century." Of the nature of its contents this story furnishes a not altogether uninteresting specimen:—

"Another time this holy man took his journey from Tarah to Usney Hill, with a view to building a Church there. But in this he met with opposition from the two sons of Niall, and brothers of King Laogaire, Fiach and Enda: to whom the man of God at first spake civilly, promising them that if they would allow the Church to be erected in honour of God, in that lovely spot, the moderators and rectors of that Church should be chosen from among their descendants. But when they not only refused to give heed to his preaching, and the benevolent proposal he made them, but were even taking steps to have him laid hands on, and removed by force from the place; then began the man of God, in righteous vengeance for such ill-usage, to let fly the dart of malediction against them and their posterity. And when, opening his mouth for this end, he had given utterance to the word Cursed, thereupon his disciple, S. Seachlin, taking out of his mouth the sentence he had commenced, completed it by adding the words, be the stones of Usney Hill. Well pleased was the man of God with the dutiful sympathy of his disciple, and the prayer that he expressed: and to the sentence thus pronounced he gave accordingly his ratification. Wonderful to tell, from that day to this, those stones, as though still subject to the influence of that curse, are found utterly unserviceable for building, or any other human purpose. So that it has become a proverbial expression, whenever stone, or other material, answers not the purpose for which it may be designed, to say—''Tis a stone from Usney Hill.'"

What a ready-witted and good-natured Irishman was S. Seachlin, who seeing his master tempted to indulge in the naughty habit of cursing his enemies, and bethinking himself, perhaps, that such was not the kind of prayers that St. Paul would have made for kings, and for all that are in authority (1 Tim. ii. 1, 4), at once administered such a respectful rebuke as came gracefully from a disciple, and, at the same time, interrupted the unholy prayer, and caused the malediction to turn aside from Fiach and Enda, and their unoffending posterity, to spend its poison on the senseless stones, just as the conductor, which diverts the lightning flash from doing injury to human life, and sends its fury away to consume itself in the bowels of the earth.

But no more about this at present. It is for a different purpose that we have quoted the story above told, our object being rather to direct the reader's attention to the terms of the agreement which Patrick proposed making with Fiach and Enda, in case they would allow him to build the Church at Usney Hill, as he desired to do. The Church was to become the property of their family, so as that none but their descendants should be its rectors or moderators. This kind of ecclesiastical arrangement, by which particular churches became the property of particular families, came afterwards into very general use in Ireland; and ecclesiastical benefices and offices descended from one member of a family to another, much in the same way as did secular landed property, according to the old Irish law or custom, known by the name of Tanistry.

To explain the custom intended by this term for such readers as may not already be acquainted with it, we may remark, that according to it, on the death of any chief Lord or Captain among the Irish, there was usually elected in his stead, not the eldest son, nor any of the children of the lord deceased, but the next to him of blood that was eldest and worthiest of the office, in the estimation of the tribe; as commonly the next brother, or the next cousin, and so forth: and then, next to the one so chosen for chief, another similarly related to him was chosen to be Tanist, to succeed to the chieftainry, in case he should survive the one appointed to it. This mode of succession was considered to have an advantage over that of strict lineal descent from father to son, as affording a better protection to the lands and other rights of the tribe, which might be more easily encroached on if the father were to die leaving a minor to succeed to his office, during whose minority the neighbouring lords, and more especially the English, might seize their opportunity for invading the defenceless inheritance; whereas, by the Irish custom, if the chieftain fell in battle, his Tanist, already known, and one of years and ability, was ready to step immediately into his place. That the son should, however, in many instances, become the successor, though not as a matter of course, nor according to general rule, was natural enough.—See Spenser's View of the State of Ireland, Dublin Edn. of 1809, pp. 10, 12.

Accordingly we find mention, in the Irish Annals, of Tanist Abbots, as well as of the Secular Tanists, as of "Cormac, Tanist Abbot of Clonmacnoise," at A.D. 887 of the Four Masters; "Dungal, son of Gorman, Tanist Abbot of Clonmacnoise," at A.D. 1070, ib.; "Casey, son of Fergus, Tanist Abbot of Armagh," at A.D. 892, of the same annals; and similar entries recur in various other places.

And that the Tanist of an ecclesiastical benefice was not merely a name given to the next successor expectant, canonically appointed, by election or otherwise, according to regular Church law, as upheld in other countries, might be evident even from this, that according to such law the successor to a benefice could not generally be appointed until the holder of it were deceased; so that the holder, while alive, could have no Tanist. But the same thing is still more apparent from examining, as we shall do presently, into the successions of officers connected with particular ecclesiastical establishments, and observing how the offices which they held were handed successively from one relative to another in the same tribe, through a course of many generations.

The offices which we have here particularly in view were those of abbot, or coarb, and erenach, or (according to the Irish spelling of the word) archinneach; the former implying the chief place of command and influence in the old ecclesiastical corporations of Ireland; the latter, the holding of the temporalities belonging to the establishment. The bishop's office, among the ancient Irish, was attended with less of authority and emolument, although otherwise held in much veneration, and regarded as proper to be occupied only by men of eminent spiritual attainments.

In illustration of the remarks above advanced, we shall exhibit, from the Ancient Irish Annals, various instances in which the same ecclesiastical office, that had been held by a father, descended in course of time to his son (the son not always or naturally being the next successor, but coming in after, perhaps, an uncle, a cousin, &c.), or in which different ecclesiastical offices, about the same place (or in places having some particular connection with one another), came to be filled, from generation to generation, by members in lineal descent of the same family.

The most remarkable case of this kind which occurs in our ancient Annals appears to be that of the Mac Connemoghts (or more properly Mac Chuinn-na-mochts), of Clonmacnoise, whose history, so far as we are particularly acquainted or concerned with it, commences in the middle of the eight century, and, from that period onwards, occupies for three centuries and a half a distinguished and interesting place in the ecclesiastical records of Ireland. In tracing the history in question we shall, for the satisfaction of our readers (many of whom, it is to be hoped, can read Irish well), give the passages quoted from the Irish Annals in the original language, with a correct translation into English, in parallel columns. The extracts underneath are all from the "Four Masters," in whose work, by a reference to the proper year, each of them may easily be found:—

A.C. 898. Kenecorach of Inisenagh [in Lough Ree, near Lanesborough], bishop, and Abbot of Louth, tutor to Enacan, son of Egertach, and to Donoghue, son of Egertach, from whom are descended the Connemoght family, died on the 23rd day of July.

A.C. 947. Enacan, son of Egertach, Erenach of the Little Church at Clonmacnoise, bishop, and pure virgin (he was brother to Donoghue, son of Egertach), of the tribe of Morna-Moyne, died.

A.C. 953. Donoghue, son of Egertach, Bishop of Clonmacnoise [died].

A.C. 1005. Donogh, son of Donoghue, lector of Clonmacnoise, and its anchorite afterwards, head of its rule [or, discipline], and of its historical department, died. He was an ancestor of the Connemoghts.

A.C. 1022. Joseph, son of Donogh, anmchara [i.e., spiritual adviser, or confessor] of Clonmacnoise, died. He was the father of Conn-na-mbocht.

A.C. 1031. Conn-na-mbocht, head of the Culdees, and anchorite of Clonmacnoise, first invited a party of the poor of Clon [i.e., Clonmacnoise] at Iseal Kiaran, [i.e., St. Kiaran's low establishment, or hospital, at Clonmacnoise,] and presented them with twenty of his own cows.

A.C. 1056. Maelfinnen Mac [or, Son of] Connemoght, (father of Cormac,) coarb of Kiaran, [i.e., Abbot of Clonmacnoise,] died—i.e., Maelfinnen, son of Conn, son of Joseph, son of Donogh, son of Donoghue, son of Egertach, son of Luachan, son of Owen, son of Egan, son of Torbach, son of Gorman, of the O'Kelly Breagh [tribe.]

A.C. 1059. Conn-na-mbocht, the glory and honour of Clonmacnoise, died, after having attained to a great age.

A.C. 1067. Kelcher of Morna, bishop of Clonmacnoise, died. He was of the O'Kelly Breagh [tribe].

A.C. 1079. Maelkiaran Mac Connemoght, coarb of Kiaran [i.e., Abbot of Clonmacnoise,] died. He was the glory and veneration of Clon [macnoise] in his time.

A.C. 1089. Iseal-Kiarain, [i.e., St. Kiaran's Hospital, at Clonmacnoise] was purchased for ever by Cormac mac Connemocht, from Ua Flaihen, [Abbot of Clonmacnoise. See 4 M. A.D. 1100] and from Donnell (son of Flann) O'Melaghlin, king of Meath.

A.C. 1103. Cormac Mac Connemocht, Tanist, Abbot of Clonmacnoise, and a prosperous and affluent man, died.

A.C. 1104. The shingles of one-half of the stone Church of Clonmacnoise, were finished by Flaherty O'Linsby, [Abbot of Clonmacnoise. See 4 M. A.D. 1108,] the work having been begun by Cormac Mac Connemoght.

A.C. 1134. Kelcher, son of Cormac Ua Cuinn-na-mbocht, learned senior, head of the counsel, fountain of the wisdom and historic lore, and head [also] of the hospitality and observance of the rule, of Clonmacnoise, died, &c.

The circumstances brought before our notice in the passages now cited are sufficiently curious and worthy of our attention. The members of the O'Kelly Breagh tribe of Morna-Moyne, managed, it must be admitted, to secure for themselves a pretty good share of the ecclesiastical honours and emoluments which were going at Clonmacnoise; and it is worth while to observe what a number of generations of them attained, in direct lineal succession, to those high promotions in the Church which they enjoyed there and elsewhere. With this object in view, let us retrace our steps a little. We are informed, then, in what precedes, of the following facts:—

1—That Gorman, Abbot of Louth, died in A.D. 753, at Clonmacnoise.

2—Torbach, son of this Gorman, became abbot of Armagh, and is also entered as Archbishop or primate, in the list of successors of St. Patrick, as usually received, on the authority of the Psalter of Cashel. Torbach died, it seems, in 812.

3—Egan, son of Torbach, became Abbot of Louth; and died at Clonmacnoise in A.D. 834.

4—Owen, son of Egan, anchorite of Clonmacnoise, died A.D. 845.

5—Luchairen, or Luachan, son of Owen, anchorite, &c., of Clonmacnoise, died A.D. 863.

6—Egertach, son of Luchairen, Erenach of the Little Church, Clonmacnoise, died A.D. 893. He was the father of Enacan and Donoghue, the former of whom succeeded him as Erenach, but left no children, as he died unmarried, for which reason the Four Masters give him the title of "pure virgin." The family succession was, however, continued in the line of descendants of his brother Donoghue.

7—Donoghue, son of Egertach, Bishop of Clonmacnoise, died A.D. 953.

8—Donogh, son to Bishop Donoghue, became lector or tutor, and subsequently anchorite of Clonmacnoise. He is also styled "head of its rule and history," implying that he was zealous in attending to the charge of maintaining the discipline of the institution, and that he was the most learned of its professors in the department of history and antiquities. He died A.D. 1005.

9—Joseph, son of Donogh, was anmchara (i. e., literally, "soul-friend"), of Clonmacnoise, and died A.D. 1022. The word anmchara Dr. O'Donovan translates in some places "confessor," and elsewhere "spiritual adviser." Whichever be the most proper term, or if the meaning be anything at all like that implied by either, the holder of the office must, of course, have been a clergyman.

10—Conn-na-mbocht, son of Joseph, was Head of the Culdees of Clonmacnoise (i. e., prior, probably of the place) and an anchorite. He was a most eminent and famous ecclesiastic, regarded as "the glory and dignity" of Clonmacnoise, and his descendants the Mac Chuinn-na-mbocht added by their personal qualifications to the dignity derived from their illustrious progenitor. The family name borrowed from him is, according to the most correct Irish orthography, that just given above; but they are also called Mac-Cuinn-na-mbochts, Mac Connembochts, or MacConnemoghts. The English reader may, for facility of reading, adopt, if he think fit, the form Mac Connemot, which will be sufficiently near the original for general use. Conn himself, or Conn-na-mbocht, died in A.D. 1059.

11—Maelfinnen, son of Conn-na-mBocht, and Abbot of Clonmacnoise, died in 1056. The statement of the Annals about this is, however, a little ambiguous. The same Mac Cuin-na-mBocht, becoming now a general surname of the family, might be applied to Maelfinnen, even though he were grandson, instead of son, of Conn-na-mbocht. That he was, however, son, seems from the dates most probable. Further when the annals say —"Maelfinnen, Mac Cuinn-na-mbocht, the father of Cormac, successor of Kiaran, died;" it is left uncertain whether the epithet, successor of Kiaran (i.e.—Abbot of Clonmacnoise), belongs to Maelfinnen or to Cormac.

Maelkiaran Mac Cuinn-na-mbocht, Abbot of Clonmacnoise, died in 1079. He was brother, probably, to Maelfinnen above; or else otherwise very nearly related; their common progenitor, Conn-na-mbocht himself, having died but twenty years before.

12—Cormac Mac Connemoght, called by the Four Masters, Tanist Abbot of Clonmacnoise, died in 1103. In the more ancient Annals of Clonmacnoise, however, he is called, at A.D. 1100 [properly, 1104] "Cowarb [i. e., successor] of St. Keyran;" or, in other words, Abbot of Clonmacnoise. He was son to Maelfinnen above named, and is called by the Four Masters Ua Chuinn-na-mbocht, or grandson of Conn-na-mbocht, at A.D. 1134.

13—Kelcher, son of Cormac, was another distinguished member of the family, a "learned senior" of Clonmacnoise, and died in A.D. 1134.

There are also different other notices of members of the family in the same records, which we need not quote here, but which further illustrate the degree of influence and importance of which they were possessed.

The last mentioned of any of them by the family name in the Four Masters occurs at A.D. 1187, where is recorded the death of Mulmurry McConnomoght, "chief senior of Ireland."

We have, then, in the history of this family, as brought before us in the above extracts, the following facts:—First, an Abbot of Louth, father to a Primate of Armagh. Then this Primate, father to another Abbot of Louth, who was, in his turn, father to the Anchorite Oweu. And Owen the Anchorite was father to Luchairen, or Luachan, another Anchorite; who was again father to Egertach, Erenach of the Little Church, Clonmacnoise. And Egertach was father to Donoghue, Bishop of Clonmacnoise. And Bishop Donoghue begat Donogh, Lector, (i.e., Professor of Divinity, according to Colgan, Trias Thaum, p. 293,) of Clonmacnoise; who was father to Joseph, spiritual adviser to Clonmacnoise; who was father of Conn-na-mbocht, head of the Culdees, and Anchorite of Clonmacnoise; who was father to Maelfinnen, abbot [?] of the same place; who was father to Cormac, another abbot of the same place; who was father to Keleher, learned senior of Clonmacnoise, &c., &c.

In other words, in the twelve generations, according to lineal descent, preceding Keleher, we have, 1 Abbot of Armagh and Primate of all Ireland; 2 Abbots of Louth, and 2 of Clonmacnoise, 1 Head of Culdees, or Prior, at Clonmacnoise, 1 Bishop there, 1 Divinity Professor and Anchorite, 2 other Anchorites, 1 Anmchara, spiritual adviser, or confessor, and 1 Erenach. The office of Erenach, at the time of the plantation of Ulster, was held by laymen, at least persons who received only the "prima tonsura;" but in earlier times it would seem to have been a spiritual or clerical one, as much as that of the abbot. Sometimes indeed the two were identified. Thus, at A.D. 834, the Four Masters make mention of Brasal. "Erenach—i.e. Abbot of Kildua [Kilglin, Co. Meath]—and other churches."

Our illustrations of the state of those matters at Clonmacnoise, to which the reader's attention has now been directed, might easily be extended further; but on what relates to that one place we have, perhaps, dwelt sufficiently for the present. In a future paper we hope to throw some additional light on the subject, from the notices connected with other ancient Irish religious foundations which occur in our old annals; and we think that we shall be able to exhibit sufficient indications that in them also a similar system of family succession to ecclesiastical offices, or application to them of the principle of Tanistry, more or less prevailed. This is indeed what might be expected, as a natural conclusion from the evidence already adduced. For Clonmacnoise was one of the most famous of all those old Irish establishments; Armagh itself scarcely occupying a position of more prominence or importance in the Irish annals; and it was therefore but natural, that a system so cherished as we have seen at Clonmacnoise, or in the family above described, for at least 350 years, from the time of Abbot Gorman, who died in A.D. 753, to that of Abbot Cormac, who died in 1103, should be approved of and adopted into use in places of lesser note also.

TALK OF THE ROAD—NO. XII.

"Well, Pat, did yon get leave to stay in Kilcommon?" said Jem, when they went on the road.

"'Deed I did, then," said Pat, "and it's peace we are getting in Kilcommon now."

"And how is that come about?" said Jem.

"Why, I hear tell," said Pat, "that Father John got a letter from the Bishop, telling him he was bringing scandal on the Church, and that everything is to be kept quiet till it's forgot."

"And you're not going to turn, Pat?" said Jem.

"'Deed no, Jem," said Pat, "sure I was never thinking of turning; what do I know about it? Sure I only want to read the Catholic Bible, and try to learn something out of it. But where were you, Jem, since I saw you?"

"Why, then, I was at the wake," said Jem.

"And whose wake was it?" said Pat.

"Well, then, it was old Molly Kearney's," said Jem.

"Is it her, the creature?" said Pat, "and where would the likes of her get a wake? Sure, don't I know that she had nothing to live on these ten years only the fifteen pence a week that Mr. Owens allowed her out of the Church money, and she gives three pence a week of that for her lodging, and who would be bothered waking her? 'Deed, Mrs. Owens was mighty good to her, and gave her her bit often; but sure Mr. Owens wouldn't be going to pay for the pipes and whiskey?"

"Well, you may say that," said Jem; "but I'll tell you how it was. I was going past old Ned Flanagan's, where she lodged, one evening, and he called me in, and told me she was dead, the creature, and he said he wasn't going to have any nonsense of waking, only just what was wanting; and so he asked me to go down to the shop, at the cross roads, for two halfpenny candles, and a pen'orth of snuff, and he said that would do. So I went, and got the candles, and the snuff; and when the candles was lighted, who should come in, but old Judy Brannigan, that has the scapular, and sells the books; well, down she goes on her knees, you know, and begins with the Latin; and 'deed she seemed to handle it mighty clever; and when she was done, 'Judy, dear,' says I, 'what is it at all?' 'Well, I b'lieve it's a psalm,' says she, 'but I'm sure it's the right thing,' says she. 'And, Judy, dear,' says I, 'do you know what it means at all?' says I. 'How would I,' says she, 'when it's in the Latin it is?' 'And what is it good for?' says I. 'Why, it's good for old Molly Kearney's soul,' says she. 'And wouldn't it be good for our souls, too?' says I. 'Well, in course it would,' says she. 'And would the meaning of it do any harm to them that understood it?' says I. 'No, sure, it wouldn't,' says she. 'Well,' says I, 'and wouldn't it be better for us to have it in English, the way we could understand it?' 'And is it jumper you're going to turn?' says she, 'to be talking that way of the blessed Latin; sure where would be the use of larnin', at all, if English was as good for the soul as Latin?' 'Well, I'm thinking, Judy,' says I, 'our souls wouldn't be the worse for understanding good words.' So, with that old Ned Flanagan comes over, and he says, ''Deed, I'm thinking this long time, there's sense in that,' says he; 'and I can't help thinking betimes, where's the great use in my going to Mass, when I can't understand one word, good nor bad, till the scoulding begins.'"

"Aye," says Pat, "that's the sermon he meant, sure enough; and, I wonder what's the reason they don't scould in Latin, too. Sure, if we listen to the prayers in Latin, why wouldn't it do to listen to the scoulding in Latin, too? It's a poor way with us to understand nothing but the scoulding; it ought to make us read the Bible anyway to try and know something—but go on with the story, Jem."

"Well," said Jem, "when old Judy saw that we were both again' her, she began taking a pinch of the snuff; and, I says, 'Isn't it you that has the blessed scapular, Judy,' says I. ''Deed, it's myself,' says she, 'that has.' 'And what is it good for,' says I. 'Why, it's good to die in to be sure,' says she, 'and it's I that hopes to get it on in time,' says she, 'if my senses is spared to me,' says she. 'And what's the good of dying in it,' says I. 'Why, to be sure,' says she, 'don't you know? Didn't the Blessed Virgin say herself, when she gave it, that them that dies in it shall never go to hell, and if they go to purgatory at all, that she'll go down there herself the very next Saturday after they die, and let them out herself.' 'And where did you hear that at all,' says I; 'is it in the Bible it is?' 'Sure, how would I know if it's there,' says she, 'but isn't it in the treatise on the scapular that I have at home,' says she. 'And you won't put it on till you are dying,' says I. 'No,' says she, 'sure I won't.' 'And how will it be,' says I, 'if you wouldn't have the sense to put it on then,' says I; 'sure here's old Molly Kearney lying here,' says I, 'and she wasn't as old as you, and she was took quite sudden, and if she had a dozen scapulars in her box, would it be any good to her soul, when she wouldn't have time or senses to put one of them on her?' Well, now, the creature, I was a'most sorry for saying it, when I saw how troubl'd she got in her mind at thinking of that. 'Oh, wirra,' says she, 'won't there be any good Christian near me at all to put it on me? Ochone,' says she, 'will I die with the scapular in the chest, at the foot of the bed there?' Well, when I saw the old creature take on so, I just says to her, 'Did you never hear, Judy, dear,' says I, 'that it's in the Bible, that the blood of Jesus Christ cleanseth us from all sin? and sure,' says I, 'if he will put that on you his own-self, there will be no mistake about that, and won't that do?' says I. 'Och,' says she, 'what do I know about that, but, don't I know about the blessed scapular? but, ochone,' says she, 'who will put it on me at all? sure, I'm a poor, lone creature, that lives by myself, without kith or kin, and who will put it on me at all?' Well, I couldn't help thinking that time, that it was the poor case for an old creature to be taking such trouble about her soul, and knowing nothing of the blood of Jesus Christ to put away her sins; and isn't it the poor thing for the priests to be leaving an old creature that way, that will be dying like old Molly some of these days? And don't they all hold up poor Judy for the most religious woman in the country, and the surest of heaven? Well, it makes me think more nor ever that reading the Bible is what the people want.

"Well, but while I was talking to old Judy, there came a noise at the door, and when it opens, there was all the wildest boys in the country coming in; and old Ned Flanagan goes for'ed to meet them, and—'What do you want here?' says he. 'We're come to the wake,' says they. 'Well, you'll get no waking here,' says he; 'so you may be off with yourselves.' Well, they swore they'd have some of the fun over old Molly: 'And what did you or the likes of you care for old Molly when she was living,' says he; 'and what right have you to fun over her now?' says he; 'so be off with yourselves out of that,' says he. Well, with that they gave him a deal of bad language, and they pushed by him, and drove into the house, and began screeching for the pipes and the whiskey, for they said they had a right to have some diversion when there was a corp in the house. Well, with that old Ned went up into the inner room, and he fetched out his scythe with him (for he's a mower by trade), and he swore—'By this and by that,' says he, 'if they didn't be off with themselves out of that,' says he, 'he'd shear the heads off them, like mice,' says he. Well, 'deed if I hadn't caught hold of his arm, I think he'd have had the arm of one of them anyway; and when the boys saw that, they weren't long in being off with themselves.

"Well, when they were gone, says I to Ned, 'Would you let me read a bit out of it to you,'" says I. So he said he'd like that well; so I just took out my Bible, for I had it in my pocket, and I just read to them about Jesus Christ coming to Mary and Martha when their brother was dead, and how kind he was to them, and how he even cried like themselves at the grave; how he told them he was the Resurrection and the life, and that if they would believe in Him, he would raise them up to life again when they were dead, and how he called Lazarus out of the grave before their eyes, to show that he could do it, and that He would do it if they believed in Him; and old Judy, the creature, she come and listened to it all, and said, 'of all the reading ever she heard, it was the purtiest,' and, indeed, Ned was mighty well pleased too, and his wife, and they said 'they'd often be glad to hear the like, and that it was a deal decenter than pipes and whiskey when there was a corp in the house;' and, indeed I could not help thinking then that if the priests would try and stop the waking, and advise the people to have a little reading like Christians, it would be doing more good to the people than setting them to stone the Scripture reader."

"Well," said Pat, "it surely would; but I'm afraid they won't try that. But how would we know anything more about that scapular, or how it did come out at all, when there's nothing about it in the Bible?"

"Well," said Jem, "I think I know a man that has the treatise on the scapular that old Judy spoke about, and I'll try and borrow it."

"Well," said Pat, "it would be a good thing to get it and read it, and see if it's like the Bible at all."

So if they find out anything more about the scapular, we will try and have it for our readers.

AURICULAR CONFESSION, PART II.

In our last number we laid before our readers some of our reasons, taken from the very eminent Roman Catholic writers, Maldonatus, Natalis Alexander, Peter Lombard, Gratian, Cardinal Cajetan, St. Bonaventure, Alexander de Hales, Gabriel Biel, and others, proving, as we conceive, very clearly, that the Universal Church has not always understood that sacramental or secret confession to a priest was instituted by our Blessed Lord, and, therefore, of Divine right necessary to salvation; but, on the contrary, that there is no point which was more freely discussed for many centuries, or upon which a greater difference of opinion existed for more than 1000 years after the times of our Lord and his Apostles. We now proceed to examine whether it be historically true that the Catholic Church hath always observed, from the beginning, the practice of confessing all sins secretly to a priest alone, as decreed by the Council of Trent; admitting that such a practice would be entitled to great weight, even though its institution by our Blessed Lord be incapable of proof, as we think we have proved it to be, by the admission of no small number of the most eminent divines of the Roman Catholic Church.

We would first observe, that the proof of the affirmative lies on those who assert the fact to be as stated—viz., that such a practice has existed in the Church since the times of primitive Christianity; and we would next ask our readers to bear in mind what the exact thing called in question by the Church of England is. The Church of England does not deny that the public confession of sins in the Church was in very early use, nor does she deny the lawfulness or usefulness of voluntary private confession, either to a pious friend or discreet minister. There is, doubtless, the highest authority—viz., that of the Holy Scriptures—for the practice of confession of sins* to one another, which no one contends excludes confession to a priest, any more than does the concurrent injunction—"Pray for one another;" and so far is the Church of England from disapproving of voluntary private confession, that the form of exhortation in the Book of Common Prayer, prescribed by the Rubric, to be read when the minister gives warning for the celebration of the Holy Communion, contains an express encouragement for the use of it.†

The only matter in dispute therefore is, whether the practice of private confession to a priest was enjoined by the Church from the earliest times, as a matter of necessary discipline, on all its members; or to state the matter a little

* St. James c. v. 16.

† "And because it is requisite that no man should come to the Holy Communion but with a full trust in God's mercy, and with a quiet conscience; therefore, if there be any of you who, by this means—(viz., self-examination previously mentioned) cannot quiet his own conscience herein, but requireth further comfort or counsel, let him come to me, or to some other discreet and learned minister of God's Word and open his grief; that by the ministry of God's Holy Word he may receive the benefit of absolution, together with ghostly (spiritual) counsel and advice, to the quieting of his conscience, and avoiding of all scruple and doubtfulness"—Book of Common Prayer more fully, the matter to be proved by Roman Catholics is this—not merely the primitive existence of sacerdotal confession (such as may now be lawfully practised in the Church of England), but also the primitive enforcement of a periodical auricular confession, through the medium of which every mortal sin, even though, by reason of its having been secretly committed, occasioning no public scandal, and even though committed against what Protestants call the 10th Commandment of the Decalogue, is required to be fully stated to a priest, under the penalties of imperative religious obligation, and with the associated doctrine, that any voluntary concealment is absolute sin.

We may hereafter point out and illustrate more fully the broad difference between auricular confession, as practised and enjoined by the Church of Rome, and what the Church of England allows and recommends, which is not auricular confession, in the conventional sense of that phrase, but merely the friendly and spontaneous consulting of a pious and judicious divine—by those labouring under some particular distress of conscience. Our present object, however, is the historical, not the theological view of the subject, and to that we must now confine ourselves.

We must begin by observing what, no doubt, has struck every careful reader of the Holy Scriptures, that in the history therein recorded of the life and ministry of our Blessed Lord, there is no trace of his enjoining his followers to confession by a particular enumeration of their sins and their circumstances—though we find him there daily conversing with sinners, reproving, instructing, healing and forgiving them. He told the woman of Samaria all that ever she did, but he never exhorted her to auricular confession; he pardoned the woman taken in adultery, when he had made her accusers shrink away; but he demanded no confession of her guilt. He pardoned the sins of the man sick of the palsy on seeing his faith, without requiring any confession; and in the historical records of the ministry of the Apostles, we find them going about preaching the gospel, calling men to repentance, erecting and governing churches; but we find no instance of their sitting down in a confessor's chair, for penitents to tell them in their ear, the story of their vicious lives, as a matter of sacramental and necessary obligation; while, as we have shown, one of the Apostles themselves—Saint James—expressly inculcates the duty of confessing their faults one to another, and praying for one another, that they might be healed. Leaving the supporters of auricular confession to provide proof, if they can (which we shall gladly insert in our pages), that ecclesiastical history provides proof which sacred history does not, of the truth of the proposition which it lies on them affirmatively to establish, we shall proceed to give some account of by what steps and degrees we conceive auricular confession to have crept into the Church, at a much later period than the primitive ages of Christianity.

In the first ages, when Christian churches were founded in the midst of heathen nations, public scandalous offenders after baptism, and especially those who, through timidity or want of faith, relapsed into the practices of heathen idolatry, were, by the discipline of the Church, brought to public penance, which was generally called Exomologesis.

This word Exomologesis, in the original Greek, properly, no doubt, signifies confession, but in no way includes the idea of secret confession; and, on the contrary, is commonly used by the fathers as including the whole matter of repentance in all its parts, and especially of public penitential confession of gross and scandalous sin, made to God in the Church, in the presence of the assembled congregation. We shall presently exemplify and prove this more fully.

The necessity of this penitential rigour in the early Church arose out of the public dishonour which was brought on Christianity by the inconstancy and misconduct of some who professed it, at a time when large numbers of converts from heathenism were admitted into the Church, and the Church suffered extremely from the reproaches brought upon it by such inconsistency. Though the Apostles gave no rules about such matters, but avoiding or excommunicating the guilty persons, yet it was natural and fitting that the Church should resolve, as far as it was possible, to prevent such scandalous offences among them; with that view the actions of professing Christians were narrowly watched; their faults, especially such as led to scandal on the church, complained of, and then if they confessed them, or were convicted of them, a severe and rigorous discipline was enforced before they were restored to communion, that their enemies might see how far Christians were from encouraging either immoral lives, or any compliance with Gentile idolatry; any tendency to which was looked upon as a degree of apostacy, and punished accordingly. This led to the framing of the Penitential Canons, which never extended, in the primitive Church, to all those sins which the Church of Rome now accounts mortal, and, therefore, necessary to be confessed; and required that the declaration of penitential sorrow should be made in the most public manner, the last and most solemn act of which was, when the bishop led the penitents from the entrance of the church up to the body of the congregation, where they prostrated themselves, and expressed their abhorrence of their faults in the most humiliating manner, by actions as well as words. The publicity, however, of such penances, in facie Ecclesiæ, in progress of time led to inconvenience, for the Church being now very numerous, a great many offences were brought publicly forward, which not only gave rise to sport and ridicule for light and ill-disposed persons, and possibly, also, subjected the penitents to the severity of the Pagan criminal judge, but as some sins are of such a nature that they can scarcely be published without the risk of spreading a contagion, the good of the Church itself prohibited their publication before the face of the congregation.

This, in the time of the Emperor Decius, when persecution cruelly shook the Church, and numbers of her weaker members fell off in the storm, gave rise to a remarkable controversy, which, for some time, sadly distracted the Church, about the restoration or final rejection of those who had lapsed either in faith or public morals. We allude to the Novatian schism. The best and wisest of the Church, more merciful and considerate of human infirmity, were willing to receive those again, upon public repentance, over whom the temptation of fear had too much prevailed; but the Novatians, a great and zealous part of the Church in that age, looked with sterner eyes on them as desperate, who had once broken their baptismal vow, and would rather separate from the Church themselves than suffer such persons to be restored to it.

This Decian persecution was at its height about 250 years after our Saviour, and appears to have given rise to a new office in the Church, probably intended, if possible, to accommodate matters with the Novatian dissenters (who complained of the too compassionate facility of the Church in restoring offenders), by taking a middle course between an indiscriminate enforcement of that public penitential confession and humiliation which was called exomologesis, and the too lax mercy of restoring all who professed penitence, without insisting on confession and penitential discipline, as laid down in the canons.

This was the appointment of the office of public penitentiary, which appears to have originated about this period, and to have continued until the time of Nectarius, Bishop of Constantinople, who (we shall presently state for what reason) abolished it about 400 years after the time of our Saviour. The Novatians, so far from being satisfied, resisted this expedient as a new invention, an addition or supplement to the ancient rites of the Church; though the great majority of the orthodox appear to have acceded to it, as a wise and moderate mode of avoiding the scandals of too great lenity on the one hand, and indiscriminate publicity upon the other.

The Penitentiary was a public functionary, selected by the Church for his prudence, learning, and piety, to receive the confessions of all penitents (not, however, it would appear, under the seal of secrecy, as at present in the Church of Rome), but with power, after hearing privately the several cases of the penitents, to bring forward into public such of them as, in his judgment, might be made exemplary without incurring the dangers before referred to. There seems to have been no necessity imposed upon any one to disclose his secret sins even to the Penitentiary, much less to choose as his confidant any other priest, whom he might expect to be more complaisant than this selected public officer; but the office seems to have been no more than a prudent provision, in the existing state of the Church, to provide a safe help to men really penitent, and relieve perplexed and weak consciences, and especially to assist them in their preparation for the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper, of which we shall give some proofs hereafter.

With this brief review of the result of our own researches into early ecclesiastical history, let us now see whether there be any semblance of authority, during the first three or four centuries, for holding that the practice of Auricular Confession was enjoined as a necessary duty by the Church in those times.

Our readers have, perhaps, become sufficiently familiar with the names of the early Fathers, to know that Ignatius, Justin Martyr, Irenæus, Clemens Alexandrinus, and Tertullian, are the most ancient of them, and nearly all, who lived during the first two centuries, whose works are extant.

Now, if secret confession of sins to a priest were the universal practice of the primitive Church, we should naturally look for some proof from their writings that such practice existed in those times.

Ignatius dates A.D. 106. Justin Martyr, A.D. 150. Irenæus A.D. 180. Clemens Alexandrinus and Tertullian, A.D. 200. In the works of St. Ignatius, Justin Martyr, and Clement of Alexandria, there is absolutely no mention of confession at all; on the contrary, Clement in speaking of the Eucharist, and the duty of self-examination before receiving it, expressly says, that a man's own conscience is his best director in that case.*

Cardinal Bellarmine (De Pœnit., Lib. iii., c. 6, vol. iii., p. 443) cites two passages from Irenæus (Adv. Hær., Lib. i., c. 9. and Lib. iii., c. 4) in the former of which, speaking of a worthless gnosticizing impostor, named Marcion, who induced many silly women to join his party, and then most infamously abused his influence over them, he goes on to state, that some of those women, on their repentance, made a full confession to the Church of the impurities into which they had been seduced, and spent their whole time in "Exomologesis," weeping and lamenting on account of their defilement.†

What "Exomologesis" means, we shall presently see.

In the second passage referred to, Irenæus (Adv. Hær., lib. iii., c. 4) says, that the heretic Cerdon often came into the Church, and made or performed Exomologesis,* but we can find nothing in Irenæus which has relation to auricular (or, as it is called by some, clancular) confession in secret to a priest. Tertullian has also some passages speaking of penitential confession, but they so clearly relate to public confession in the face of the Church, that Rhenanus, in his preface to Tertullian, says distinctly that there was no such thing as secret or clancular confession in use in Tertullian's time, which was a thing not so much as known in those days.†

Tertullian gives us, however, probably the best explanation of EXOMOLOGESIS which is to be found in any ancient Father, and which may assist in clearing up doubts which otherwise might be occasioned by its Greek etymology.

"This act, which is better and more commonly expressed by a Greek word (ἐξομολόγησις), is confession, whereby we acknowledge our sin unto the Lord, not because He knoweth it not, but inasmuch as by confession satisfaction is ordered, from confession repentance springeth, by repentance God is appeased; wherefore Exomologesis is a discipline for the abasement and humiliation of man, enjoining such conversation as inviteth mercy; it directeth also, even in the matter of dress and food, to lie in sackcloth and ashes, to hide his body in filthy garments, to cast down his spirit with mourning, to exchange for severe treatment the sins which he hath committed: for the most part, also, to cherish prayer by fasts, to groan, to weep, and to moan night and day unto the Lord his God; to throw himself upon the ground before the presbyters, and to fall on his knees before the beloved of God; to enjoin all the brethren to bear the message of his prayer for mercy."‡

This brings us down to the time of Origen and St. Cyprian, who lived some 50 years later, and who tell us that the confession of the penitent was, in their time also, made before the whole congregation, prostrating themselves on the ground, with weeping and humiliation, in the Church, and desiring the prayers of all the congregation, whereupon the bishop and clergy laid their hands on them, and reconciled them. In which description the Ecclesiastical Historian, Sozomen, concurs.§

This, no doubt, was generally only for such public and mortal sins as were dealt with by the old penitential canons, and especially the offences either of openly apostatizing from Christianity during times of persecution, or at least in secret committing or conniving at some act of Gentile idolatry, which amounted in thought, at least, to denying Christ, and sinning against the Holy Ghost; and it appears not to have extended, even in the way of voluntary confession, to what St. Cyprian calls minora delicta, as to which there is no intimation in St. Cyprian, that any persons were under an obligation, by the rules of the Church, to discover or confess them. We think, however, it does appear, both from St. Cyprian and Origen, that, though at first public confession was enjoined only for public offences, yet afterwards some men did voluntarily submit themselves to the Church's discipline, and undergo public confession and penance, to ease their consciences, and procure quiet of mind from the burden of sins, which, being done in secret, were not subject to the censures of the Church until they confessed them. And there is one place in St. Cyprian where he says, "That some confessed their very thoughts, though they had not proceeded to actual sin."‖

We think it also appears that great sinners were strongly exhorted by St. Cyprian, Origen, and St. Ambrose to a voluntary public confession, as a wholesome and safe practice, though not as a matter of necessity, for St. Ambrose distinctly says—"Tears do wash the sin which the voice is ashamed to confess: weeping doth provide both for pardon and for shamefacedness: tears do speak our faults without horror, tears do confess our crime without offence to our shamefacedness."¶ In commenting on which the gloss in Gratian, who has inserted these words of St. Ambrose in his Decretum, says, "If for shame a man will not confess, tears alone do blot out his sins."

To these we might add many similar testimonies. But to come a little further down, to the time of St. Chrysostom, we find him speaking slightly of confession to men, and urging continual confession to God only. Out of many passages our space allows us to give only the following:—"It is not necessary," says he, "that thou shouldest confess in the presence of witnesses; let the inquiry of thy offences be made in thy thought: let this judgment be without a witness; let God only see thee confessing. Therefore, I entreat you, and beseech and pray you, that you would continually make your confession to God. . . Unclasp thy conscience before God, and show thy wards unto him, and of him ask a medicine; for although thou hold thy peace, he knoweth all. I do not say to thee bring thyself on the stage, nor accuse thyself to others; but I command thee to obey the prophet, saying—reveal thy ways unto the Lord—confess them before God, confess thy sins before the judge, praying, if not with the tongue, at least with thy memory, and so look to obtain mercy. But thou art ashamed to say that thou hast sinned. Confess thy faults, then, daily in thy prayers. For, do I say, confess them to thy fellow-servant, who may reproach thee therewith? Confess them to God, who healeth them.'* In our last number, page 39, we cited St. Augustine to the same effect; and need we go further to show that whatever differences may exist in the writings of the early Fathers as to the advantages of seeking the aid of the discreet spiritual physician for advice and consolation (and St. Augustine himself, doubtless, in another passage,† urges on notorious offenders, whose crimes had bred open scandal, that private confession to God was not sufficient, but that they should also make public acknowledgment, and apply to the power of the Church, publicly, for reconciliation); yet none of them ever conceived that secret confession of every sin to a priest was an indispensable condition of salvation, or that it was invariably understood so to be by the whole Church from the days of our Lord and his Apostles, as asserted by the Council of Trent.

We have much more to say illustrative of the historical view of this important subject; but we fear we have already run the risk of wearying such of our readers as may not feel as intense interest in this matter as we do ourselves. We must, for the present, therefore, conclude this short historical sketch by giving a brief account of the abolition of the office of public Penitentiary, in the latter end of the fourth century, by Nectarius, Bishop of Constantinople, the immediate predecessor of St. Chrysostom, referred to in the letter of a "Northern Reader," inserted in our last number.

If there be any passage in ancient ecclesiastical history which seems to promise a satisfactory elucidation of the antiquity of the confessional, and a test by which to try whether it existed, in its present form, in the primitive Church, in a constant and uninterrupted succession, as alleged by the Council of Trent, it is this. And the story, on the joint testimony of the two ecclesiastical historians, Socrates and Sozomen, is as follows:—

"In the time of Nectarius, Bishop of Constantinople, there was, it seems, a custom in that Church (as also in most others), that one of the Presbyters, of greatest piety, wisdom, and gravity, should be chosen Penitentiary—that is, be appointed to the peculiar office of receiving confession, and assisting and directing penitents in the management of their repentance. Now, it happened that a certain woman of quality, stricken with remorse of conscience, comes to the penitentiary (that then was), and, according to custom, makes a particular confession of all such sins as she was conscious to herself to have committed since her baptism; for which he, according to his office, appointed her the penance of fasting and continual prayers, to expiate her guilt, and give proof of the truth of her repentance. But she, proceeding on very particularly in her confessions, at last, amongst other things, comes to declare that a certain deacon of that Church had defiled her; upon notice of which horrid fact (secrecy not being, we conclude, then enjoined in confessions), the deacon was (very properly) cashiered, and cast out of the Church; and the matter coming to the ears of the people, they presently fell into a mighty commotion and rage about it, partly in detestation of so foul an action of the deacon, but principally on account of the dishonour and scandal that reflected on the whole Church. The Bishop, Nectarius, finding the honour of the whole body of his clergy extremely concerned in this accident, and being very anxious both to extinguish the present flame and to prevent like occasions in future, resolved, by the advice of one Eudæmon, a presbyter of that Church, to abolish the office of penitentiary altogether; and now, says the historian, by this means every man is left to the conduct of his own conscience, and permitted to partake of the holy mysteries at his own peril."‡

This, we think, plainly shows that the office was not then considered a divine or apostolic constitution, but one created, as well as thus abolished, upon merely prudential considerations, as a matter of ecclesiastical discipline, and involving no sacramental considerations whatever. Sozomen adds, that the example of Nectarius was followed by almost all the bishops and Churches in the world; and Socrates, who was the first and principal relator of the whole story, states that he was personally acquainted with this presbyter, Eudæmon, on whose advice Nectarius acted, in making this change in the discipline of the Church; and that he had the said relation of it from his own mouth, and expostulated with him about it, thinking that the state of piety would be much endangered by this change, and, in plain words, tells him that he had thereby bereft men of assistance in the conduct of their consciences, and hindered the great benefit men have, or might have, one of another, by private advice and correction.

We think this matter throws great light on the history of auricular confession, and disproves any such suggestion as has been sometimes made, without any good reason, that it was only public confession, and not private, which was, on this occasion, so generally laid aside; for (not to go at present into many other coercive reasons to the same effect), we would ask, how could the abolition of one public functionary have bereft men of assistance in the conduct of their consciences, or left each of them to partake of the holy mysteries—i.e., the Holy Eucharist—at his own peril, if each was still bound, at that very time, sacramentally to confess and be absolved by a priest, as laid down by Pope Innocent III., in the Council of Lateran, A.D. 1215, and afterwards by the Council of Trent, A.D. 1551, in the canons, printed in full in our last number? see page 38.

We conclude that it is not true that the Catholic Church has always observed, from the time of our Lord and his apostles, the practice of confessing all sins secretly to a priest alone.

Whether the practice can be maintained by the authority of those texts of scripture which are sometimes cited by Roman Catholic writers in favour of it, or whether the practice of auricular confession, as now used in the Church of Rome, be favourable or mischievous to practical piety, will form the subject of our future consideration.

The Catholic Layman.

DUBLIN, MAY, 1853.

The continuance and success of our paper, for nearly a year and a half, and the acceptance it has met with, both from Protestants and Roman Catholics, has proved some things that are worthy to be proved.

We conceived that it was possible, and that it was a Christian duty, too, that they who differ about religious truth should try whether a calm and Christian consideration of each other's arguments and opinions might not bring them nearer to an agreement in the truth. We were persuaded that a careful avoidance of all angry expressions, and a steady perseverance in kindly feelings, would change the common character of religious controversy. We did not expect that it would bring all to agree in the same opinion at once; but we did hope that, in a very brief time, it would prove that it is possible for those who sincerely differ, to discuss and examine those differences in a spirit of Christian love, and with a real desire to ascertain what the truth is, for themselves and others.

We were well aware that, in a time of great excitement about religion, when so many on each side are earnestly endeavouring to win over others to their side, such an attempt was peculiarly difficult; but then we saw, that for that very reason it was peculiarly necessary. All experience shows that man's passions are never so violent as when they are inflamed about religion. The greatest cruelties, the most terrible persecutions, and the most bitter hatreds that the world has ever seen, have arisen from this cause.

Seeing, then, that extensive discussion and controversy was inevitable—that it was impossible to stop it, even if it were right to do so—we resolved to try if it were possible that discussion among Christians could be conducted in a Christian manner.

And though the task be difficult, we never doubted that it was possible; for this reason—it is a duty, and duties are always possible.

Neither were we without encouragement. Are we not all fellow-countrymen? Have we not a common country, suffering under heavy visitations, and needing our united efforts for her welfare? Can we unite for her good with hatred between us? Is it not our common interest to love each other? and should not even our differences be governed by love and not by hatred? Have not all the same heaven and the same hell set before us? Can we be indifferent to which of them ourselves and our neighbours are going? and will not a loving and a gentle treatment of each other's errors be the most hopeful method of advancing the progress, both of ourselves and others, towards the God of love?

These reflections had led us to a settled resolution, that in this journal which we proposed to establish for religious discussion, we would labour to exclude every angry word, every thought of hatred, every approach of passion; that we would allow those only to write in our pages who love their neighbours' souls, and who treat them in a spirit of love.

We trust it is in no spirit of idle boasting, but in a spirit of thankfulness, that we now ask our readers to consider how we have carried out our design. If any one of our readers can show us where we have offended them, or where our spirit needs to be corrected, we shall thankfully accept it at their hands.

We have ourselves, of course, more opportunity of learning the general effect already produced, than individual readers can often have. We receive numerous communications from Protestants, expressing their approbation of the spirit in which we write, and of our care to avoid offending their opponents. This seems to be our chief merit in the eyes of our Protestant friends. We also receive numerous communications from Roman Catholics, in various ways, expressing their satisfaction at the kindness and the fairness of our conduct. On both sides we find that our readers approve of the manner of religious discussion which it has been our object to promote. The existence of our paper for so long a time, and its present prosperous position, affords proof of this; for we could not continue to publish if we did not get extensive support, and acceptance and encouragement from both sides. And we find that we are daily advancing in public favour, which is conclusive that the public are pleased with discussion free from anger and strife.

Now, we ask our readers on both sides to consider the importance of this. If, through our means, the two great parties should come to regard each other rather as persons to be convinced with patience and meekness, than provoked by abuse and insult; if, by our means, they should come to understand that these feelings are mutual; if, by our means, they should come to understand and to view each other in this light, shall we not have done much for the peace and happiness of our common country, as well as for the promotion of Christian charity and Christian truth?

We invite the attention of all our contributors, and all our correspondents, and of all readers, too, to the importance of this object; and we ask the assistance of each of them in their several stations, in promoting it.

We are aware that this happy result is in progress in a multitude of instances, and it is our most earnest desire to labour diligently to promote it, and to obtain the co-operation of all who have it at heart like ourselves.

OUR attention has been called to a letter in the Freeman's Journal, from the Rev. R. C. Kelsh, who appears to be a Roman Catholic clergyman, in the diocese of Meath. Part of the letter is as follows:—

"DEAR SIR,—Will you allow me the favour of complaining through your paper of a gross outrage practised of late on my Catholic friends in this neighbourhood, in the repeated transmission to them through the Post-office, of publications highly offensive to their religious feelings. .....I need scarcely say, that I allude particularly to the CATHOLIC LAYMAN..... It is idle for these mistaken men to imagine that they will gain converts to their cause, from our intellectual, upright, and religious people, by their foul, filthy effusions."

Mr. Kelsh also accuses us of "unnecessary insult!!" We think our readers will scarcely sympathize either with Mr. Kelsh's epithets or irritation.

If Mr. Kelsh would write to ourselves, and explain to us what "outrage" we have committed, or what "insult" we have offered, or wherein we have been "filthy," he would do us a kindness.

If we have, in any point, mistaken the doctrine of the Church of Rome, our pages are at Mr. Kelsh's service to correct our mistake. If we have advanced arguments that can be shown to be unsound, our pages are at his service to show it. We tell him that our paper is read by a vast number of Roman Catholics. If he thinks they have been set wrong by what they read in our pages, we offer him the same opportunity of setting them right; would not this be the most likely way of accomplishing the object?

ON PURGATORY.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

SIR,—Before I undertake the discussion of any other subject, permit me to offer a few words in reply to your remarks on the second part of my letter, published in the CATHOLIC LAYMAN, of December, 1852. The only point to which I wish to direct attention, is the extract from Origen, which I quoted in support of the doctrine of purgatory, and which, in my opinion, has not been, in the slightest degree, rendered nugatory by the fact, that some of the writings of this great man have been justly condemned by the Church. I am not aware that the homily from which I quoted has ever been condemned by any Council, Pope, or other legitimate authority, and when I shall have been informed that such has been the case, I will most willingly give up Origen; but till I shall be furnished with this information, I will hold the doctrine set forth in the extract, as the doctrine of the Catholic Church in the third century; particularly, as I find this same doctrine unequivocally set forth and supported by the concurrent testimony of other distinguished Fathers, who, if not co-temporary, were immediately subsequent to Origen.

St. Epiphanius, who wrote about the year 368, expresses his admiration of the rite which directs the names of the dead to be mentioned in our prayers, and says—"the prayers which are offered for the dead, are profitable to them, though they may not blot out all their sins." Again, he says—"We make mention, both of the saints and of sinners; of sinners that we may supplicate God for mercy on them, but of the saints, both Fathers, Patriarchs, Prophets, Apostles, Evangelists, &c., that we may honour the Lord Jesus Christ in a particular manner."—Epiphan., Hær. 75, sec. 7, T. i., page 911.

He further maintains, in sec. 8, page 912, "that the Church has this doctrine traditionally from Christ."

St. Augustine, who was ordained priest in 390, inculcates the same doctrine. He first proves from (Matt. xii. 32), that some sins may be forgiven in the world to come, for, "otherwise," says he, "it would not have been truly said of some, that their sins would neither be forgiven in this world, nor in the world to come, unless some sins, though not remitted in this world, were remitted in the world to come"—Ang. Lib. 21, de Civit Dei, cap. 24.

He next says—"When sacrifices of the altar, or alms, are offered for all the faithful departed, for the truly good they are acts of thanksgiving; for those not very bad, they are propitiations; for those very bad, although they afford no helps to the dead, they are, in some sort, a consolation to the living. But to those to whom they are profitable, they are either a full remission, or by them their punishment is rendered more tolerable"—Enchiridion, cap. 109, 110.

I might produce many other respectable witnesses from the fourth century, but the two I have produced are, I think, beyond exception; and from the quotations I have given, it is manifest, first, that the ancients did mention the saints, the Virgin Mary, the apostles, martyrs, &c., not to pray for them, as if they thought they needed their prayers, but to give honour to Christ, whose saints, &c., they are. Secondly, That they mentioned all those departed in the Christian and Catholic faith, entreating God to have mercy on them, through the saints, &c., whom they named along with them: and hence it is plain they offered these prayers, believing in a middle state of purgation or suffering of the souls of penitent Christians. "This Tradition of the Fathers the universal church observes," says St. Augustine, Serm. 172, de Verb. apos. sec. 2.

In these discussions I cannot be persuaded that any party can claim an exclusive privilege, excepting so far as he may be entitled to such, either by the validity of his arguments, or the character of his testimonies; nor do I imagine, from my connection with your paper, that such would be attempted. Upon this principle, then, I claim the right of quoting, in support of my views, from Origen's comment on Jeremiah, a right too which I consider I am as fully entitled, as you could be, when you quoted from the same comment, in page 110, col. 3, October, 1852.

I remain, Sir, yours sincerely,
EDMOND POWER.

Mullinavat, April 4th, 1853.

The first thing we have here to do is to defend ourselves from the charge of inconsistency in quoting Origen ourselves, and yet rejecting his authority when he was brought forward as a witness by Mr. Power; and our defence consists in a simple explanation of the principles on which we appeal to the testimony of the Fathers. We do not believe that we are bound to assent to everything that is contained in any work of an ancient Father, even though that work be not condemned by any Pope or Council. When we quote Origen we do so merely to ascertain what were the sentiments of Origen on such a subject; but, then, there is a further question—Were the sentiments of Origen approved of by the Catholic Church of his day—that is to say, by the majority of Christians of his time? And, again, there is an appeal from their doctrine to that of their predecessors, and, above all, to the statements of our Lord himself and of his apostles. We did quote Origen's testimony to the sufficiency of Scripture; but, then, we gave quotations enough from other Fathers to show that this, at least, was not one of Origen's heresies; and we do not think Mr. Power will say that this is a subject on which Origen's views were ever held heretical. We objected to Origen's testimony in favour of Purgatory—not on account of erroneous views of his on irrelevant subjects, but because it was on this very subject of the state of the soul after death that Origen was decidedly and particularly heretical, and because the passage quoted by Mr. Power is acknowledged, by learned Roman Catholics, to be one embodying Origen's heretical views. In fact, Origen believed that all future torments were only purgatorial and temporary; and, in the excess of his charity, he supposed that even the devil himself, after a sufficient amount of suffering, would be purified enough to resume his place among the angels of God. It is easy, then, to produce passages, in which Origen speaks of the sufferings to be endured by sinners after death as temporary; but it will be seen that this is very different from the Roman Catholic doctrine of a Purgatory where torments are endured by the souls of the justified after their departure from this world.

In proof of our assertion, that the passage quoted by Mr. Power from Origen is heretical, we need only refer to the note of the Benedictine editors on the passage—viz., "Not only in this place, but in a multitude of others, Origen establishes a Purgatory; but in his own way—that is to say, that no other fire or punishments torture souls but those that are Purgatorial or temporary."—Vol. iii., p. 232. We suppose we shall not be asked for formal proof that this doctrine is heretical, but the reader who requires the authority of Popes and Councils will bear in mind that Origen was condemned by the Synods of Alexandria and of Cyprus, by Pope Anastasius, and by the fifth General Council held at Constantinople in the Pontificate of Pope Vigilius.

And as to what the Fathers taught, as to this particular doctrine of the purifying influence of the torments of another world, will best appear from the evidence of Epiphanius and Augustine, which we select from that of other Fathers, that it may be seen how Mr. Power's three witnesses agree with each other.

St. Augustine says (Lib. de Hæres, c. xliii.—Ed. Bened. t. viii., p. 10]—"What Catholic Christian, learned or unlearned, does not vehemently abhor that Purgatory of sins which Origen speaks of—namely, the doctrine that those who have finished this life in scandalous crimes, and sacrileges, and impieties, the greatest possible—nay, that the devil himself and his angels shall, after a very long time indeed, be purged and liberated, and restored to the kingdom of God and to light. . . . . Concerning which vain impiety I have disputed diligently in the books on the city of God, against the philosophers from whom Origen learned these notions."

What Epiphanius thought of Origen may be learned from his second book on heresies, where the 64th section (a very long one) is devoted to an examination of some of the errors of Origen, and where such epithets are applied to him and his doctrines that we can guess how the good father would have shuddered could he have known in what company he would be placed by Mr. Power. At present we refer to Epiphanius's letter to John, bishop of Jerusalem* (works, vol. ii. p. 314, Paris, 1622) in which, after calling Origen the father of Arius, and the root of other heresies, he goes on—"And this, too, which he maintains, I know not whether to grieve or laugh at; for this excellent teacher, Origen, dares to teach that the Devil will again be what he was once, and will return to the same dignity, and will ascend the kingdom of heaven. O shocking! Who can be so senseless and so foolish as to believe that John the Baptist, and Peter, and John the Apostle, and Isaiah, and Jeremiah, and the rest of the prophets shall be co-heirs with the Devil in the kingdom of God?"

We think we have said enough to show that Origen's notions on the subject of Purgatorial torment cannot be safely followed. And we might now reasonably refuse to go further; for it will be remembered that our controversy with W. C. Search and Mr. Power, arose out of a discussion of the question, Did the Fathers of the first three centuries know anything about Purgatory? When every attempt has failed to produce a mention of Purgatory from any orthodox writer of the first three centuries, we may be satisfied that the doctrine of Purgatory was not received by tradition from the Apostles. It becomes, then, a matter of mere historical curiosity whether the belief in it arose in the Church in the fourth or in some succeeding century. We are content, however, to enter into this discussion as far as it relates to the fourth century, and shall prove that Purgatory was no part of the doctrine of the Church in that age. In particular we shall prove that St. Epiphanius and St. Augustine counted no such belief among their articles of faith, and we shall prove it from the very passages to which Mr. Power has referred. We have so much to say on this subject that we shall make the sentiments of St. Epiphanius and St. Augustine, about Purgatory, the subject of a separate article in our next number.

THE SEVEN SACRAMENTS.

WE resume our examination of the seven sacraments of the Church of Rome, in reply to the letter of "J. B.," in our March number.

We beg to remind our readers that a sacrament can only be instituted by appointing and commanding the form and matter of the sacrament. The question whether Christ instituted a sacrament is, therefore, in fact only a question whether Christ appointed the form and matter of it—that is, the words to be said and the thing to be used.

CONFIRMATION.

Our correspondent mentions Matt. xix. 13-15, as being applied by individual Roman Catholics to prove that the sacrament of confirmation, as now held by the Church of Rome, was instituted by Christ. Those words are—"Then were little children presented to him, that he should impose hands on them and pray, and the disciples rebuked them. But Jesus said, Suffer little children, and forbid them not to come to me, for the kingdom of heaven is for such. And when he imposed hands on them, he departed from them." Our correspondent adds, "see also Acts viii. 14, 15, 16, and 17."

What, then, is the "form and matter" of the sacrament of confirmation, as now held in the Church of Rome? And do these passages of Scripture prove that Christ instituted that form and matter?

What, then, is the "matter" of the modern Roman sacrament of confirmation? The Catechism of the Council of Trent answers, "The matter of confirmation is chrism" (that is, a kind of ointment, made of olive oil and balsam). Without this "matter" the Roman sacrament cannot exist at all. Now, is there any proof, in the passages above referred to, that Christ or his apostles ever used chrism? Clearly not; and, therefore, there is no proof that Christ or his apostles ever made the sacrament at all. Protestants believe that the laying on of hands is an apostolic institution; but the Church of Rome says that it is no sacrament without the use of chrism. Is not the question about the sacrament of confirmation a question whether Christ appointed chrism? and where is the proof that he did?

This "form" of the sacrament of confirmation is stated, by the same Catechism of the Council of Trent, to consist in these words—"I sign thee with the sign of the cross, and I confirm thee with the chrism of salvation, in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost." Did Christ or his apostles use these words? If not, they made no sacrament of confirmation, according to the Church of Rome. Do the passages prove that Christ instituted these words? if not, they prove no sacrament. Many most learned Roman Catholics have confessed that Christ never appointed either the matter or form of this sacrament, as now held in their Church.

* As we have had occasion to quote this letter, it may interest our readers to know some of the circumstances which gave occasion to it. We add them in a separate article (see page 59), not wishing to mix up two subjects in the same article.

HOLY ORDERS.

Matt. x. 7—"And going, preach, saying, the kingdom of heaven is at hand." See also Acts vi. 6, and xiii. 3.

These words of our Saviour express only a commission to preach the Gospel; they do not institute a sacrament.

All Roman Catholics say that our Saviour did not institute a sacrament of orders until his last supper; the above words were spoken by Him nearly two years before. These words, therefore, prove that a Divine commission to preach may be given without instituting a sacrament of orders.

The "matter" of the sacrament, according to the Council of Trent, is handing to the person ordained a chalice with consecrated wine, and a paten with consecrated bread. Is there any proof from Scripture that our Saviour appointed the paten to be so handed, as the "matter" of ordaining? We have certain proof that the clergy of the early Church were not ordained by any such form; and how, then, can we say that "matter" was instituted by Christ? If that "matter" was not used, there was no sacrament in orders, according to the Church of Rome.

The "form" of this sacrament is declared, by the Catechism of the Council of Trent, to consist in these words—"Receive the power of offering sacrifice," &c. Without these words the Church of Rome holds that the sacrament of orders cannot be made. If any one will show us proof that Christ appointed these words, to be used in conferring orders, we may then believe that he instituted the Roman sacrament of orders.

We acknowledge that Christ instituted a ministry, and gave a Divine commission, which still continues in the Church; but the Church of Rome says that this institution is no sacrament without the use of the words—"Receive the form of offering sacrifice." Without those words the sacrament cannot be. Now, it is notorious that no such words were used in ordaining for ages after Christ; we, therefore, acknowledge Holy Orders as an institution of Christ, but not as a sacrament instituted by him.

EXTREME UNCTION.

Of this we have spoken before; there is less reason to dwell on it here, which our space does not permit. The only passages even referred to for it (Matt. x. 6, and James v. 14, 15), so evidently refer to the healing of the body, and so expressly promise that healing, that we are at a loss to understand how any one can suppose that these passages could be intended to institute a sacrament which was to be understood only in case "of approaching dissolution."

ON THE SACRIFICE OF THE MASS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

SIR—As it is possible that many members of the Church of Rome may never have read or considered the original documents in which the doctrine of their church, regarding "the sacrifice of the mass," is set forth, I have thought it desirable to put together some extracts relating to it, taken from the most authentic Roman Catholic formularies, and to subjoin some observations upon them, in order that Roman Catholics may be fully aware of the teaching of their church on this head, and of the consequences to which it leads.

1. The doctrine of the Church of Rome on the "Sacrifice of the mass," as set forth by the Council of Trent, is this:—(Vid. Catechism, by decree of the Holy Council of Trent, published by command of Pope Pius V. Rome, printed at the Propaganda Press. SUPERIORUM PERMISSU, 1839)—

"We, therefore, confess that the Sacrifice of the Mass is, and ought to be, considered, one and the same sacrifice with that of the cross, FOR THE VICTIM IS ONE AND THE SAME, Christ our Lord, who offered himself once only a bloody sacrifice on the altar of the cross. This being the case the pastor will teach with absolute certainty that the holy sacrifice of the mass is a TRULY PROPITIATORY SACRIFICE, by which God is appeased and rendered propitious to us. If, therefore, with pure hearts, a lively faith, and an inward sorrow for our transgressions, we IMMOLATE and offer this most holy victim, we shall, no doubt, obtain mercy," &c., &c. (pp. 246-7).

Again (Council of Trent, Session xxii., ch. 1, 2, and canon 3, also Creed of Pius IV.), the doctrine is thus authoritatively set forth—"Christ having celebrated the ancient passover, which the multitude of the children of Israel immolated in memory of their departure out of Egypt. He instituted the new passover—to wit, namely, THAT HIMSELF SHOULD BE IMMOLATED, under visible signs, by the Church through the priests, in memory, &c. And inasmuch as in this Divine sacrifice which is performed in the mass, that same Christ is contained and immolated in a bloodless manner, who once offered himself in a bloody manner on the cross, the holy synod teaches that this sacrifice is truly propitiatory; for the VICTIM IS ONE AND THE SAME, the same now offering, by the ministry of priests, who then offered himself on the cross, the manner alone of offering being different." Therefore, saith the canon, "If any one shall say that the sacrifice of the mass is only a sacrifice of praise and thanksgiving, but not a propitiatory sacrifice; or that it avails him only that receiveth; and that it ought not to be offered for the living and the dead for sins, satisfactions, and other necessities; let him be anathema"—accursed!

2. This is the doctrine of the Church of Rome, based (as we have seen) upon a special, and formal, and authoritative decree of that church, in synod assembled, regarding this awful subject. It follows, of course, unavoidably, upon a doctrine previously propounded, the doctrine of transubstantiation. The Church had there taught by decree (Vid. Cat. of Pius V., ib. pp. 208, 214, 219, 225, 243-4: and Council Trident, Sess. xiii. ch. 4, and Can. 1, 2: and the Creed of Pius IV.), that "In the Eucharist, that which before consecration was bread and wine, is, after consecration, really and SUBSTANTIALLY, the body and blood of our Lord:" that "it is the CONVERSION of the bread into the TRUE BODY of our Lord;" "that the real body of Christ, THE SAME THAT WAS BORN OF THE VIRGIN, and sits at the right hand of the Father in heaven, is contained in this sacrament; and that, however remote from, and alien to, the senses it may seem, NO SUBSTANCE OF THE ELEMENTS REMAINS IN THE SACRAMENT; the substance of bread and wine is so changed into the body and blood of our Lord, THAT THE SUBSTANCE OF BREAD AND WINE ALTOGETHER CEASES TO EXIST:" "after consecration the substance of bread and wine DOES NOT REMAIN IN THE SACRAMENT:" and that, therefore, "the WORSHIP of Latria (worship of highest order), which is DUE TO THE TRUE GOD, is to be offered TO this most holy sacrament;" and that "if any one shall deny the same, let him be anathema," or accursed!

Having decreed this as its doctrine regarding the nature of the sacrament, the offering of such a sacrament must, unavoidably, become a "sacrifice"—a sacrifice of the host ("hostia") or victim—that victim being Christ Himself.

There cannot be two opinions, then, regarding what the authoritative teaching of the Roman Church, since the Tridentine council, upon this subject is. That Church teaches, that the sacrament of the Eucharist is the sacrificing of a propitiatory victim for the sins of the living and of the dead, every time it is celebrated; that the very body and blood CREATED BY CONSECRATION OF THE ELEMENTS—the same that was born into the world of the Virgin Mary—ARE THEN "IMMOLATED;" and that the sacrificer is the officiating Priest.

3. Now, my object in publishing this statement from the Catechism, Creed, Councils, and Canons of the Tridentine Church at Rome is, that those who are designedly kept in ignorance regarding what the very doctrines of that Church are, may accurately know the truth, and thereby be in a position to follow my arguments and observations upon them, and judge for themselves as to the unavoidable consequences to which those doctrines lead.

First, let us simply regard the terms in which this doctrine is embodied.

It is stated that the sacrament of the Eucharist is the sacrificial offering of the human body of Christ—"the same that was born of the Virgin"—"the same that was offered on the cross."—Vid. Catec., ibid. p. 205, 246.

Now, if this defines this holy sacrament it must also define what it was at the time of its institution by our Blessed Lord himself. And then, speaking of what took place on that occasion, we ought to say and believe that Christ offered up himself before he offered himself; that he sacrificed (immolated) himself, all the while being alive; and, moreover, while alive, in that sacrifice, ate himself! For Cardinal Bellarmine (De Missa. lib. i. c. 2,) plainly states—"In a true sacrifice it is requisite that which is offered unto God be destroyed."—(Vid. Bp. Beveridge, Art. xxxi.)

And next, from the wording of the doctrine thus defined by the Church of Rome, let us proceed to compare the doctrine as thus intended to be set forth, with the unequivocal teaching of the word of God upon the subject which is thus daringly handled:—

The Tridentine doctrine is—"that having celebrated the ancient Passover, which the multitude of the children of Israel immolated in memory of their departure out of Egypt, He (Christ) instituted the new passover, to wit, namely, that Himself should be immolated through the priests." (Vide Trident. Counc. supra.) By which one thing only can be intended to be stated, namely, that as the children of Israel "slew, immolated, destroyed" the lamb in the Passover, so, in like manner, is Christ (the host, or victim) slain, immolated, and destroyed, by the officiating priest, every time the sacrifice of the mass is offered! The doctrine, as stated in the words of the Trent Catechism, Creed, and Canons of the Council, cannot, I think, bear any other construction; and, if that construction be not nonsense, it appears to me to be very like blasphemy.

This same decree of the Tridentine Council on "the sacrifice of the mass," asserts, that in the host "Christ himself is immolated, under visible signs, by the priest," which, if it does not deny that our Blessed Lord was "the priest" as well as the victim, when he shed his precious blood, once for all, on Calvary, asserts that the officiating priest is Christ; for it states (Catech. p. 246—7), that "the priest is one and the same (who offers up the host) as Christ our Lord," (who offered up himself). If this be not nonsense, I fear it is blasphemy; and yet the priest who says that in the eucharist he has made Christ his God by transubstantiation, must also affirm, as his Church teaches him, that when he offers the mass he (the priest) sacrifices him again! But Christ is not only our only victim for the forgiveness of sins, but he is also our only High Priest "for ever according to the order of Melchisedech," capable of offering that victim. Will any one dare to say that in any sense he offers Him in sacrifice? Do the Romish priests, indeed, desire to "crucify the Son of man afresh?"

But even this, shocking as it appears, is not the most fearful of the consequences to which the Tridentine Church is committed by its canons, creed, and catechism, already rehearsed, on the doctrine of the sacrifice of the mass.

That doctrine is, that every time the mass is celebrated, a fresh propitiatory sacrifice "for the remission of sins" is offered; that "it is a perpetual sacrifice, by which our sins may be expiated" (Catec. Pius V., p. 244), "by which the bloody sacrifice once offered on the cross may be renewed."—Ibid. In short, that every time the mass is offered, Christ is offered also "for the remission of sins!"

How thoroughly subversive this is of the doctrine of the Cross, and how totally it is contradicted, in consequence, by the plain and repeated statements of the Word of God, we need scarcely point out to those who have free access to that standard of truth.

The Word of God teaches that CHRIST suffered "once," "only once."—(Heb. ix. 12), "Christ being come a High Priest of good things, not by the blood of goats and calves, but by his own blood, He entered in once (ἅπαξ, once for all and for ever) into the holy place, having obtained eternal redemption for us (αἰωνίαν λύτρωσιν) a propitiatory offering for ever and ever!"

Again, the Word of God states (Ibid v. 25, 26), "nor yet that He should OFFER HIMSELF OFTEN (ἵνα πολλάκις) not more than once; not again and again, as in the mass, for then must He often have suffered: but now once (ἅπαξ, once for all) in the end of the world hath He appeared, to put away sin by the sacrifice of Himself!'

Again, it is clearly stated, by the same unerring authority, as if the prophetic mind foresaw the future heresy of Rome (Ibid ch. x. 11, 12, 14)—"Every high priest standeth daily ministering, and offering oftentimes the same sacrifice, which can never take away sins; BUT this Man, after he had offered one sacrifice for sins for ever, sat down on the right hand of God!"

Every one must perceive the direct denial which these declarations of God's Word receive from the Tridentine dogmas. The Tridentine dogma is, that "the sacrifice of Christ on the Cross is daily renewed in the mass for the remission of sins of the living and the dead." The Word of God says—"Now, where remission of sin is, there is no more offering for sin." Now, in the mass there is "an offering for sin" made again and again continually; therefore the offering for sin upon the cross was imperfect and insufficient![*]

I challenge the Church of Rome to prove, first, that the doctrine of the sacrifice of the mass, as stated above, is not the authoritative teaching of that community; and, secondly, as compared with the Word of God, that it is not what it was asserted 300 years ago to be, a "blasphemous fable and dangerous deceit."—Art. of Ch. of Eng. xxxi.

4. And now, before I dismiss this subject, it will be a relief and satisfaction every way to the reader, to know what the teaching of the true Catholic Church, regarding the great mystery of the Eucharist, is. It is thus stated by one of her confessors and martyrs, Bishop Ridley, who was burned alive at Oxford, on the 16th October, 1555, in these words—"The controversie, no doubt, which at this day troubleth the Church, is not whether the holy sacrament of the body and blood of Christ is no better than a peece of common bread or no; or whether the Lord's table is no more to be regarded than the table of any earthly man, or no; or whether it be a bare sign or figure of Christ and nothing else, or no; for all do graunt that St. Paule's words do require that the bread which we break is the partaking of the body of Christ; and also do graunt, hym that eateth of that bread, and drinketh of that cup unworthelye, to be guiltie of the Lorde's death, and to eat and drink his own damnation, because he esteemeth not the Lorde's body, &c.

[*] "Whosoever shall seeke any other sacrifice propitiatory for sinne maketh the sacrifice of Christ of no vaildities, force, or efficacie. For if it bee sufficient to remit sinnes, what need is there of any other? For the necessitie of another argueth and declareth this to be insufficient. Almightie God, grant that we may truly leane on this one sacrifice of Christe; and that wee to him may again repay our sacrifice of thanksgiving, or praise, of confessing of His name, of true amendment, or repentance, of mercifulness towards our neighbours, and of all other good words of charitie! For by such sacrifices wee shall declare ourselves neither ungrateful to God, nor altogether unworthy of this holy sacrifice of Christ."—Archbishop Cranmer's Explication, given at Oxford before he suffered.

"Thus, then, hetherto yet, we all agree. But now let see wherein the dissention doth stande.

"It is neither to be denied nor dissembled, that in the matter of this sacrament there be divers pointes, wherein men counted to be learned cannot agree—as, Whether there be any transubstantiacion of the bread, or no? Any corporall and carnal presence of Christe's substance, or no? Whether adoration, only due unto God, is to be done to the sacrament, or no? And whether Christe's body be there offered indeed unto the Heavenly Father by the priest, or no? Or whether the evyll man receyveth the natural body of Christ, or no? Yet, nevertheless, as in a man discased in divers partes, commonly the original cause of such divers diseases, which is spread abroad in the body do come from one chief member, as from the stomacke, or from the head: even so all these five aforesaid poyntes do chiefly hang upon this one question, which is, What is the matter of the sacrament? whether it is the natural substance of bread, or the natural substance of Christe's owne bodye? The truth of this question, truly tried out and agreed upon, no doubt shall cause the controversie in all to rest. For if it be Christe's owne natural body, born of the Virgin, then assuredly (seeing all learned men in England, so far as I know, both new and old, graunt there is but one substance), then, I say, they must need graunt Transubstantiation—that is, a chaunge of the substaunce of bread into the substaunce of Christe's body; then, also, they must graunt the carnal and corporal presence of Christe's body; then must the sacrament be adored with the honour due unto Christe himself, for the unitie of the two natures in one person; then if the priest do offer the sacrament, he doth offer indeede Christe himself; and, finally, the murtherer, the adulterer, or wicked man, receyvyng the sacrament, must needes there receive also the natural substaunce of Christe's owne blessed body, flesh and blood.

"Now, on the other side, if, after the truth shall be truly tried out, it be found that the substaunce of bread is the natural substaunce of the sacrament, although, for the chaunge of the use, office and dignity of the bread, the bread, indeed, is sacramentally chaunged into the bodye of Christe, as the water in baptism is sacramentally chaunged into the fountaine of regeneration, and yet, the natural substaunce thereof remayneth all one, as it was before; if, I say, the true solution of that former question, whereupon all these controversies do hang, be, that the natural substaunce of bread is the material substaunce of the sacrament of Christe's blessed body, then must it needes follow of the former proposition (confessed of all that be named to be learned, so farre as I do know, in England), which is, that there is but one material substaunce in the sacrament of the body, and one only likewise in the sacrament of the blood—that there is no such thing, in deede, and in truth, as they call transubstantiacion; for the substance of the bread remayneth still in the sacrament of the body; then, also, the natural substance of Christe's human nature, which he took of the Virgin Mary, is in heaven, where it reigneth now in glory, and not there enclosed under the form of bread; then that godly honour, which is onely due unto God the Creator, and may not be done unto the creature, without idolatrye and sacrilege, is not to be done unto the sacrament; then, also, the wicked, I meane the impenitent murtherer, adulterer, or such lyke, do not receive the natural substance of the blessed bodye and blood of Christe: finally, then doth it follow, that Christe's blessed bodye and bloud, which was once onely offered, and shed upon the cross, beyng available for the synnes of all the whole world, is offered up no more in the natural substaunce thereof, neither by the priest nor any other thing.

"Now, then, you wy llsay, What kind of Presence do they graunt? and what do they deny? Briefly, they deny the presence of Christe's body in the natural substaunce of his human and assumpt nature, and graunt the presence of the same by grace—that is, they affirme and saye, that the substance of the natural body and bloud of Christe, is only remaining in heaven, and so shall be unto the later day, when he shall come agayne in glory, accompanied with the angels of heaven, to judge both the quicke and the dead. And the same natural substaunce of the very body and bloud of Christe because it is united unto the divine nature, in Christ, the second person in the Trinitie; therefore, it hath not only life in itself, but is also able to give, and doth give, life unto so many as be, or shall be partakers thereof; even, as for example, we saye, the same sunne, which in substance never removeth his place out of the heavens, is yet present here by his beames, light, and natural influence, where it shineth upon the earth; for God's Word and his sacraments be, as it were, the beames of Christ, which is 'sol justitiæ'—the sun of Righteousness."—Vide Bp. Ridley's Treatise on the Lord's Supper

"As for us," saith Bishop Cosin, "we al lopenly profess, with St. Bernard, that the presence of the body of Christ, in the sacrament, is spiritual, and, therefore, true and real; and with the same Bernard, and all the ancients, we deny that the body of Christ is either carnally present or given. The thing we willingly admit, but humbly and religiously forbear to inquire into the manner."

Had the Romish maintainers of transubstantiation done the same, they would not have determined and decreed, and then have imposed, as an article of faith, absolutely necessary to salvation, a manner of presence, newly by them invented, under pain of the most direful curse, and there would have been, in the Church, less wrangling, and more peace and unity.

AUTHORIZED STATEMENTS ON THE NATURE AND KIND OF PUNISHMENTS IN PURGATORY.

SIR—I want to know if the following passage fairly represents the doctrine of the Roman Catholic Church about Purgatory; and I hope you will give me an answer, or get it for me, in your paper, as I want particularly to know if it is correct:—

"When life is fled with the last light, still neither every evil nor all corporeal suffering departs from the wretched beings. It is inevitable, that many things that have, for a long time, cleaved to them, should have grown into them in a wonderful manner; therefore, they are grieved with torture, and suffer the punishment of their former sins. Some are spread out, hung up to the winds: the stain of guilt is washed out of others in a deep whirlpool, or burned out with fire. Each suffers his proper expiation. At length we are conveyed into the spacious paradise, and a few of us possess the habitations of joy, when a long time has taken out the stain that was contracted."

I hope, sir, that you will be able to tell me whether this statement of Purgatory be correct, and authorized.

Yours, &c.,

A CONSTANT READER.

We think the above passage gives a fair statement of the doctrine of Purgatory, as now commonly held by Roman Catholics. At the same time, we are bound to say, that the passage is not an authorized statement of the doctrine of the Church of Rome.

We give here such statements as are authorized, in order that our readers may compare the two. The only really authorized statement we know of, as to the nature of the sufferings in Purgatory, is in the Catechism of the Council of Trent:—"The fire of Purgatory, in which the souls of just men are cleansed by a temporary punishment, in order to be admitted into their eternal country, into which nothing defiled entereth"—p. 59. Again—"Those who require to be freed from the stains of sin, or die indebted to the Divine justice, are purified in the fire of Purgatory"—p. 61.

These are authorized statements of what the Church of Rome believes about Purgatory.

Now, on comparing the passage which "A Constant Reader" has brought forward, it will be seen at once that it agrees exactly with these authorized statements—1st, as to the purpose for which souls are sent to Purgatory—viz., to have the stains of sin purged out; 2nd, as to the efficiency of torture in effecting that cleansing; and 3rd, that fire is employed to accomplish this object. They differ in this: that the passage produced by the reader speaks of other tortures being also employed for the same purpose, such as bleaching the souls in the winds, and steeping them in a whirlpool. The Council of Trent says nothing of these punishments; but the difference is not irreconcileable, because the Catechism does not say that fire only is employed. We do not know of any authorized statement of the Church of Rome that other punishments are employed; but we believe it is left at liberty for persons to believe that other punishments are used. Thus, when some of the Greek Church, at the Council of Florence, A.D., 1439, agreed for the first time to believe in Purgatory (which confession the Greek Church disavowed), they did it in these words—"The middle sort of souls were in a place of punishment; but whether that were fire, or darkness and tempest, or something else, they would not contend."—Sess. 25. This was accepted, and so the formal instrument of agreement was drawn up—"their souls are purged after death, with purgatorial punishments"—without saying exactly what punishments. There are also many books, published by Roman Catholic authors of credit in their own church, which affirm that bleaching and steeping are used in Purgatory. These may be found in the Speculum Exemplorum, printed at Douay, A.D., 1603.

The passage which our Reader brings forward is, therefore, quite agreeable, in the main, to the authorized statements of the Church of Rome; and when it goes beyond those authorized statements, in some lesser details, it is only what Roman Catholics are allowed by their church, and what we believe they commonly do hold.

But while we say this we are bound also to say, that that passage which the Reader quotes is not an authorized statement of the doctrine of the Church of Rome: for this reason, it is actually a statement of the doctrine of the heathen religion. In fact, that passage was written by a heathen poet, Virgilius Maro, (Æn. vi. 735), before the birth of Christ, and of course before the Catholic Church or the Catholic religion were in existence. It is, therefore, a statement of the doctrines of the heathen religion, and not of the Christian religion.

It does certainly seem very strange that a statement made by a heathen, of the doctrines of the heathen religion, the religion of false gods, should serve so exactly to express the doctrines of the Church of Rome now. How can this be accounted for? Cardinal Bellarmine tries to account for it by saying that Virgil learned this much truth from the light of reason itself.—De Purgat. lib. i., cap. 11, p. 612, Colon. But, then, it seems strange that the light of reason should have taught this heathen nothing of the true God, not even that God is one. And, besides this, though the Church of Rome considers it quite true to believe now what Virgil wrote then, yet that Church considers it quite false for him to have believed a great part of it then! For Virgil believed not only that Purgatory was then in existence, but that the actual deliverance of souls from Purgatory was then actually taking place. The Church of Rome believes that Purgatory was then in existence, but holds, also, that there was no deliverance out of Purgatory until Christ descended there "to liberate from suffering the holy and the just who were held in painful captivity."—Catechism of Trent, p. 60. It is clear, therefore, that Virgil was wrong in holding what he did at that time, though the Church of Rome thinks herself right in holding the same doctrine now.

We, therefore, do not see how the exact resemblance of the heathen religion and the religion of the Church of Rome, in this doctrine, can be accounted for. Protestants say that this is a heathen doctrine, that the early Church rejected it as such, and that the Church of Rome, in later times, copied it (like other things, such as the use of incense in sacrifices, images in worship, &c.), from the heathens.

This would certainly account for the exact resemblance between the two. If any other way of accounting for it can be suggested, we will be ready to publish it.

ON LADY DAY AND GOOD FRIDAY.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

SIR—I have read, in the last number of the CATHOLIC LAYMAN, the letter of Peter Brannigan, of Meath, on the observance of Good Friday and Lady Day, together with your remarks upon it.

I have myself been very much surprised at finding that the 25th of March this year was, as your correspondent expresses it, "no day at all" among the Roman Catholics, as, although long since aware that it was contrary to the practice of the priests of the Church of Rome to celebrate Mass on Good Friday, I could scarcely believe it possible that it would be thought right to disregard so high a festival as Lady Day, merely because it fell on the anniversary of the crucifixion. I thought it was most likely that the same relaxation of discipline would be allowed, as in the case of Christmas day falling on a Friday, in which case you are aware that no fast is required.

I find, however, that in the case under consideration a different expedient was had recourse to (at least in this county—Limerick)—viz., to celebrate Lady Day on the Monday week following, while the real festival was rigidly observed as a black fast.

I am not able to give you any authority for the "strange rule" which forbids the priest to celebrate Mass on Good Friday, but I have long been aware that such a rule was in existence. I have, however, lately heard a very strange reason given for this rule. I have been told that it is because no priest is allowed to drink wine on that day. Now, sir, if this really be the reason of the rule, I would ask some of your Roman Catholic correspondents to inform me whether in the celebration of Mass the priest drinks wine at all, as I have always understood it to be the faith of the Church of Rome that, after the words of consecration (and it is then that the priest drinks of the chalice) there is a total change of the whole substance of the wine into the substance of the blood of the Lord Jesus Christ, which change is called Transubstantiation.

If there be any truth in the doctrine of Transubstantiation I should think that the priest may, without any breach of his abstinence, partake of the contents of the chalice, and if it contain the very blood of Christ, I know of no day during the whole ecclesiastical year which seems so appropriate for a participation of it as the anniversary of that day on which it flowed from the bleeding wounds of our crucified Redeemer.

I am, sir, faithfully yours,

A. C.

ON I. CORINTHIANS XI. 24.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

SIR—Permit me to correct one or two inaccuracies into which your correspondent "Fontium Petitor" has fallen. The view of Transubstantiation against which he contends, was not "put by Catholicus," but by you in the article on the Touchstone in your January number. Your words are—"If we understand these words in their literal sense, it is the cup and not the wine in it which is changed into blood." The sole object of my letter, which appears to have been misunderstood, was to impeach the logical correctness of an argument that if the predicate of a proposition is taken in a literal sense, the subject must be used in a similar and cannot be used in a figurative sense, as the word cup plainly is.

I do not pretend to be able to cope with the learning and research often displayed in your columns. I often wished that some learned Catholic divines would enter the lists with you on such matters; but it is not because I am unable to reply to the whole of a subject, that I should refrain from noticing any errors I perceive. I cannot, for example, explain why the words "το κλωμενον," alluded to by your correspondent are, as I candidly confess I think, erroneously translated in the Rhemish Testament, "which shall be broken," instead of "which is broken;' and yet I cannot admit the argument of "Fontium Petitor," in the note (7) to his letter, founded on such a statement as that our Lord's body was not broken on the cross. It is true that neither his legs nor his bones, which Fontium Petitor seems to confound with his body, were broken; but if Fontium Petitor contends that our Lord's body, which our Lord himself speaks of as broken was not broken on the cross, I would ask him where, and when else was it broken?

I regret that your correspondent had not space to be more explicit in the latter part of his letter; I fear I do not comprehend the exact nature of his argument contained in the last two paragraphs of it; and I greatly desire to understand his exact views on the subject of those paragraphs.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

CATHOLICUS.

We are inclined to concede to "Catholicus" that "Fontium Petitor" has fallen into an inaccuracy in the note in question; and if our view be correct, the argument founded on the mistake (which, however, is of very minor importance), must fall to the ground. It strikes us, however, that the mistranslation of the words το κλωμενον in the Rhemish Testament, if made with the intention supposed by "Fontium Petitor," remains open to the same objection, but on different grounds from those put by him in the note to his letter. The change of tense, from the present to the future, gives the passage a sense that does not amount to proof; the utmost it can establish is an inference, and it appears to us that the inference afforded is rather the opposite to the one intended to be drawn. Roman Catholics are driven to argue that at the very time of the institution of the Eucharist the bread was actually, miraculously, though not visibly, changed into the body of our Lord. If such a change did not then occur, it could not be contended that in future ages, down to the present time, a change has been, and is, wrought by force of the words which failed to effect it at the time. But if that change was, as they contend, effected at the time that our Lord was breaking the bread, it follows, that the breaking of his body, which he then spoke of, was the act of breaking which he, or what then appeared to be him, was then performing upon what, though it looked like bread, was really his body.

If the words το κλωμενον however, are translated "shall be broken," the expression naturally excludes the present breaking, and the substance then broken, from our Lord's description of his body which should be broken thereafter. So far as relates to the breaking, referred to as only a future act, the bread could not then have been converted, otherwise our Lord would have spoken of his body as then broken, not as afterwards to be broken. The inference, therefore, from this language, "shall be broken," negatives the identity of the bread with the body, instead of establishing that proposition. With the wish of "Catholicus" that some learned divine of his Church should enter into discussion with us, we most cordially concur. We have again and again invited them to do so, and have offered to open our columns to any Roman Catholic in the kingdom, lay or clerical, who pleases to write in a calm and temperate tone. We cannot help asking ourselves why this repeated challenge has not been accepted by any of the clergy of that Church? And but one answer suggests itself—namely, that their side of the question does not bear free discussion, and they fear its effect upon the minds of their flocks. We are unwilling to suppose that there are not in the kingdom many Roman Catholic clergymen who have sufficient learning and ability to put forward whatever can be said in favour of the doctrines of their Church, and we can, therefore, only attribute this silence to consciousness of the weakness of their cause. They no doubt, have much to say, which, to minds predisposed in their favour, is plausible enough; but there are many plausible arguments, all wise men know, which will not bear the scrutiny of a thorough examination, and it is not, perhaps, thought altogether prudent to sift to the bottom the matters we have discussed in our pages. Be this as it may, we now repeat our invitation, and our offer to insert any argument that can be produced to controvert our reasoning, or to answer those authorities, frequently taken from the works of Roman Catholics, upon which our reasoning is founded.

FARMING OPERATIONS FOR MAY.

This being the best season for general green-cropping, all routine business likely to impede the preparation of the land for these crops should be got out of hands with all the despatch possible. This will more generally apply to the sowing of the barley crop, which, from the severity of the previous weather, is now, without doubt, greatly behind the usual time of sowing that crop.

Winter sown wheat, if too luxuriant, should be eaten down with sheep, or mown; and when sown in drills should now be hoed, or harrowed and rolled.

Beans, if well up, will require hand or horse-hoeing, and the spaces between well grubbed.

Carrots and parsnips, when well up, will require careful weeding, and when sufficiently advanced hand-hoeing, thinning, horse-hoeing, and grubbing.

Mangel-wurzel, sugar beet, and Swede turnips should be got in as early in the month as possible, if not already sown. It will greatly assist their brairding to steep those seeds in soft, or manure water, for 48 hours, and after draining well to dry them with wood or other ashes. The mangels may be germinated in the same way as recommended for carrots and parsnips the two preceding months.

Dale's hybrid and purple-topped Aberdeen turnips may be sown between the middle of this and the beginning of next month.

Cabbages.—Successional sowing of early York, Fulham, M'Ewan, Vanack, or drumhead cabbages may be made early in the month; should those already made be cut off, or insufficient; and continue putting out successional crops from the nursery beds.

Sowing Clover and grass seeds.—Lose no time in sowing the clover and grass seeds, so that they may be got in before the various corn crops, with which they are to be sown, begins to cover the ground.

Flax, if not already sown, should now receive no further delay, but be committed to the ground with all the dispatch possible.

Vetches.—Sow successional breadths, according to requirements. The best guide now will be to sow another breadth as soon as the last one is up.

New Pastures.—It is highly desirable to eat down the new pastures as closely as possible with sheep. Let no culms or seed stems arise; the sure mode of having a close sward and abundant supply of succulent leaves will be, to prevent the young grasses from flowering.

Sheep.—The flocks will require close tending this month; in case of being fly stricken, let the larvæ be immediately picked out with a blunt-pointed stick, and shake in through the wool a little finely-powdered dry white-lead, which will quickly dry up and heal the part. Let the ewes having lambs be closely clipped and cleaned of all hair or wool that may grow on or about the udder, likely to be in the way of the lambs when about sucking, as swallowing particles of wool by the lambs forms, with the coagulated milk, hard balls, impossible of digestion, and destroys numerous lambs every season. Towards the end of the month, the entire flock will require washing preparatory to shearing. For this purpose a stream of pure soft water, with a clean, gravelly bottom should be chosen. Much care, supervision, and attention is required in this operation, as the value of the wool will be greatly enhanced or deteriorated, as it is well or ill handled.

The dairy should now be coming into full and profitable operation. Clean milking must be closely attended to and insisted on, and every utensil or thing connected with the stock or dairy must be kept scrupulously clean. Constant scouring and rinsing are necessary; but to keep the tubs, keelers, milking vessels, &c., thoroughly clean and sweet, nothing will be found so effective as having a boiler large enough to receive them, and give them a good boil, being previously well cleansed, which will extract the oily particles from the pores of the timber.

Calves will now require particular attention—feed regularly, and be particular in seeing that the milk be strained, so as to free it of hairs; and as they are particularly liable to suck and lick each other, each should have a small wicker work muzzle put on and shaped to prevent it; many calves being lost every season from the hair and other substances swallowed, mixing with the coagulated milk, and forming hard and large balls in the stomach, impossible of digestion. A little chalk or soda given occasionally will prevent coagulation, and even when it has taken place will dissolve it, when a dose of castor oil or Epsom salts should be given to carry off the crude matter. We extract the following from the transactions of the Highland Society, and which will be found at length in the GAZETTE, vol. x. page 219:—

"Indigestion.—The only ailment under this head, to which calves are specially subject is a peculiar sort of indigestion, generally attacking them about the first or second week after birth, but liable to occur at any time while being fed on milk, and almost exclusively confined to those reared by the hand.

"Symptoms.—It is no uncommon thing for strong, healthy calves, fed from the pail, after being three, four, or five days plentifully supplied, to fall sick. They refuse their milk, the countenance is dejected, the belly hard, the extremities cold, and the whole animal seems overcome with sickness; and after an illness, varying from a day to three or four days, they die.

"The remedial, or, at least, preventive treatment, is simple. Nature herself points it out. She never designed the calf to swallow its milk a gallon at a time, but to suck it jet by jet from the teats of its mother. By this sucking process, an abundant secretion of saliva is carried on, so that a froth-like soap-lather is seen around its mouth; and in this the air is entangled and carried down into the stomach, to perform the functions we have been speaking of. It is well-known to those who have to do with the feeding of calves, that they have an insatiable desire to suck everything within their reach. This inclination is one of nature's own provisions, and ought not, without cause, to be thwarted. If the calf cannot be allowed to suck its mother, it should have its milk given it in smaller quantities, and more frequently than is commonly done—say four or five times a-day for the first fortnight of its life. It should also be induced, by the finger or some other object in its mouth, to suck its milk, and not to drink it; and should, in addition, have some loose article within its reach at which it can draw till it is tired. Means of this kind, coupled with a judicious restriction as to the entire quantity of milk given, would prevent a large amount of disease, and the death of many calves annually would be avoided.

"White Scour.—Under the present head may be mentioned also a form of disease occurring at a subsequent period of the life of the calf, when a similar set of conditions in the stomach produces a very dissimilar set of symptoms and terminations. It is commonly from the fourth to the eighth week of age that calves are affected by what is provincially termed the 'white scour'—a disease I do not recollect to have seen anywhere described, yet in some seasons and districts occurring almost with the frequency of an epidemic.

"Symptoms.—An increased hardness of the belly, without apparent enlargement. The animal is partially off its feeding, has dry and staring hair, and loses condition.

"From the bowels there is a copious chalky discharge of a white colour, generally semifluid, and always of an intolerably fetid odour. There are also commonly discharges of blood and mucus along with the fæces, occurring now and then during the course of the disease.

"The treatment, so far as prevention is concerned, I have already indicated, when speaking of the disease as it affects the younger animal; but in the case of the 'white scour,' we are able to do more in the way of remedy than in the other. Physic is here indicated. But will physic act upon the mass of cheese-like curd that has been accumulating for weeks? Along with purging, something has to be done to promote the secretion of a healthy, digesting fluid. This points out tonics. But there is also a tendency to extra acidity, and an antidote to this is to be found in some of the alkalies. We are now led to ask if anything could be given likely to have a dissolving action in the curdy matter already past the stage of healthy digestion, and here chemistry gives us efficient aid. Milk contains a portion of free soda, by means of which the caseine or curd is held in solution. It is the neutralization of this soda by an acid either added to or produced in the milk itself that causes coagulation, and the coagulated caseine may be again re-dissolved by the action of the caustic soda. This is exactly the action desiderated, but, unfortunately, caustic soda, from the difficulty of preparing and preserving it, is not yet admitted into the veterinary pharmacopœa. As a valuable substitute, however, and antacid also, which experience has convinced me has a slow but certain solving action on the curdy accumulations under notice, I can recommend the soda carbonates or bicarbonates; the former contains a larger amount of soda in proportion to acid than the latter, but the latter has more soda in a given weight. The formula I have found most useful in the treatment of the 'white scour,' is to give first a dose of physic—oleum ricini, if it can be conveniently procured, strengthened by a few drops of oleum crotonis, and beaten up with an egg. The dose may be from two and a half to four ounces of the first named, and from four to seven drops of the last. If the above is not at hand, from four to six ounces of Epsom salts, and a tablespoonful of common salts, will have nearly the same effect. For three days after the physic, should the chalky-like fæces continue, I give the following powder, in a little milk and water, once a day:—

Bicarbonate of soda ..	....	½ oz. to 1 oz.
Powdered gentian or ginger ..	..	½ „ to ¾ „
„ croton seeds ..	..	½ gr. to 10 grains.

Mix.

"The variations in the quantities of medicine above stated are, of course, applicable to animals of different size and age. Should the disease still continue, and the animal be getting weak and reduced in flesh, after another dose of physic similar to the first, continue the antacid and tonic medicine, omitting the purgative, and giving instead, if severe purging and tenesmus supervene (as is sometimes the case) from gr. x. to gr. xxx. of pulv. opii. in each powder. By following out the above indications, a cure will seldom be missed. But as prevention is the better remedy, let the feeding of calves be judiciously attended to, and let it be recollected that it is not the quantity of milk swallowed, but the quantity digested and assimilated, that is useful to the animal, and then the disease which I have in this section endeavoured to describe, and to which calves are so liable, will disappear of themselves."

Waste or Mountain land in process of reclamation should be scrawed and burned to grow rape or turnips.

IS THE PROTESTANT BIBLE A CORRUPT AND MUTILATED TRANSLATION OF THE HOLY SCRIPTURES?

NO. II.

After the English Reformation several persons undertook to translate and publish the Holy Scriptures in English. Thus there came to be several translations, differing from each other in words and phrases, though generally agreeing in substance. Some of these were the work of individuals, and never had any sanction from the Church of England.

This was felt to be unsatisfactory, and the more so, as it gave a handle to those who wished to have no Bible in English, to charge the English Church with faults which were found only in translations made by private persons, and for which the Church was not responsible. Thus, the great Roman Catholic book on this subject, "Ward's Errata," complains loudly of the heresy of the Protestant Bible, in translating the Greek word εκκλησια, "congregation," instead of "church." It is true, it was translated "congregation," in Tyndal's translation, which never was authorized; but in the "Bishop's Bible," which was then read in the churches, it was translated "church."

To take away such handles for misrepresentation, as well as to make the translation as perfect as possible, in the beginning of the reign of King James I., about 50 of the most learned men in England were appointed to revise the translation; which work they performed with great care during several years, and it was at length published in the year 1611. Since that time no other translation has been used by Protestants; and it has often been spoken of with admiration by learned Roman Catholics, as by Bishop Doyle in Ireland, and, lately, by Bishop Kenrick in America.

Seeing that none of the old translations have been used by Protestants for two hundred and forty years, it seems needless to discuss their merits now, and we should, perhaps, not have mentioned them, but that some Roman Catholic writers still bring them forward as proofs of the variations of Protestants. They might be satisfied with the fact that, for 240 years, Protestants have not found reason to make any variations in their translation.

But how stands the fact with the Douay Bible, as to "variations?" Roman Catholics will, perhaps, be surprised to hear us talk of such a thing; they will suppose that their translation must be perfect, and can have no "variation." We ask them to attend to us now.

If any one was to get a Douay Bible, published about 50 or 60 years ago, or even the Douay Bible published in Dublin, by Dr. Troy, Roman Catholic Archbishop of Dublin, in the year 1816 (only 37 years ago), and were to compare this with the Douay Bible now published, he would find much more difference between these two Douay Bibles, than he would find between the present Douay Bible and the Protestant Bible!

The writer of this has diligently compared the three Books—that is, the old Douay Bible, the new Douay Bible, and the Protestant Bible—through many of the Books of the New Testament; and he can answer for the truth of this strange fact. He found about fifteen hundred variations in the Gospel of St. Matthew alone, between the old Douay Bible and the new Douay Bible! Many of these variations are of no importance in themselves; they are merely alterations of words without altering the sense; but many of them are of great importance. In many places, the very things in the Protestant translation which used to be cried out against by Roman Catholics, as proofs of the heresy of Protestants, are now found standing in the new Douay Bible, in the very words of the Protestant Bible! Proofs and instances of this strange fact will be given presently.

There is another fact not less strange; most of the corrections that have been made in the Douay Bible have been taken out of the Protestant Bible.

Of the 1500 alterations made in the Gospel of St. Matthew in the Douay Bible, about 1200 are taken from the Protestant Bible; the other 300 that are not taken from the Protestant Bible are generally of least consequence; all the most important corrections are taken from the Protestant Bible. We will give proofs and instances of this fact too. And then we think it will be fair to ask those Roman Catholics, who say, like the Mayo Monk and the editor of the Tablet, that the Douay Bible is God's Book, and the Protestant Bible the Devil's Book, how it came to pass that God's Book was corrected out of the Devil's Book? For the fact is certain that the persons who were entrusted with the correction of the Douay Bible, did take the Protestant Bible, as their best and surest guide in making their corrections.

We proceed now to give some instances of the importance of the changes that have been made in the Douay Bible.

Matthew, chap. i., v. 25. The old Douay Bible read, "And he knew her not, till she brought forth her first-born son, and called his name Jesus." The Protestant Bible reads, "and HE called his name Jesus." On this Dr. Ward in his "errata" says (p. 59), "to take from the Holy Mother of God what honour they can, they translate that 'HE (viz. Joseph) called his name Jesus,' and why not She as well as He? &c." Yet, in the Douay Bibles now published we read, "and He called his name Jesus." So they have found out that what Dr. Ward railed at in the Protestant Bible as dishonouring the Blessed Virgin, is right after all, and they have corrected the Douay Bible accordingly.

Here is another instance from 1 Cor., chap. xv., v. 55. The Douay Bibles, in Dr. Ward's times had the verse thus, "Where is, O Death, thy Sting? where is, O Hell, thy victory?" The Protestant Bible has, "O Death, where is thy sting? O Grave, where is thy victory?" On this Dr. Ward says, "Thus all along, whenever they find the word Hell—that is, when it signifies the place where the Holy Fathers of the Old Testament rested, called by the Church Limbus patrum, they are sure to translate it grave. . . With what face, then, can they look upon these wilful corruptions of theirs?"

Yet, when we turn to the Douay Bible now, we find this word Hell left out, and the verse runs thus—"Oh, Death, where is thy victory? Oh, Death, where is thy sting?"

Again, Hebrews, chap. ii., v. 9, was thus translated in the old Douay Bibles—"But him that was a little lessened under the angels, we see Jesus, because of the passion of death, crowned with glory and honour." The Protestant Bible has: "But we see Jesus, who was made a little lower than the angels; for the suffering of death, crowned with glory and honour."

On this Dr. Ward complains that Beza had translated it different from either; and, of the Protestant version, he says—"But in their last translation they so place the words that they will have it left so ambiguous, as you may follow which sense you will; intolerable is their deceit!" But if any one will look at the Douay Bible now, he will find the passage, word for word, as it is in the Protestant Bible, which Dr. Ward cried out against as being intolerably deceitful!

Again, in 2 Peter, chap. i., v. 15, the old Douay Bible had, "And I will do my endeavour, you to have often after my decease also, that you may keep a memory of these things." The Protestant Bible has, "Moreover, I will endeavour that ye may be able, after my decease, to have these things always in remembrance." A plain reader might be apt to think that the only difference here was that the Douay Bible made the apostle speak nonsense, and the Protestant Bible makes him speak sense. But Dr. Ward saw a greater difference: he says (p. 59)—"St. Peter speaks so ambiguously, either that he will remember them after his death, or that they shall remember him; but the Calvinists restrain the sense of this place, without any necessity, and that against the prayers and intercession of saints for us." But if we look to the Douay Bible now, we read it thus—"And I will do my endeavour, that after my decease also, you may often have, whereby you may keep a memory of these things." This translation "restrains the sense" to the very meaning of the Protestant Bible; and that, too, as Dr. Ward says, "against the prayer and intercession of saints for us."

Our readers will observe that in two of the passages above, the correctors of the Douay have adopted the very words of the Protestant Bible. We could fill our whole paper with examples, but we must be brief.

The old Douay Bibles were full of Latin words, not translated. The preface gave the reasons thus—"These words we thought it far better to keep in the text, and to tell their signification in the margin, or in a table for that purpose, than to disgrace both the text and them with translating them." They give a long list of such words, most of which are now translated in the Douay Bible just as they are in the Protestant Bible. As, for instance, Matthew, chap. xxvii., v. 62, the old Douay Bible had "Parasceue;" the Protestant Bible had "the day of the preparation," which the Douay translator said was "a cold translation, and short of the sense:" yet the Douay Bible now has "the day of preparation."

Again: the preface to the old Douay Bibles said, "how is it possible to express evangelizo but as we do, Evangelize? For evangelium being the Gospel, what is evangelizo or to evangelize, but to show the glad tidings of the Gospel, of the time of grace, of all Christ's benefits? All which signification is lost, by translating as the English Bibles do, I bring you good tidings.—Luke, chap. ii., v. 10. Yet, if we look to that verse now in the Douay Bible, we find it translated, "I bring you good tidings."

The preface of the old Douay Bible took great credit to itself for translating in Eph. vi., 12, "The spirituals of wickedness in the celestials," of which it is not easy to see the sense. But the Douay Bible now has "Against the spirits of wickedness in the high places;" which is taken from the Protestant Bible, and the note in its margin.

We could fill a book with instances of places in which the Douay Bible has been corrected, to make it agree with the Protestant Bible; but we must stop after one instance more. The old Douay Bibles always translated "our Lord," instead of "the Lord," though any one who knows either Greek or Latin knows that the latter is beyond all question the true translation. They give the reason for this in a note to 1 Tim., chap. vi., v. 20. Speaking of the words used by Protestants they say, "and though some of the said terms have been by some occasion without ill meaning, spoken by Catholics, before these heretics arose, yet now, knowing them to be the proper speeches of heretics, Christian men are bound to avoid them . . . As now we Catholics must not say "The Lord," but "our Lord;" as we say our Lady for his mother, not the Lady." So, in some hundreds of places, they translated wrong, because the Protestant Bible translated right. But in the new Douay Bibles all these places are changed to agree with the Protestant Bible.

Roman Catholics may wish to know when all these changes in the Douay Bible were made. The oldest edition, in which we happen to have seen these new improvements, is a Douay New Testament, published by Dr. Troy, Roman Catholic Archbishop of Dublin, in 1803. There may have been earlier editions with the corrections, and we should be obliged to any one who could give us information about this.

It is a curious fact, that this same Dr. Troy, 13 years after, should have published a large Douay Bible (quarto. Coyne, 1816) without the alterations, and exactly the same as the old Douay Bibles. It would seem that there must have been great uncertainty then as to what the Roman Catholic translation ought to be: and, perhaps, a great struggle about it. But the corrected version conquered in the end. We do not complain of this; we approve of all those corrections. But we think it unreasonable of Roman Catholics now to complain that corrections were made in the Protestant translation 250 years ago, when they themselves have made so many thousand corrections in theirs within 50 years past. And we think it very unreasonable that any Roman Catholic should say, as the poor monk in Mayo, and Mr. Lucas, the editor of the Tablet, have said, that the Protestant Bible is "the Devil's Book," when, in fact, it is the Book by which their own translation has been corrected. We ask Roman Catholics to remember that the Roman Catholic Bibles now circulated, with the approbation of all the Roman Catholic bishops, have been corrected by the Protestant Bible. Surely, then, they cannot think that the Protestant Bible is "the Devil's Book."

We showed in our last paper, that only for the Protestant Bible, Roman Catholics would never have had the Douay Bible at all. We have now showed them that the Douay Bible has been corrected in a vast number of places, and many of them very important places, by the Protestant Bible. This may well lead them to give a candid consideration to the things in which the two translations still differ. We shall return to this part of the subject again.

THE CATHOLIC DOCTRINE ON THE USE OF THE BIBLE.

BY HIS EMINENCE, CARDINAL WISEMAN.

IT was with feelings and expectations of a mixed kind that we began the perusal of this tract. We are glad, at any time, to meet with an argument written by a modern Roman Catholic divine, addressed to the members of his own communion; for, in quoting his words, or in stating their substance, with references to his text, we are safe from the suspicion of intentional mis-statement. When we took up a paper, not only re-published, but given to the world under the high sounding name of Cardinal Wiseman, we looked for that which, indeed, we found—ability, eloquence, a certain plausibility of reasoning and still more of manner. But we also expected an appearance of candour, and a line of argument more weighty, more difficult to meet in reply, than we think this tract presents: we did not anticipate that the manly intellect and well-known talent and learning of Cardinal Wiseman could stoop to such weapons as shallow misrepresentation; or rely upon those hacknied sophistries which we so often find palmed in place of argument upon Roman Catholics to justify the restricted use of the Holy Scriptures. Whether these remarks are just we shall presently leave to the candour of our readers.

This paper first appeared in The Dublin Review, under the title of "The Bible in Maynooth." It purports to be a review of an introductory work on Scripture, by the Most Rev. Dr. Dixon, then professor of the Holy Scriptures at the College of Maynooth. In its present form, however, a very small portion of it is devoted to the notice of that work; and of that portion, none but the few opening sentences call for any observation from us. The tract opens in a tone of triumphant exultation at the "consternation" which Dr. Dixon's work will cause in the "enemy's camp;" not by its arguments, its learning, &c., all of which are duly praised, but by the discovery it will impart of the actual existence of a chair of Holy Scripture at Maynooth—a professorship not existing (de nomine) in the universities of "the enemy." Cardinal Wiseman is mistaken if he supposes that the "enemy" will, on this discovery, jump to the simple conclusion that because Maynooth pays a professor, it must follow that, in a bona fide sense, "Scripture is there read, Scripture is studied, Scripture is expounded" The tree planted at Maynooth, like every tree in the garden of Christianity, must be submitted to the test appointed by our Lord Himself, and be known by its fruits. Now, we are not disposed to inquire how far the alumnus of Maynooth comes up to the character which St. Paul describes as befitting a servant of God, who, he says, "must not wrangle, but be mild towards all men, apt to teach, patient, with modesty admonishing them that resist the truth."—2 Tim. ii. 24. Such an inquiry would afford no certain test of the nature and quality of the Scripture instruction at Maynooth; for, unhappily, there is too little mildness elsewhere also. We doubt not, too, that there are some excellent and pious priests who do read the Bible for themselves, though they may not feel at liberty to urge its study on the laity, but we are obliged, by the experience of others as well as our own, to say we seldom meet in Ireland a priest of Maynooth who even pretends to an intimate acquaintance of the Holy Scripture—to that head knowledge of it which is the peculiar fruit of the professor's labours. You may meet and converse with the Maynooth-educated priest in every steam boat, railway carriage, public place; you may see the rapid movement of his lips when engaged in the recital of his devotional exercises; you may observe in his hand the open Missal or the Breviary; but you seldom see with him a copy of the Douay or any other Bible; you can seldom trace, by his conversation or otherwise that he is a well-instructed or a habitual reader of Scripture. Until we see the fruits, therefore, we are unable to believe that the tree of Scripture instruction, though it may be planted at Maynooth, has been properly nurtured and trained, so as to take deep root and flourish in the soil.

Cardinal Wiseman rejoices, that Dr. Dixon has taken possession of a ground, which, he says belongs of right exclusively to the "Catholic." Every Protestant, says he, who, if he reads the Bible at all, does not understand three words of what he reads, who does not practice one of its precepts, considers himself entitled to ask any Catholic, "why do you not do as I do, make the Bible your rule of faith, and use the privilege of reading it and judging for yourself?" The Catholic, so interrogated, "knows that it is a foregone conclusion that all religion consists in reading, or pretending to read the Bible; that he who does not at least claim the privilege of reading it as he likes, though he may never use it, is something horrible, while he who boasts of it, and talks about it, secures some sort of religious pre-eminence here, and has a passport for the sort of fools paradise, which he considers Heaven to be."

The "Catholic," therefore, for want of courage, instead of saying, "and pray sir," (or "madam") what do you know about the Bible, or where did you get the book you call by that name, or how do you know that it is the Bible at all?" will assert that his Church does permit him and some others to read the Bible, thus admitting the principle of his adversary, instead of taking the "higher ground" of denying the right of Protestants to use, much more their right to interpret the Bible, to which, he says, they have no claim, and asserts that they "can prove neither its canon, its inspiration, nor its primary doctrines, except through that very authority which they are questioning."

Cardinal Wiseman writes exclusively for the "Catholic" reader, and draws freely enough upon his credulity and ignorance of Scripture, and consequently of true Protestantism. When he speaks of it as "decided by the newspapers and by Exeter Hall," that all religion consists in reading or pretending to read the Bible, or that the dry and barren reading of it, even without the "boasting and talking" he speaks of, gives any pre-eminence, or any privilege but that of better means of knowledge with the attendant increased responsibility, he greatly mistakes, or, at all events, mis-states the principles of Protestantism. He may be challenged to produce any evidence of the truth of his account of the Protestant notion of Scripture reading. No Protestant would insult the understanding of an assembly at Exeter Hall, or anywhere else, by asserting that the bare reading of the Bible gives one sinner a superiority over his fellow sinner. Protestants profess to take the Scripture as their guide, and it is not the hearing or the reading, but the doing of the word, the conformity of men's lives to its precepts, that they find inculcated in Scripture, and that they therefore profess to consider as the profitable fruit of its study.

Another misrepresentation of a different kind is the statement that Protestants cannot prove the canon, inspiration, &c., of the Bible, "save through the very authority they are questioning." The argument of Cardinal Wiseman would be lame, indeed, if he once admitted what Protestants insist upon, the internal evidence of inspiration afforded by the Scriptures. And as to the canon, it is a mistake to suppose that Protestants do not attach weight to the authority and practice of the Christian Church from the Apostolic age downwards. Not only was the canon of Scripture, as recognised by the early Church, adopted by Protestants of the Church of England in her Articles, but they made use of this evidence in support of the practice of infant baptism, the observance of the Sabbath, and other matters. What they deny is the infallibility of any Church; and they totally deny what Dr. Wiseman, of course, asserts, that the primitive Christian Church and the Roman Catholic Church are one and the same. The infallible authority of the latter they reject; the legitimate power of the former they admit.

The Cardinal proceeds to compare the alleged cry of "the Bible! the Bible! nothing but the Bible;" with the Jews senseless cry of the "Temple of the Lord," and describes the one to be as "perilous to salvation," as "vain, formal, and superstitious" as the other. As the temple became an idol and was destroyed, so he prophesies will the Bible be also removed—nay, the process he says, is actually going on; for, on the one hand the learned Protestantism of the continent is hastening into the abyss of infidelity, and dragging the Bible with it down to the level of an ordinary book, an uninspired old record; on the other hand the handling of it by the unlearned is destroying its vitality. The description of this process affords probably the best specimen of the Cardinal's style, and in our usual spirit of fair dealing, we transcribe his very words:—

"The holy, the sublime, the awful word of God, over which saints have meditated in cells for years of ineffable sweetness, yet of solemn reverence, round which scholars, pale with watching, have wreathed the flowers they have woven, or culled, in variegated commentaries; which the silver voice of virgins, or the deep tones of monks, have chaunted in breathless midnight, that no earthly sound might disturb the depth of their meditation; this compilation of the one spirit of God from the providence of centuries, through which alone He has lived; this treasure of spiritual honey, drawn from a thousand flowers of various delicacy of perfume and flavour, not mixing, but each preserved; this gem of matchless price, reflecting in an infinite number of faces, the ever varying, yet constant image of God, in his might, in his sweetness, in his anger, in his love, in his unity, in his Trinity, in his heavens, on his earth, on Sinai and on Calvary; this noblest, greatest, divinest of things unsacramental, is put, indiscriminately, unceremoniously, into the hands of every one. It is the school-boy's task book, it is the jailor's present, it is the drunkard's pawned pledge, it is the dotard's text book, it is the irreverent jester's butt, it is the fanatic's justification for every vice, blasphemy, and profaneness which he commits. For into every one's hand it must needs be thrust, from the Chinese to the Ojibbewa, from the Laplander to the Bosjesman; from the child to the dotard, from the stuttering peasant to the glib self righteous old dame."

The argument proceeds to the effect, that there is no evidence but the word of the giver, that this book, so put into every hand, clean or unclean, is what it is called—the Word of God. There is no previous study, no demonstration of genuineness or information about the writers, &c. Full power is given to uninstructed minds to interpret it as they please, and to put any construction they please upon it, and it is asked what code of laws, moral or social, could, with safety, be thus treated? The Bible, it is alleged, is the most abstruse book extant, and allusion is made in proof of this to the genealogies of Genesis and Esdras, the architectural details of Exodus, Kings, and Ezekiel, the minutiæ of the Levitical code, &c. To the objection supposed to be made to this argument—namely, that the "Bible-alone theory" does not exclude guidance in the use of Scripture, and that commentaries and expositions have been written by Protestants, and that reformed clergymen expound the Scriptures to their flocks—it is answered to the effect, first, that there is not one copy of any commentary sold for a hundred copies of the Bible given away—and, secondly, the great variety of opinions to which the indiscriminate use of the Scripture gives rise is relied upon. Every man goes to his own Church and preacher, and learns a different doctrine from that professed by others; so that the Scriptures, so given and thus variously interpreted, are "wrested by the unlearned and unstable to their own destruction." The dominions of Queen Pomare are pointed to in triumph, where it is alleged that, "under the judicious management of evangelical missionaries, a mild and promising people were transformed into a pack of lazy, immoral infidels." The slowness of the destructive effect in England of the word of God is attributed to a "strong underground of old tradition" which the Reformation could not dig up, the "civilization interwoven with old truths," "a deference to rank and wealth," and attention is invited to the agencies at work to destroy "these preservative and conservative influences?' The poisonings, infanticides, disregard of connubial ties, and increase of illegitimacy in the rural districts in England, and the infidel publications in towns, are pressed into service for this purpose, and, it is asserted, that the Bible is "unable to contend" with these evils. Modern science, electricity, and even mesmerism, are brought in aid, as furnishing new implements for the attempt to uproot the inspiration of Scripture miracles and prophecy. The two ways, therefore, in which the unlimited use of Scripture is leading to the destruction of this "ill-used blessing," and to the "spread of infidelity less intellectual and more sensual than German rationalism" consist—first, in the want of evidence that accompanies the Scriptures beyond the word of man; and, secondly, in the innumerable varieties of opinion into which unlearned men, judging for themselves, must fall. An argument of Dr. Dixon is then touched upon, founded upon the following extract from a charge of the Bishop of London—"To deny the inspiration of Scripture is one step towards the rejection of the Gospel as a revelation from God. Against this fatal heresy I would earnestly caution my younger brethren," &c. And the following is quoted as Dr. Dixon's "pithy comment":—"We are here told, and truly, that to deny inspiration is to embrace a fatal heresy. On the other hand, the Church of England, in her 6th Article, declares that 'Holy Scripture containeth all things necessary to salvation, so that whatever is not read therein, nor may be proved thereby, is not required of any man that it should be believed as an article of faith, or be thought requisite or necessary to salvation.' We shall see, just now, how, by adhering to the doctrine of this article, any one can be convicted of fatal heresy, for denying the inspiration of Scripture." Dr. Wiseman proceeds to assure us that Dr. Dixon has established this point satisfactorily. He prefers, however, giving us his own logic on the subject, as follows:—

"A fatal heresy can only be the denial of an article of faith necessary to salvation. But according to the Articles nothing can be of faith which cannot be proved by Scripture; it follows, therefore, that the inspiration of Scripture is proved by Scripture: hence, we have this process of logical demonstration established. You are bound, under pain of heresy to believe in the inspiration of the Bible. But as no heresy can exist unless the doctrine which it contradicts be read in the Bible, it follows that you are obliged to believe in the inspiration of the Bible, because that inspiration is there declared. But belief in what is there taught, as an essential truth, to deny which is heresy, pre-supposes the recognition of the Bible as an inspired book; and, therefore, you are thrown back and forward, from one horn to the other; you believe in the Bible because it is inspired, and you believe it is inspired because you find it in the Bible."

The whole argument concludes with the following proposition:—

"The truth is comprised in a few words—'No infallible Church, no Bible.' On no less, on no other authority could such a tremendous fact be received; no weaker foundation will uphold it."

We have endeavoured to give a connected sketch of the substance of this argument; and, in order to do so, have resisted the frequent temptation to interrupt the thread of it with observations of our own. The first thing that strikes the mind of the Bible-reader on perusal of it is, the total rejection of the internal evidence (to which we have before adverted) as affording proof of the Divine origin of Scripture. It is a question too long for discussion here; and we must pass it by with the remark that Dr. Wiseman himself, if he has read, as no doubt he has, the works of Paley,* cannot but admire the lucid and satisfactory manner in which the truth of the historical parts of the New Testament is proved by the mere collation and comparison of different passages, independent of external evidence. Such proof of the historical parts opens the door at once to all that noble train of reasoning founded upon them, written by the same author, in his work on the Evidences of Christianity. The truth of the Gospels follows, of course; and, in short, when once we can find a spot of Divine revelation large enough for the foot to rest upon, proved satisfactorily, without external aid, the proof of the whole must be easily established. But the next thing that strikes us is the total rejection of Divine aid in the understanding and interpretation of Scripture. Cardinal Wiseman may be himself a great Biblical scholar, as, no doubt, he is; but in his pamphlet were written by an infidel it could not more completely set at nought the teaching and guidance of the Holy Spirit, which is promised to all that ask it in sincerity. It is not to prelates or priests, but to every one that asketh, it shall be given; every one that seeketh findeth, and to every one that knocketh it shall be opened.

This belief, professed by Protestants, founded on the express promises of God, that all who ask it shall receive the Spirit to guide them to all truth, by which they, of course, understand all vital and essential truth—all truth necessary to salvation—is not even honoured with a sneer. And yet upon this promise of the teaching of the spirit rests the true answer to that part of Cardinal Wiseman's argument, which is founded upon the variety of opinion to which the free use of Scripture leads. He argues from the abuse against the use; we say, that the humble student of Scripture, who prays earnestly for Divine assistance cannot, if the promises of God are true, fall into error in anything essential to salvation. If a variety of opinions be formed by the Infidel, the Rationalist, those who set their own reason above, instead of using it with the aid of Heavenly revelation, the true use of the Bible is not, on this account, to be denied to the Christian. We must observe that Dr. Wiseman perverts what he calls the "Bible-alone axiom" of Protestants; and he is also guilty of gross misrepresentation when he asserts, or insinuates, that Protestants hold that every man is at liberty to interpret Scripture according to his will and fancy, without any other guidance than his own reason. The "Bible alone" axiom is solely applied to the question of the rule of faith of Protestants; Cardinal Wiseman treats it as if the Bible alone, and not the keeping of its precepts, constituted their religion. Again, the Church of England, and almost every Protestant sect, professes to have its oral teaching by its ministers, both in and out of the pulpit. What it maintains is not the right of capricious interpretation, but the right of exercising the reason, with humility and prayer, and thus of judging whether the doctrine taught by its clergy is in accordance with the Word of God. That the Scriptures are, as it must be confessed, with regret, they are, often turned to a bad use, perhaps made the "jester's butt" or the "drunkard's pledge," is no more a just argument against the free use of them than a similar profane use, by the same class of persons, of those relics, and rosaries, and crucifixes, which the Church of Rome holds sacred, would be against delivering these venerated things to the good "Catholic;" and yet that Church never scruples, and we suppose Cardinal Wiseman himself would not scruple, to place them in the hands of every one that professes a willingness to receive them, even the untutored African or American savage. The difficulties of some parts of Scripture present an argument equally devoid of force against the general reading of it. Scripture, we are told, is "profitable to teach, to correct, to instruct in justice"—2 Timothy, iii. 16—notwithstanding the abstruseness of parts of it which do not relate to matters essential to Christian doctrine. St. Peter, when he speaks of the "things hard to be understood"—2 Peter, iii. 16, 17—cautions the brethren not to abstain from the reading of the Scriptures, but to "take heed lest, being led aside by the error of the unwise, they should fall from their own steadfastness." We cannot but regret the eagerness which is apparent in that part of Cardinal Wiseman's argument—where he brings forward every piece of hypocrisy, immorality, infidelity, and vice he can find, as if he gloated over it with triumph, and lays it all at the door of the sacred Word of God. Now, we deny in toto that these things are attributable to any such cause. The infidelity of the continent, by no means confined to Protestants, we could easily trace to far different sources. If vice in some parts of England be on the increase, it will be found owing more to the neglect than the use of Scripture and of religious teaching; owing also to other causes in conjunction with that neglect, yet totally unconnected with religion. While we refuse to admit the unproved assertions of Cardinal Wiseman respecting the subjects of Queen Pumaru to be true, we reply to them on the one hand by saying, that we are not without materials, if we had but space, to show the blessed effects of the preaching of the Gospel upon many individuals in the island of Tahiti; effects most satisfactory to those who know both by experience and from the express words of our Lord, how small a proportion the "chosen" must bear to the "called," wherever the Gospel is preached; and, on the other hand, by pointing, by way of set off, to those other parts of the world to which the cardinal would have referred if he found anything there to aid his argument. The wonderful changes wrought by missionary labour and Gospel teaching amongst the red men of America, the sons of Ham in Africa, and the cannibals of New Zealand, may be adduced as examples on the other side. We may also refer to the United States, where there is but little of that "underground of old tradition," where the civilization is not much "interwoven with old truths," where there is not to be found that "deference to rank and wealth, their opinions and doctrines," which Cardinal Wiseman would represent as checking the evil effects of God's word at home. There, at least, all religious creeds meet on equal terms. There the word can "run" and "have free course," and yet we do not find that immorality and infidelity prevail, though doubtless that free soil is unfavourable to the Church of Rome, as has been abundantly proved by Roman Catholic authorities within the last few years.* But if we descend to lower ground and point to the temporal fruits of the spread of Christian truth; if, without excluding other causes of social progress, we give, as truth obliges us to do, to the influence of the Gospel by far the foremost place amongst the causes of the advancement of civilization in the greater part of the world—an influence pervading the whole of society, and operating indirectly upon those supposed to be furthest removed from its direct control; if we point to the almost unlimited freedom tempered with order, the willing obedience to law, respect for Sabbaths, regard for religious observances, universal toleration, humane laws, munificent contributions, splendid charities, and the general energy and spirit, all combining to place the English nation in a position unparalleled by anything to be seen on the face of the earth, or to be read of in the page of history; if we pursue this investigation and see the extension of all or most of these blessings from England their parent over all her scattered dependencies, as well as throughout the American Continent; we may well smile at the beggarly regiment of infidels, scuffers, and profligates, which Cardinal Wiseman is able to muster from the "slums of Westminster," and with which he vainly expects to exclude the Bible and, with the Bible, we contend, the progress of eternal truth from the people.

When we come, however, to the conclusion of all this argument—"No infallible Church, no Bible," we cannot but feel amazed at the coolness with which a Roman Catholic divine calculates the exact length to which he will permit his flock to use their reason and intellect. His whole train of argument, including that upon the Bishop of London's charge (which we pass by for the present, as founded on the exclusion of internal evidence of the inspiration of Scripture), is addressed, to the credulity of his readers, indeed, as to facts, but to their reasoning faculties as to argument. Does he flatter himself that any rational person can bring his mind to a stand still, at "no infallible Church, no Bible," and not ask the next question that forces itself upon his reason, and say—"If the Bible rests upon the infallible Church, what does the infallible Church rest upon? How do you prove your infallibility? If you say, I rest it upon the Divine commission given to Saint Peter and his successors, when our Lord said—'Upon this rock will I build my Church,' or upon the promise of our Lord to be with his Church 'all days, unto the end of the world,' I answer, are not these sayings and promises to be found only in the Bible? If you attempt to prove your authority from Scripture, I immediately retort upon you your own argument against the Bishop of London; you argue in a circle; you are "thrown back and forward from one horn to the other;" you believe the Bible to be inspired because the Church has authority to declare it to be so; you believe the Church has that authority because you find it (or what you represent as it) in the Bible. But if, on the other hand, you declare that the Church has, independent of Scripture, an inherent authority, founded on tradition, or on something, by which it first declares itself infallible, and then declares the Bible inspired, I again retort upon you, and say, that if driven to an assertion, a mere "ipse dixit," instead of proof, I shall prefer the authority of the Word of God for its own inspiration to that of the Church of Rome for its own infallibility. If the Church claims at all to be infallible, I should be more ready to give credence to that claim, if provable by Scripture, than to believe the inspiration of the latter on the bare authority of the former, that authority resting on its own assertion." The Cardinal must either stop the play of his readers' intellect at the particular point, and say—"Hitherto shalt thou come, and no further," or, having led the mind by a train of reasoning, such as it is, to that point, he must go a step further, and remove, from before his Church's claim, the very difficulty he has himself thrown as a stumbling-block before that of the Bible.

FESTIVAL OF THE TRANSLATION OF THE RELICS OF SS. PATRICK, BRIGID, AND COLUMKILLE—JUNE 9.

In days of old, when Translations of the Bible were much less common, and less thought of, than they are now, the minds of religious people were often very much occupied with Translations of books and relics of the Saints, connected with which, from time to time, very wonderful circumstances were not unfrequently narrated. What is implied by a Translation, used in this latter sense, a good many of our readers are probably more or less aware. Those who are wholly unacquainted with the nature of the ceremony may now have an opportunity of learning somewhat of its character, from the account which is to follow; while all, we doubt not, who give this paper an attentive perusal, will feel not a little interested at the sufficiently curious particulars which we propose here to submit to their consideration.

There is published by Messrs. Richardson and Son, of Capel-street, in Dublin, for the edification of Roman Catholics in these countries, a very neat little book of the lives of SS. Patrick, Brigid, and Columkille: it is bound in green cloth, with gilt edges, has for frontispiece a handsome copperplate of St. Patrick spiflicating" the serpents, and an ornamental title page with rubricated letters, wherein the book is called a "a Triple Leaf, just collected from the purest sources;" which prepares one for finding some rather poetical matter in the narratives to follow, and may suggest also, to a cautious reader, the propriety of examining the purity of the sources concerned; though the black letter inscription at the commencement "For God, Our Lady, and St. Patrick," might, perhaps, appear to some a sufficient guarantee, that, under such auspices, nothing but what was very carefully ascertained to be truthful and orthodox would be presented for perusal in the volume.

From this little book, as appearing to be the latest and most respectable thing of the kind provided for popular use, we take the following account of the Translation of the relics of the patron Saints of Ireland, occupying the last three pages of the work—(pp. 146-148):—

"During the incursion of the pirate Danes in the ninth century, the holy remains of St. Bridget were, for security, transferred from Kildare to Down, and deposited with those of St. Patrick; and soon after St. Columba's sacred relics were removed from Hy, and laid in the same resting-place. The memory of this event was indeed long and faithfully preserved, but gradually the remembrance of the precise spot in which the holy remains lay became obliterated both from the minds of clergy and people, perhaps because that, originally, the knowledge of the circumstance was, for greater security, confined to a few. The extraordinary veneration entertained for this saintly trio by the glorious St. Malachy, who, in the year 1136, occupied the primatial see of Armagh, made him desirous to discover their hallowed tomb; and as every means devised by his ingenuity for procuring such information had proved unavailing, and that human exertion had failed, he had recourse to omnipotent prayer, and, with a holy importunity, besought our Lord to reveal to him what he was so anxious to know. He was heard: for lo! after having persevered for some time in urging this pious request, on a certain night, while still communing upon it with God in the Church, a ray of light resembling a sunbeam was seen by him to pass along the sacred edifice until it reached a particular spot, when it ceased to advance. Convinced that the Divine Majesty had appointed this means of enlightening him on what he was so much interested in, the holy primate had the place dug up, and when the earth was removed, behold! the bodies of the three blessed saints were discovered in the same grave. When exhumed, Malachy had them deposited in new coffins, and once more enclosed in their sepulchre.

"On learning the circumstance from the holy prelate, De Courcy, Lord of Down, concurred with him in sending deputies to the holy see to solicit permission from the pope to deposit the sacred relics more honourably, and to remove them to another part of the church. Urban III. then filled St. Peter's chair, and, having personal knowledge both of St. Malachy and De Courcy, he instantly ordered Vivian, Cardinal priest of St. Stephen, to proceed to Ireland to assist at the celebration of the intended ceremony. He did so; and, on the appointed day, the 9th of June, feast of St. Columba, the translation† took place with the usual solemnities: the venerable remains being interred in the place prepared in presence of fifteen bishops, and a numerous assemblage of priests.

"To preserve the memory of this consoling event, it was immediately decreed that the anniversary of 'the translation' should be thenceforward kept as a solemn festival throughout Ireland, which decree has long since, for just reasons we presume, ceased to be in force."

'Twere a pity, surely, that there should be any just reasons for risking the memory of so consoling an event. That there do exist sufficiently weighty considerations, which might exercise an influence in that way is, however, only too certain, as we shall easily make apparent.

It is very odd that the author of the "Triple Leaf from the purest sources" has not communicated to his reader the year in which the above marvellous transaction is supposed to have taken place, as he might have found it, as well as the rest of the story, in any of the authorities which contain the same recital. According to Giraldus Cambrensis, in his Topographia Hiberniæ, Dist. iii., c. 18, the relics were found in the year in which John Earl of Morton (afterwards King John) first visited Ireland, i. e. 1185. In the Office for the Translation of the Relics of SS. Patrick, Columba, and Brigid, printed at Paris, in 1620, and reprinted by Colgan, Messingham, and Ussher, a full account is given of the discovery in that year, 1185; which has been abstracted by Dr. Lanigan, in his Ecclesiastical History of Ireland, vol. iv., p. 274, &c., and the substance of which is also given to the readers of the Triple Leaf (as well as now to those of the Layman), in the passage above.

But the whole account of this marvellous transaction, patronised by the Anglo-Norman invader of Down, and by the highest authorities of the Church of Rome, was altogether ignored by the people of Ireland, who had another "Translation" of their own, and either knew nothing about the one in Down, or else gave no heed to the attempts made to elicit their veneration towards it. Of the native Irish "Translation," rather more than 100 years later than the Anglo-Roman one, the following notice (copied afterwards, almost verbatim, by the Four Masters into their Annals), occurs in the Annals of Ulster, at A.D. 1289. [Al. 1293.]

"A.D. 1289—It was revealed to Nicholas Mac Molissa, coarb of Patrick [i. e., Primate of Armagh], that the relics of Patrick, and Columkille, and Bridget, were in Saul of St. Patrick† [i. e., Saul, Co. Down], and they were taken up by him, whereupon followed great wonders and miracles; and he placed them honourably in a shrine again."

In the Irish Annals of the Four Masters, the passage in question reads thus:—

"A.D. 1293. Taifi Patraic, Colum cille, 7 Brigde, do foillriuccad do Nicol mac Maoilisa (comarba Patraicc) do beit i Saball, a tdoccbail laif, Feairta mora azur mionbaile do denam doib iarain, azur a ccuri i Sceirin iar na cumdac go honorach ar a haicle."

Dr. O'Donovan's note on this passage is well worthy of our attention. It runs thus:—

"It is a very strange fact that the body of St. Patrick, the Apostle of Ireland, was said to have been pointed out by an angel, at Glastonbury, the year before.—See Ussher's Primordia, p. 892. But the most extraordinary circumstances connected with the history of the relics of the Trias Thaumaturga is, that the Irish annalists—that is, such as wrote in the Irish language [such, in fact, as were of the 'mere Irish,' and not of the Anglican 'pale'], do not appear to have ever heard of the discovery of them by Malachy in 1185, and hence it is but fair to conclude that Malachy's dream at Down was got up by the English party, in order to add dignity to Down, then in the possession of Sir John de Courcy. It is quite evident that the mere Irish never heard, or, at least, never believed this story of their discovery at Down, in 1185; for, if they had been deposited in a costly shrine at Down in 1185, as stated by Giraldus, it is hard to believe that they would have been lost in the course of the next century, so as to make another revelation necessary for their discovery in 1293, when it would appear they were under the earth at Saul, in a spot unknown to all except Nicholas Mac Maelisa, the Archbishop of Armagh, to whom it was pointed out in a vision. It seems, therefore, quite clear that the discovery of them at Down, in 1185, was, like the propheey of Merlin, already alluded to under the year 1177, a scheme of Sir John de Courcy and his writers, and that their discovery at Saul, in 1293, was a counter scheme of Nicholas Mac Maelisa, who was one of the greatest opposers of the English that ever governed the See of Armagh. It may, however, have happened that both bishops had dreamed of bones, and that bones were found in both places."—(Annals of the Four Masters. Note at A.D. 1293, p.p. 457, 458.)

D'feidir sin, mairead, go cinnte.

There is certainly a very curious discrepancy between this note of Dr. O'Donovan's and the specimen of the Triple Leaf above given. Both are, alike, from writers belonging to the Communion of the Church of Rome. The one, however, contains the reflections of a careful and learned inquirer into history, while the other, although professing to derive its matter "from the purest sources," exhibits such extravagant blundering in reference to plain facts of well ascertained history, as may cause us to feel no surprise at finding him swallow for genuine, and circulate for reception among others, the fictions contrived among the Anglo-Romish Churchmen of Down, in the 12th century. For what could well be more absurd, than to bring in "the glorious St. Malachy," to have anything to say to a transaction that occurred 37 years after his death. For, anybody who has paid the least attention to the history of that period (especially one having access to the "purest sources."), should have been aware that the individual known by the name of "St. Malachy," (who had been primate of Ireland, and afterwards Bishop of Down), died at Clairvaux, in France, on Nov. 2, 1148; and that the Malachy, Bishop of Down, and friend of John de Courcy, who assisted at the Translation celebrated on June 9, 1185, was a wholly different person.

† Sabl is now a small village, about two miles east of Downpatrick. The word means a barn; and, probably, it implied originally (as Dr. Lanigan thinks), the barn of Dichu, St. Patrick's first convert, afterwards made use of as a Church.

The case now presented to the reader furnishes a very instructive illustration of the purity of the sources, from which highly respectable parties in the Church of Rome are content to draw materials for feeding and cherishing the devotional feelings of members of her communion. The "consoling event" of the Triple Leaf, the wonderful miracle which furnished occasion for a special office of its own in the Ritual of that Church, turns out to be, when examined into, "a scheme of Sir John de Courcy and his writers;" a scheme which never took with the Irish people, which none of their writers ever cared to notice in the religious Annals of their country (well enough disposed as they certainly were, to make mention of all such marvellous occurrences generally, when not in some special way distasteful to their prejudices), and which, finally, "for just reasons," we may now safely say, the Church which fostered it at the outset has seen it more desirable to efface, if possible, from a place in her memorials, than to submit any longer to the light of public attention.

THE TWO PICTURES—A DISPUTE.

R. Catholic.—"Where was your religion before Luther?"
Protestant.—"Where was your face before it was washed?"
OLD SAW.

As the delays of the courts of justice have latterly become a favourite subject of discussion, we propose to give a short account of one of the most protracted suits that have ever arisen. It is now upwards of 300 years since the litigation in question commenced, and, at the present moment, it appears as far from a decision as on the day when the first proceedings were taken.

In the sixteenth century, there lived, in an ancient manor-house, two sisters, co-heiresses.

Amongst other property that had descended to them from a long line of ancestry, were two pictures. One of which had long hung up in the room appropriated specially to the use of one of the sisters, the other in the room similarly appropriated to the other. These pictures, which were duplicates, were known to be the likenesses of a distinguished ancestor who had been remarkable for his eminent virtues. Tradition had also assigned to him all the personal advantages of beauty and strength. Of these, however, the pictures gave no adequate representation; to such an extent had the dust of ages accumulated on the canvas, that it was almost impossible to discern any trace of the original features or appearance. In the same mansion-house there was also a library, which contained many ancient and curious manuscripts, and the younger sister being of an inquisitive turn of mind, spent much of her time in deciphering these ancient records. In this pursuit, she at length came upon a very old manuscript, which, to her great joy, she found had been written in the age when her distinguished ancestor lived, and in it was contained a very full and particular description of his person and appearance. The writer dwelt much on his great virtues, and on how eminently their existence was indicated by his external features, and he referred to the pictures of him as most accurate delineations, describing also their original brilliancy of colouring and well defined outlines.

Greatly delighted with this discovery, the younger sister at once carried the manuscript to her sister, and proposed that steps should be immediately taken to restore these pictures to their original state by the removal of the dust, which ages of neglect had encrusted upon them. At first the elder sister seemed well pleased with the proposal, and immediately sent for the old butler to whose care these pictures had been, for a long time, entrusted.

Now this old butler was very obstinate, and having no great taste for exertion or change, immediately raised many objections to the order of his mistress. He said that, for his part, he remembered the pictures to have been exactly in their present state in the time of the father and grandfather of the present owners, and as they had been quite content with the pictures in their present condition, he did not see why the daughters should not be so also. Besides, he said, to meddle with them would be dangerous, and in the attempt the pictures themselves would probably be destroyed. These arguments of the old butler prevailed with the elder sister, and as her own disposition inclined her to agree with the old man, she declined, though often pressed, to take any step in the business. The younger sister thus disappointed, and believing it useless to reason further with her sister or the old butler, at length determined to take in hand the cleaning of that picture which, hanging in her own apartment, had been particularly appropriated to her, and proceeding cautiously to work, she tried first the effect on one corner of the picture where nothing but the drapery could be injured.

The experiment was completely successful, and in her triumph, she called her sister and the old butler to witness her success, but instead of convincing them by the evidence of their own senses, her proceedings only roused their indignation, and, at the suggestion of the old butler, the elder sister declared that she would separate for ever from the other if she persisted in her attempt. Indeed the old butler, forgetting altogether his position, threatened to turn her out of the house. Notwithstanding these threats, the younger sister proceeded with her task, and, after much labour and anxiety, succeeded in removing almost all the dirt and dust that had hitherto obscured the picture, and great indeed was her delight when she found that the picture, as restored, corresponded accurately with the description contained in the old manuscript. Again were seen in all their original brilliancy of colouring, the noble features of their great ancestor. In them now could be traced the high resolve, the devoted courage, which had won him so high a name amongst his contemporaries, and even the armour in which he was clothed was found to correspond accurately with the description in the manuscript. Now, at length, she said, my sister will be convinced of the propriety of the course I have adopted, and, surely, she will now no longer listen to the suggestions of the old man, but will restore her own picture also to the same condition that I have brought mine to. With these thoughts in her mind, she at once sent for her sister, and showed her the picture as restored. She pointed to the description in the manuscript, as proving conclusively that this was indeed the picture as it proceeded out of the artist's hands. She was however doomed to great disappointment. The elder sister had become, gradually, still more under the influence of the old butler, and was now filled with indignation that her sister should have dared to proceed without her consent, and, assisted by the old butler, went to such extremities against her, that the latter, to save her life, fled from the mansion-house, taking with her the picture she had so carefully restored, and which, of course, she hung up in the house she now occupies.

Then commenced the litigation to which we have referred. As the two sisters were co-heiresses, and, therefore, each entitled in common to the whole property of their ancestors, the elder sister instituted proceedings against the younger, to compel her to bring back the picture, in order that it may be restored to its former state of dust and obscurity, and may again be entrusted to the care of the old butler. The following are the leading arguments urged on behalf of the elder sister by her advocates:—They say, that the picture, which descended to the two sisters as co-heiresses, was the picture in its condition before the younger sister began her operations; that the interest of the younger was an interest in it such as it was at that time; that the dust which had accumulated on, and adhered to it, had, by the lapse of time, been incorporated in, and become part of the picture. They even went still further, and insisted that the care and superintendence of the old butler had also attached to the picture when it descended to the sisters, and that his superintendence had, in fact, become a constituent part of its identity. When urged by the evidence of the manuscript (which they were obliged to admit was contemporaneous with the painting of the pictures), and by the fact that neither the will of the ancestor nor the manuscript said anything of the pictures having been entrusted specially to the care of the old butler or of his predecessors in that office, they replied that these things were developments arising necessarily out of its very nature as a picture, and which, therefore, when once attached to it became inseparable from it. And they prayed that the younger sister might bring back the picture to be again entrusted to the care of the old butler, who would carefully restore all the dust which had been so improperly removed.

To these arguments the counsel for the younger sister replied, that as the sisters were co-heiresses, the younger sister had equal rights with the elder over the pictures, and as this particular picture had been alloted as her share, she had clearly a right to deal with it as she pleased—that even if the court were of opinion that she had not such an exclusive power over the picture, still, before granting any such order as was prayed, it must be determined whether the picture, in its present state of cleanliness and restoration, be the original picture or not. For as the other side had avowed their intention of restoring the dust, she, as equally interested with her sister, had clearly a right to have the identity of the picture ascertained; and, as the manuscript showed clearly, that, in its present state, it corresponded with the description of it as it was when originally painted, it would be manifestly unjust to compel a restoration of it to that state which rendered it impossible to discover its identity with the description in the manuscript. They also argued, that all the arguments urged on behalf of the elder sister were equally strong in favour of the right of the younger to demand the production of the picture, still in the possession of the elder, in order to have the same cleaning process applied to it, as had already proved so successful in the case of the other picture. And they concluded by praying that this should be done.

Such were the principal arguments urged by the opposite counsel in this protracted litigation; and as each succeeding discussion only leads to the repetition of the same arguments, it is hardly possible to expect that the court will be able to arrive at a speedy conclusion of a cause so protracted in its course. We, therefore, submit the facts and the arguments of counsel to the consideration of our readers, and as they have the power of obtaining access to the manuscript, and of comparing its description with the pictures themselves, we trust that they will be able to arrive at a decision without waiting for the adjudication of the court.

ON THE WORSHIP OF RELIQUES.

PILGRIMAGES to the shrines in which the bones and other reliques of saints are said to be preserved, and processions and other ceremonies in which they are carried about for the edification of the faithful in the Church of Rome, are asserted by that Church to be of great efficacy in promoting devotion, and held by Protestants generally to be a groundless and dangerous superstition.

The Church of Rome understands by reliques not only the bodies or parts of the bodies of the saints, but any of those things which belonged to them, such as St. Francis's girdle and the like, which are considered blessed, as having touched their sanctified bodies, and worthy of religious veneration and honour. The Council of Trent, not only defends the Church's former practices towards reliques and confirms the worship of them, but curses those who shall dare to say that such worship is unlawful. The decree, so far as it relates to this subject, is as follows:—

"The Holy Synod enjoining on all bishops and others sustaining the office and charge of teaching, that they especially instruct the faithful diligently touching . . . . . the honour paid to reliques. . . . . Also, that the holy bodies of holy martyrs, and of others now living with Christ, are to be venerated by the faithful; through which bodies many benefits are bestowed by God on man; so that they who affirm that veneration and honour are not due to the reliques of saints; or that those and other sacred monuments are uselessly honoured by the faithful; and that the places dedicated to the memories of the saints are vainly visited for the purpose of obtaining their wish, are wholly to be condemned, as the Church has already long since condemned, and doth now also condemn them." (Sess. 25, 3 Dec., 1563.)

What we propose at present to enquire is whether this worship of reliques has any foundation in Holy Scripture, which our readers will observe is always the first question in our consideration, though we do not avoid referring afterwards to the testimony of the early Fathers, as the best witnesses of what was handed down by tradition from the time of our Lord and his Apostles.

Cardinal Bellarmine relies upon several texts of Scripture in favour of such worship.* We shall examine them one by one.

The first is Exodus xiii. 19.—"And Moses took the bones of Joseph with him, for he had strictly sworn the Children of Israel, saying, God will surely visit you: and ye shall carry up my bones away hence with you." If this text had proceeded to tell us that Joseph's bones were carried with them, in order to the Children of Israel receiving benefits or blessings from them, or making them the objects of religious honour, or with a view to having recourse to them for obtaining aid in cases of difficulty or distress, we would, of course, admit that it would afford a striking support of the present practice of the Church of Rome, but not one of these things is intimated or hinted at in the text, which contains merely a simple narrative of a matter of fact—viz., that when the Children of Israel left the land of Egypt, to seek the Land of Promise, according to God's command, Moses obeyed the express injunction of Joseph, that his bones should be removed also. What the object of Joseph was in this matter is not stated by the sacred historian; but we think it quite obvious there is no similarity at all between a man's body, at his own request, being carried into another country to be buried with his kindred, in the country his brethren should possess, and the present practice of the Church of Rome of separating the remains of their saints, and carrying one part of a saint's body to this church and another part to another church †—putting them up in glass-cases and shrines—making solemn processions with them on occasions of solemnities, and never burying them at all. Joseph's bones were put together into a coffin, in Egypt, and, on the departure of the Israelites thence, were carried to the Land of Canaan, to be buried there with his father, in accordance with a solemn oath made to him, at his own desire, while alive; and that is all that can be drawn from this passage of Exodus, which affords no countenance to the practices it is cited to defend.

The next passage is from Deuteronomy xxxiv. 6, where it is said of God that "he buried him (Moses) in a valley in the land of Moab, over against Beth-peor; but no man knoweth of his sepulchre unto this day."

How Cardinal Bellarmine or any man of common reason could consider this text favourable to religious worship of reliques, we are at a loss to conceive; for, so far as any inference can be drawn from it, it appears clearly against it; and the common interpretation of the passage, even among the Jewish doctors, as well as others, is the very natural one, that God purposely hid the body of Moses, so that "no man knoweth of his sepulchre to this day," lest the people of Israel should, out of their great love and veneration to their great deliverer from Egyptian bondage, have been led away, at some time or other, to worship his remains with superstitious veneration. So palpable indeed is this, that Bellarmine himself, in chap. iv., p. 308, admits, that it is probable (as stated by St. Chrysostom in Hom. 5, in Matthew) that the sepulchre of Moses was concealed, lest he should be worshipped by the Jews as God, and refers to the case of the brazen serpent which Hezekiah afterwards destroyed, because the people sacrificed or burned incense to it.—2 Kings ch. 18, as a proof that the danger was a real one, though while Moses was living, there was no fear of the people either worshipping him or the serpent, he being always at hand daily to tell them that there was but one true God, and that he (Moses) was only his servant, and the brazen serpent, by looking on which they were cured, was not that God, but a symbol only.

Bellarmine's next Scripture proof is taken from 2 Kings xiii. 21, which contains no account (and the only one in the whole Bible) of an extraordinary miracle done by the Almighty in honour of the bones of a prophet—the prophet Elisha. "And it came to pass as they were burying a man, that, behold they spied a band of men, and they cast the man into the sepulchre of Elisha; and when the man was cast down, and touched the bones of Elisha, he revived and stood upon his feet." Of course we neither doubt the miracle, nor that God honoured the bones of his prophet Elisha by it, but we neither meet with one word of any honour done or commanded to Elisha's bones in consequence of this miracle, nor do we find that they were taken up and enshrined by the Israelites, nor any processions made to them in order to receive any benefits from them, notwithstanding so great a miracle as that of restoring a dead man to life, which surely could not have failed to be recorded, if any such things had taken place.

The next text cited is 2 Kings xxiii., 16, 17, 18, where Josiah is described as breaking up the sepulchres, and burning the bones of false prophets upon an idolatrous altar, yet commanding the bones of the true prophet not to be moved, but preserved entire, when the men of the city told him it was the sepulchre of the "man of God which came from Judah, and proclaimed these things that thou hast done against the altar of Bethel." And he said, "let him alone, let no man move his bones." What does this prove but that the good king Josiah so respected the remains of the prophet, that he would not let him be disturbed, but left quietly in his grave: which seems to be a curious passage to be adduced by them, who, instead of letting the bodies of good men rest in peace in their graves, have, in honour of them, been in the habit of digging them up, and then, instead of burying them together again to rest, turn them to pecuniary profit, placing an arm here, and a leg there, and in another place a piece of the skull, and carrying them in procession on occasions from one place to another, pretending that they have some signal virtue in them to confer benefits or arrest misfortunes, which, if King Josiah had thought, he would probably have acted similarly, Instead of merely ordering that the prophet's bones should be left undisturbed; which command was obeyed, for the same historian adds—"So they let his bones alone with the bones of the prophet that came out of Samaria."

The only remaining text cited by Bellarmine from the old Testament is Isaiah xi. 10. Speaking of the Messiah Isaiah says, "In that day there shall be a root of Jesse, which shall stand for an ensign of the people, to it shall the Gentiles seek, and his rest shall be glorious." Bellarmine here translates the word (rest) מנוחה "sepulchre," as does the Douay version, and supposing that sepulchre were the correct translation, which we think it clearly is not,* it never could mean that the sepulchre of stone in which Christ lay should be worshipped, but merely by a figurative expression was obviously meant to convey that Christ's victory over the grave would be glorious, and the cause of salvation and deliverance from the power of death and the grave to the Gentiles who should believe in Him.

That none of these texts from the Old Testament prove that the worshipping of reliques is proper or justifiable we think the candid reader will allow. Whether the learned Cardinal is more successful in the authorities he has cited from the New Testament we hope to be able to consider in our next number.

THE TALK OF THE ROAD.—No. XIII.

"Well, Jem, did you get the book about the Scapular?"

"Deed then I did, Pat, and here it is," said Jem, taking the book out of his pocket, as they met on the road.

"Well, and is it like the Bible at all?" said Pat.

"Why then," said Jem, "if there's two books in the world that isn't like each other one bit, it's this book and the Bible; and more foreby, if this book is true, I don't see what call there is for the Bible at all; for sure enough, it's a deal easier to be saved by this book and the Blessed Virgin, than it is to be saved by Jesus Christ and the Bible—that is, barring it isn't all a lie about the Scapular. But I'm thinking, if the Bible is true, it will go hard with poor Judy and them that trusts in this book."

"Well, what is it all about?" said Pat.

"Why, first and foremost," said Jem, "it tells us how the order of Carmelites was founded by Elijah the prophet on Mount Carmel; and it tells us how he was upon the mountain nine hundred years and more before our Saviour was born, and he seen a little cloud as big as his hand coming up out of the sea, and that was the Blessed Virgin herself! no less, and so then he set up the Carmelites in honour of her, and it tells the place in the Bible where to find it, (3rd Book of Kings, ch. xviii., v. 42, &c., Douay Bible; 1st Book, authorized version), and sure enough, when I went to look for it, Elijah was there, and saw the little cloud, but not one word good or bad about the Blessed Virgin, nor the order of Carmelites neither."

"Well, well," said Pat, "was these Carmelites nine hundred years before our Saviour was born, and were they Christians then?"

"Why the book makes it out they're that old," said Jem; "and that they took up with the Blessed Virgin as soon as she was born, and that she was mighty fond of them, and gave them the Scapular herself. But 'deed she was in no hurry to give it to them, for she didn't give it to them for more nor twelve hundred years after that again!"

"And how could that be at all, at all," said Pat; "sure she must have been dead before that, anyway."

"Why here's the story," said Jem (page 31). "There was one Simon Stock, that lived in England, and a quare way he got his name, for he ran away into the woods when he was twelve years old, and lived in a hollow tree for twenty years, and he lived on the roots he scraped up, only when a dog brought him bread in his mouth on the festival days; and the Blessed Virgin would be coming to him often; and it so fell out that was the time that the Carmelites was turned out of Mount Carmel. So the Blessed Virgin told one day they were coming that way and that he'd be a Carmelite; and so when they come, he joined them, and was the greatest man that ever they had."

"Well, and did she give him the Scapular then," said Pat.

"Not that time," said Jem; "but when he was near dying, and thinking what would the Carmelites do without him, he went to the Blessed Virgin and told her all about it, and how all the Popes had confirmed the order, and all they had done for it. And so one day she come to him, just dressed the way she would be in heaven, and thousands of angels with her, and the Scapular ready in her hand; and she says to him, see, here's the very words in the book, (p. 31), 'Receive, most beloved son (says she) the Scapular of thy order, a sign of my confraternity, a privilege both to them and to all Carmelites, in which he that dieth shall not suffer eternal fire; behold the sign of salvation, a safeguard in danger, the covenant of peace and everlasting alliance.' And then she just gives it into his hand, and was gone in a minute; and see, here's the very day, and it marked the 16th of July, 1251."

"Well, I wonder did all that happen," says Pat.

"Well, I'm thinking," said Jem, "if the Blessed Virgin was so fond of the Carmelites for 1250 years before, and if the scapular was so good for them, would she never give it to them before? Why wouldn't she give it to them when she was visiting them so often on Mount Carmel, at the time when our Blessed Saviour was born? Why would she leave them without it so long, and they so fond of her, and she so fond of them?"

"There's reason in that any way," said Pat; "and howsomever it isn't the ould religion. Why sure the scapular isn't more nor six hundred years old yet, even by the book's story; and don't the Catholics cry out on the Protestants, because everything in their religion isn't as old as the apostles?"

"Well," says Jem, "I think there's a better way still to see if the story is true."

"And how's that?" said Pat.

"Why," said Jem, "just to see how we are to be saved by the scapular, and how that fits with our being saved by Jesus Christ the way the Bible tells us; for if the two doesn't fit, it's reason that only one of them can be true."

"Well, I'll stand to that," said Pat, "and how does the book say the scapular saves us?"

"Why, first of all," said Jem, "the book says it is a grand thing for people to be joined in societies, because then every one in the society gets a share in all the prayers, and sacrifices, fastings, alms, and mortifications, and of all the good works of all the rest." (Preface, p. 1.)

And then Pat scratched his head for a minute, and said he, "and whose the gainer by that I wonder or whose the loser? why there won't be more good works among them after all; and how will they divide? If every man gets his own (and that's the fairest) I don't see the gain at all. And if they get share and share alike, why them that does the most is the losers; and them that does nothing is the gainers. Sure enough there was short commons here in the famine; but if every one, big and little in the parish, had brought all they had together to eat it at worst, sure it wouldn't go farther? And if all the boys in the parish was working at task work, and all in under one, to divide all the earnings among them, I'm thinking maybe its less work would be done, for all the lazy fellows would be saving themselves, to get their share of the work and they doing nothing. So I don't see the good of clubbing all together no ways."

"Well that's likeenough, Pat," said Jem, "I don't see no great good in it so far; but, then, there's more in it still: sure the book says that Pope Clement VII. has given the

* Card. Bellarmine, de Reliq. Sanct. l. 2. c. 3. tom. ii. p. 304, Colon Agripp 1618.

† Bellarmine himself well knew this, for being pressed with the difficulty that many of the pretended reliques of saints were and must be suppositious, because so many reliques of the same kind are found, that either the same saint must have had many bodies, or many of the reliques must be false (p. 308) he replies, that parts of the same bodies were in various places, but the whole was owned from the part—as St. Basil writes in his oration on the Forty Martyrs, who were then spoken of as whole (toti) in various cities, because each city had a part of them; and as Theodoret also, in his Eighth Book de Martyribus, says, "the bodies of martyrs were rarely found whole in any one monument, but are divided, and distributed in various places." (p. 309.)

* The Hebrew word, which Bellarmine, following the vulgate, translates "sepulchre" is מנוחה. This word occurs 21 times in the Old Testament. In 10 of these passages it is translated by the vulgate "requies," or rest; and in no one other passage, except this one of Isaiah xi. 10, do they render it "sepulchre." Such a translation, indeed, would make sheer nonsense of some of the texts to which the word occurs. Take, for example, Psalm cxxxii (cxxxi. Douay) in the 8th verse, "Arise, O Lord, into thy 'sepulchre,' thou and the ark which thou hast sanctified;" or, again, the 14th verse of the same Psalm, "This is my sepulchre for ever and ever; here will I dwell, for I have chosen it." We conclude, therefore, that the proper translation of Isaiah xi. 10 is that of the authorized version—"His rest shall be glorious."

Scapularians a share of all the pious actions which are done throughout the whole church of God (page 46), and wouldn't that be making more for the Scapularians anyway?'

"And mercy on us," says Pat, "what right has the Pope to take their good works off them that does them, to give them all to the Scapularians? Why, if I'd stint the childer to give the bit to a poor creature on the road, for the love of God, what right has the Pope to take that off me to give it to them that never done it? Sure I'm not the fool to think the Pope can do that, or that God Almighty will let him handle us that sort."

"Nor I, neither, Pat," said Jem, "for doesn't the Bible say that every man 'must appear before the judgment seat of Christ; that every man may receive the things done in his body, according to that HE hath done, whether it be good or bad' (2 Cor. v. 5-10); and sure how can the Pope go again that?"

"Well now," said Pat, "I mind a story I was reading, in St. Matthew's Gospel, a Sunday, and there was ten virgins that was going out to meet the Bridegroom (and that was the Lord himself), and they had to fetch lamps with them, for belike it was night, and there was five of them had no oil for their lamps, and, the creatures, they just wanted to have all in common, but the wise ones wouldn't agree to that at all, for they said they hadn't enough to be doing that with; so them that had no oil didn't get in at all, and Jesus Christ said that's just the way it would be when he'd be coming in glory; so it's plain that what's borrowed won't stand then, and isn't that enough for that?"

"Well I think it is, Pat," said Jem, "and so we'll go on a bit, for there's more in it yet. Sure here's a chapter to say that them that dies in the scapular will never suffer hell fire; and the quare proof the book gives of it, too, for see what it says here (p 48)—'In the city of Quarena, during the procession of the holy scapular, which is made on the third Sunday of every month, the devils were heard to execrate the holy scapular with many howlings and outcries, lamenting themselves that by means of this sacred habit of the Blessed Virgin, the gates of hell were shut to many persons."

"And does it mean that them that dies with the scapular on will never go to hell, if they were ever so bad?" said Pat.

"Well them's the words that the Book says the Blessed Virgin spoke to Simon Stock, "in which he that dieth shall not suffer eternal fire," p. 34, said Jem; but still the book won't stand to it all out; for it says, "it only means that if any one that dies with the Scapular on does go to hell, it will be his own fault, because God did enough for him." (p. 48 and 49.)

"Well, and wasn't that true for 1250 years before there was a Scapular at all," said Pat, "and isn't it true now to them that never saw a Scapular? but I doubt poor Judy doesn't take it that way."

"Well," said Jem, "here's a whole chapter about what Judy said, 'that the Blessed Virgin would go down to Purgatory to take out the Scapularians the very Saturday after they die. And, well, it turns out that that isn't in what the Blessed Virgin said to Simon Stock at all; but it was the Popes done that; and here the book gives us a list of five Popes no less, that all laid it on the Blessed Virgin to do that same, (p. 50), and what do you think of that Pat?"

"Why then, Jem," said Pat, "I'd think it a great pity that ever they'd die at all, barring of a Friday night."

"Well, Pat," said Jem, "here's more; here's a whole chapter of all the indulgences that ever the Popes gave to the Carmelites, for the foolishest things that ever you read. Sure here's an indulgence of three years to all Christians, let alone Carmelites, for every time they call the Carmelites 'the order of the Blessed Virgin Mary;' now isn't that easy got?"

"Well, salvation's chesp by the Scapular anyway," said Pat.

"I'm thinking it's not, Pat," said Jem, "for if the Bible's true, the Scapular will, may be, cost their souls to them that trusts in it."

"And is there any more in it?" said Pat.

"Deed is there," said Jem, "sure here's a whole chapter, to show that the Scapular is good against 'devils, and fire, and water, and wild beasts, and sickness, and witchcrafts, and danger in child-bed, and pistol shots and many other ill accidents (p. 71); and here's stories for them all: first and foremost, here's a story of a man that was shot with a pistol and two bullets in it, and the minute he was shot he just felt the two bullets fall down into his breeches; and when he got home, he found they just hit on the Scapular."

"Stop a bit, Jem," said Pat, "wouldn't that be the fine thing for Mr. Collins, the agent, that's shot at so often; I'm thinking if that was true, he'd be a Scapularian himself."

"That would be the thing for the agents, Pat," said Jem, "but here's more stories for you; here's a poor fellow that was kept alive by the Scapular for four hours after the whole heart was shot out of him by a cannon ball; and sure it was the pity that he died at all; and here's a man got out of the sea by it, and here's a great fire put out by it."

"Well, that won't do anyway," said Pat, "didn't I know Peter Brady that took his family off to America, and weren't they all Scapularians, and didn't the ship take fire before they got out of Liverpool, and wasn't there both fire and water there to try the Scapular on, and weren't they all drowned."

"I mind that well, too, Pat," said Jem, "and, sure enough, it did them little good, the creatures."

"But what have the Scapularians to do for all this?" said Pat.

"Why, just not one haporth, but only to wear the Scapular on their backs, for it won't do no good at all if it's wore on the breast; (p. 50), sure here it is, 'it sufficeth that the Scapular be received lawfully, and worn devoutly, without any other obligation' (p. 60); only if they want to get out of Purgatory on the first Saturday, they must fast on Wednesdays, or else say the office of the Blessed Virgin, which they please; but they must do neither the one nor the other to be kept out of hell."

"Well, isn't it the poor thing that creatures like Judy should be striving to get salvation by the Scapular, and not knowing nor thinking about the blood of Jesus Christ," said Pat; "and isn't it the poor thing that the clergy has never one word to say agin' books like that, and if a Bible turns up afore them, they're ready to hunt it like a mad dog; surely there's something wanting to set it right."

"And with all, Pat," said Jem, "there's something in the Scapular itself that won't fit father John."

"And what's that, Jem?" said Pat.

"Here it is, Pat," said Jem, "'those that visit our churches (that's the Carmelite churches), and pray for the ordinary necessities, may free a soul out of Purgatory every Wednesday throughout the whole year,' and where's the call for buying masses if that's true?"

"Well," said Pat, "if the people once come to take to that plan, isn't it father John that will hunt the Scapular out of the parish."

"It might be better nor hunting the readers," said Jem. So Pat and Jem parted for that night.

The Catholic Layman.

DUBLIN, JUNE, 1853.

WE have been so much occupied hitherto in our efforts to induce our fellow-countrymen to discuss, in a more calm and amicable spirit, the differences existing between them in religious matters, that, perhaps, we may have appeared to some of our readers as applying ourselves too much to the mere intellect, and too little to the heart, and to be more anxious to disprove error, than directly to advocate truth. We can assure our readers, however, that the notion of the affections being out of place in religion is not one that we recognize as a sound one. We are fully persuaded that those who would exclude from the service of religion so important a part of the composition of man as his feelings and affections, have wholly mistaken the character of Christianity, undervalue her strength, and are ignorant of her true power. It is, we strongly feel, the peculiar glory and the special office of Christianity to bring all the faculties of our nature into their just subordination and dependance, and restore the whole man, complete in all his functions and faculties, of heart as well as understanding, to the service and glory of God.

It was, therefore, with a feeling rather of pleasure than surprise, that we received a letter, which our readers will find in another column, signed DERMOT M'MANUS, in which he accuses us of prudently keeping clear of the arguments derivable from the feelings, or, as he calls them, the internal convictions of Roman Catholics that their religion is true. The importance of the subject may justify us in calling especial attention to this letter as well as to what we shall say in reply to it, though, we confess, we are surprised that a gentleman so candid and fair-minded, as we take Mr. M'MANUS to be, should have hazarded a representation of our religious opinions so utterly erroneous, so wholly unlike the real state of the case as that contained in his letter. We are still more surprised at his strange assumption, that we ourselves must allow that the character of the system which we have always supported is one unable to make any solid impression on the heart and affections. So far from allowing this, we earnestly maintain that those grand truths of the Gospel of the grace of God, which we seek and have always sought, to preserve in their simplicity and integrity, free from all human additions and corruptions, are exactly those most calculated in their own nature, and most effectual, as proved by experience, to stir up the heart of the believer to its inmost depths, and influence, and purify while they influence, his noblest affections and highest energies.

Without anticipating the argument of our correspondent, we would avail ourselves of this opportunity of stating distinctly the class of truths we refer to. They are happily those on which all pious and real Christians, of whatever creed, may, we hope, agree, and which centre on the person of God our Saviour. The Divinity of our Lord Jesus Christ—his true humanity—his love for men prompting him to lay down his life for their sakes—the offering of his atoning blood reconciling sinners to God—the free pardon offered to all who have faith in that precious blood, and are obedient to the truth—the sanctifying and consoling influences of God the Spirit—together with the sacramental and other means of grace which the Christian has provided for him in what we hold to be the church of Christ, and to the right and faithful use of which He has promised his blessing—these are some of the glorious truths of God which we believe and cling to—which the Apostles believed—which the ancient Fathers believed—which the noble army of martyrs believed—which were not only assented to by their understanding, but which were received into their heart, and which were found mighty, as principles of action, in moulding them to habits of piety and virtue. Must these truths have lost their power and become inoperative, when believed by us, because we are unable to hold, along with these doctrines, others which we are persuaded we can prove to be of human invention? Can we have no love to our adorable Saviour and Redeemer, our merciful High Priest and Mediator, because we refuse to share his work and merits with any creature, however exalted, or to lavish on such a created being that tribute of devout affection which we believe to be due to God alone? We think our readers will see that our correspondent has done us an injustice in this matter—that there is nothing in the doctrines which we hold (and the greater part of which, he it observed, we hold in common with Roman Catholics themselves), which can justify the charge of ours being a cold, lifeless creed. It is possible that many Roman Catholics do not know that we have in the Church of England a ritual also, sublime in its devout simplicity, and breathing the very spirit, and often the very language, of primitive piety? Were they also to become intimately acquainted with the sacred treasure of the written Word of God, the study of which we have so earnestly and repeatedly advocated, they would find it to be impossible that any true Protestant, who loves the Bible, could be satisfied with a religious system which did not commend itself to his heart. We deem it impossible to look into any part of the sacred volume without meeting abundant proofs that it is the religion of the affections which God particularly requires. "My son, give me thine heart." "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart." Such are the direct and comprehensive claims made on us in the Holy Scriptures; love, zeal, gratitude, joy, hope, trust, are each of them specified, not as weaknesses to be tolerated, but as bounden duties enjoined on us, and commended to us as our acceptable worship. The lively exercise of the feelings towards their legitimate object is always spoken of in the Holy Scripture with praise, while a cold, unfeeling heart is represented as highly criminal; and lukewarmness is spoken of as the object of God's disgust and aversion; zeal and love, of his favour and delight; and the taking away the heart of stone, and the implanting of a warmer and more tender nature in its stead, are specially promised as the effects of his returning favour, and the work of his renewing grace.

If we look to the most eminent of the Scripture characters we shall find them warm, zealous, and affectionate. When engaged in their favourite work of celebrating the goodness of their Supreme Benefactor, their souls appear to burn within them, and their hearts kindle into rapture; the forms of language are inadequate to the expression of their transports, and they call on all nature to swell the chorus, and to unite with them in hallelujahs of gratitude, and joy, and praise. And will it be believed that the system whose chief feature it is to encourage and urge every human being, prayerfully and constantly, to study and imbibe the spirit of this glorious volume, can set at nought or undervalue the religion of the heart. It is just because the study of God's Holy Word is, in our deliberate judgment, the best fitted instrumentality to warm, and purify, and influence man's heart, that we are so earnest for its universal use, and not because it favours one set of doctrinal tenets more than another. We regret that we cannot dwell longer on these topics at present, but we hope to return to them again, for the present contenting ourselves with assuring our correspondent, that hundreds of thousands of Protestants have found the evangelical doctrines of the Bible to confer comfort in sickness and sorrow, strength in temptation, joy and peace in believing, growth in grace, support in death, and hope for eternity.

We need scarcely state, though we sent a copy of our last number to the Rev. Mr. Kelsh, challenging him to prove any of his charges against us, that gentleman has not ventured to reply to it, well knowing that it was out of his power to point out one sentence in our paper from its commencement to justify any of the expressions he has ventured to use in his published letter respecting us. We only hope those opposed to the circulation of the Catholic Layman, feeling that they are unable to cope with it in a manly manner by argument, will continue to use the same abusive language towards us, which we assure them we are able to bear in the calmest spirit, without the slightest exertion of either philosophy or Christian resignation. We should not have noticed such a letter at all, but that we believe that it is a fair sample of the language of those who would prevent the people from hearing both sides, throughout the country. We rejoice to know that there are many of those who differ from us, yet who do wish to hear both sides, and it is for them we write.

Correspondence.

ON ORIGEN AND PURGATORY.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

Sir—I freely grant that the heretical opinions of Origen, founded on a fallacious principle, by which he maintains, that, after a fixed revolution of ages, the offences of Satan, and of his damned associates, will be purged away, and that they will then be restored to the friendship of God, were condemned by the fifth general council, under Pope Vigilius; but that Origen's commentaries on the Scriptures, and his books against Celsus, shared in this condemnation, I deny. The passages, which you adduce from Epiphanius and Augustine, afford prima facie evidence, that they are directed against these heretical principles solely, and not against the Catholic doctrine of Purgatory. The necessity of Purgatory to those who die free from all stains of sin, forms no part of Catholic doctrine; the Church offers prayers and sacrifices for those only who die repentant in the Catholic and Christian communion, not for those "who," to use the words of St. Augustine, "have finished this life in scandalous crimes, and sacrileges, and impieties, the greatest possible." Neither can you show that a belief in the purifying quality of hell's fire can have any place in Roman Catholic doctrine. Epiphanius does not, in the slightest degree, impugn the doctrine of Purgatory, when he says, that "Origen dares to teach that the devil will again be what he once was, and will return to the same dignity;" on the contrary (in Hær. 75, sec. 3, Tom. 1, page 908) he says—"that a part of the heresy of Arius consisted in his maintaining that the prayers, alms, &c., of the living afforded no relief to the dead." And it is not a little remarkable, that the objection started by this heretic against prayers for the dead in his time, is very nearly related to, if not the same with that urged against it by the anti-purgatorians of the present day:—"No one, then," says he, "will live piously here, nor do any good action; but he will engage some friends, either by entreaties or by bestowing large sums of money on them, who may pray for him after death, that his wicked deeds might not be punished in the next world." To the orthodoxy of the quotation from Origen, you next object the opinion of some learned Roman Catholics; but we are here discussing the doctrine of the Catholic Church, not the doctrine of individual opinion.

In Hom. 6, Exod. Tom. ii., page 148, Origen is peculiarly explicit, with regard to the doctrine of Purgatory, where he also, by a distinctive clause, points out the eternal condemnation of the wicked, typified by the overthrow of the Egyptians in the Red Sea—"But," says he, "when we arrive at that place, he that shall bring many good works, and little that is evil, this evil the fire shall purify as it does lead, and the whole shall become pure gold. He that takes with him more of lead suffers the more, that he may be refined, and what little of gold there is after the purification remains. But should the whole mass be lead, that man must experience what is written—"The sea covered them; they sank as lead in the mighty waters"—Exod. xv. 10.

St. Cyprian, in Epist. 52, page 72, says—"It is one thing in punishment of sin to be purified by long suffering and purged by long fire, and another to have expiated all sins by previous suffering," and thus bears testimony to the belief of a future purgation of souls, and the consequent doctrine of Purgatory. The passage quoted by you, in page 82, Vol. I. Catholic Layman, from Cyprian's Ep. to Demetrius, affords no contradiction to this doctrine—namely, "once gone hence, there is no more place for repentance; no satisfaction can be accomplished; it is here life is either lost or saved." St. Augustine teaches the same doctrine in many parts of his writings. In sermon 172, De Verbis Apost., sect. 2;—Enchiridion, cap. 109, 110; Lib. 21, De Civit Dei. cap. 13, 24, &c., he proves the practice of the Universal Church, in offering up prayers and sacrifices for the dead, affirming it to be a custom derived from the Fathers, and that they are offered for those who have not lived so well as not to need such propitiations, nor so bad as to be incapable of such reliefs after death; and yet he tells us "no new merits are acquired by the dead;" "but," says he, "these reliefs are afforded them on account of their former good actions." And he says again, "all that merit is provided in this life, by which each person, who may be in need of prayers after death, can be relieved." These passages show that "it is here life is either lost or saved," and fully explain the words of St. Cyprian, and establish the orthodoxy of the extract from Origen; so that my three witnesses are not only united most cordially in opinion, but I have, moreover, the accession of a fourth, whose testimony is invincible.

I shall further add, although Augustine affirms that all that merit is provided in this life, and that no new merits are acquired by the dead; yet, as an additional proof of the doctrine of Purgatory, he says—"Cleanse me so in this life, make me such, that I may not stand in need of that purifying fire, designed for those who shall be saved, yet so as by fire." Enarr in Psalm xxxvii. Tom. 4, page 295.

In page 50, Vol. I. Catholic Layman, after many vague opinions concerning the origin and object of these prayers, you allege that "they appear to have amounted, at most, to prayers that God would forgive them their sins, accompanied by the hope that they might impart some consolation and comfort to them," and with this admission you connect the opinion of Pope Gregory the Great, that "this is to be believed possible only so far as little sins." Hence, we may justly conclude, that the primitive Christians believed that some sins were forgiven in the world to come, which could not be in heaven (Rev. xxi. 27), neither in hell, and, therefore, in a third place. The Purgatory of Roman Catholics means a middle state of souls, who have neither lived so innocently as to go straight to heaven, nor so ill as to be condemned to hell—that is, of those who have been guilty of "little sins," and they hold, as an article of faith, that these souls are helped by the prayers of the faithful, and by the sacrifice of the altar: but the nature of the purifying fire and the term of its duration, form no points of doctrine. This doctrine, I find, has been taught by the Roman Church, ab antiquo, attested by the evidence of the most learned Fathers of the Primitive Church, and confessed even by her enemies, whilst all objections to it are confined to mere conjecture, speculation, theories, negative arguments, and the opinions of modern reformers or disguised heretics. In the article which you have promised on this head, I expect you will deal in clear, positive, and direct proofs; and if you have any one stronger and more pointed than another, or than any of those heretofore used, by which you may be able to convince the Church of the folly and impiety of this doctrine, let it now be brought forth.

With many apologies for having exceeded so far, in these observations, that brevity which is so desirable to you and to me.

I remain, Sir, yours truly, &c., &c.

Edmond Power.

May 30th, 1853.

It will be remembered that the question we are discussing is, "What testimony in support of the dogma of Purgatory can be adduced from any orthodox writer of the first three centuries?" Mr. Power makes a hard battle not to give up passages which he has cited from Origen, a condemned heretic, and which are owned, by learned Roman Catholic commentators on the places he quotes, to embody the very heresy in question. And we cannot blame him, for if he parts with Origen, he will have very little left in the first three centuries to fall back upon. It is remarkable that men are often proud if they can trace their ancestry in some remote degree to a person whom they would be ashamed to have for a father. We have heard of a gentleman who is very proud of being able to trace his descent to a man who attempted to steal the crown jewels in the reign of Charles the Second. And though it is not considered very creditable to have one's own father hanged, yet many would be rather proud than otherwise if they could prove distinctly that one of their ancestors was hanged in the reign of Henry VIII. For as there are not many who can name their great-great-great-great-great grandfather, the few who can do so cannot afford to be too particular as to what kind of character this gentleman bore. It is on the same principle that though, had Mr. Power lived within a couple of hundred years after Origen, he would have been much ashamed of seeming to adopt his views on the state of the soul after death, yet at this distance of time he thinks it better to be able to trace his doctrines to a heretic in the second century, than to have no trace of them there at all. The following, then, is a summary of the argument which has taken place between us and Mr. Power on the subject of Origen.

Catholic Layman. Did the Church of the first three centuries believe in Purgatory?

Mr. Power. Yes; for Origen in the passages here produced, speaks of certain temporary tortures to be endured by sinners after death.

C. L. But Origen's doctrine on this subject was not the doctrine of the Church; for he believed that all future punishments were temporary; and his doctrines on this subject were condemned by (amongst others) Epiphanius and Augustine.

Mr. P. The passages you cite from Epiphanius and Augustine do not disprove Purgatory; they only prove that it is heretical to believe that those who die in mortal sins, shall be restored to happiness after certain temporary torments; but it does not follow that they who die repentant in the Catholic communion may not have certain temporary torments to endure.

C. L. We did not cite these passages as an argument against Purgatory, but as an argument against Origen. They show that on the subject of future punishment the views of Origen differed widely from those of the Church. All your citations from Origen therefore go for nothing, and until you have proved from orthodox writers of the first three centuries the existence of those temporary torments after death, our question as to the sentiments of the primitive church on this subject remains unanswered.

Mr. P. But Origen was orthodox, in believing that the righteous shall endure certain temporary torments hereafter; although I own he was heretical in maintaining that the wicked, and that the devil himself, should have the benefit of the same Purgatory.

C. L. You are pleased to say so, but this is precisely what we want to have proved. Origen himself provides a Purgatory, as well for those who died in mortal sin as those who did not: and certainly it would seem that if purgatorial fires could cleanse away small sins, the same fires, a little hotter and a little longer endured, might cleanse away large sins. At any rate, as we agree as to part of Origen's views being heretical, it is your business to prove, by citations from the fathers of the first three centuries, that the remaining part of his views is orthodox.

Mr. P.—I have already given you citations which show that Purgatory was the doctrine of the Church in the time of Epiphanius and Augustine.

C. L.—But Epiphanius belonged to the fourth century, and Augustine to the beginning of the fifth; over two hundred years after Origen. We shall discuss the views of these writers presently; but even if you could prove that they believed in Purgatory, it would not follow that this was the faith of the Church two hundred years before—nay, rather, if in the first three centuries it is only in heretical writers that you find a doctrine resembling that of Purgatory, is not the presumption that the doctrine of Purgatory was not a tradition of the primitive Church, but only a revival of the heresy of Origen (which he again had borrowed from the heathen Platonists) stripped of some of the most offensive of its extravagancies. In short Mr. Newman and other learned Roman Catholics confess, that the doctrine of Purgatory was not, in its present form, distinctly taught by the Church in the first three centuries, but that it was a development of a subsequent age. Now, the citations from Origen enable us to judge by what hands this doctrine was developed.

Mr. P.—Well, if you insist on quotations from writers of the first three centuries, you shall have one. Listen to St. Cyprian—"It is one thing in punishment of sin to be purified by long-suffering, and purged by long fire; and another to have expiated all sin by previous suffering." What can be a clearer testimony to his belief in Purgatorial fire?

C. L.—We are tolerably familiar with this passage, and when separated from its context, it will, indeed, teach Purgatory very distinctly to those who have heard of the doctrine before; but if you will take the trouble not to be satisfied with copying from a Roman Catholic list of citations, but to look out the passage in St. Cyprian himself, you will find that he is speaking, not of any torments in the next world, but of the allegorical fire of penitential austerities in this life, a fire in which, by the early discipline of the Church, it was required that the lapsed should, for an appointed season, discipline themselves.

The question St. Cyprian was discussing was, whether those who had offered sacrifice to idols should be re-admitted to the communion of the Church: St. Cyprian maintained that, after a proper course of penitential discipline, they might. His opponents urged—"If you thus relax our discipline, according to which the lapsed should never be re-admitted, the greatest injury will follow. In time of persecution nobody will have courage to confess Christ; all will be glad to save their lives by offering sacrifice, if they know that they may hope notwithstanding to be ultimately received into the Church. St. Cyprian argued in reply, we need not by any means fear this; for the condition of the lapsed will still be far different from that of confessors and martyrs. The one are immediately received into paradise, sure of their reward; the others have to wait for pardon, anxious as to what the Bishop may decree concerning them; doubtful whether he may not order them a time of penance so long that they shall be as weary as the debtor confined in prison, who cannot get out until he have paid the last farthing; doubtful whether the form of penance may not be severe in proportion to their guilt, as for example, to roll in dust and ashes, to be macerated by fastings, by sackcloth, by groans and sighs, as metal is purified in vehement fire; doubtful whether after all this they shall be received back with difficulty, or reserved to await the judgment of the Lord. Since, therefore, the martyr has the prize of certain and immediate glory held out to him, while he who lapses has to look forward to the uncertain event of long and weary probation before he can be admitted to the church, there is no danger that the practice of re-admitting the lapsed after sufficient penance should tempt men to shrink from martyrdom.

Such is Saint Cyprian's argument, and you see that in the whole there is not the slightest allusion to Purgatory.

Mr. P.—I cannot believe that this is St. Cyprian's meaning. No doubt you are giving me a forced Protestant explanation of the passage, got up to evade the pressure of the argument I was urging against you.

C. L.—By no means: the explanation I have given you I have translated nearly verbatim from Rigaltius, the learned Roman Catholic commentator on St. Cyprian. (Rigalt. in Cyprian. Epist. lii., Paris 1648, p. 68). And you will find an acknowledgment that this explanation of the passage harmonizes perfectly with the context in Mr. Newman's Essay on Development (p. 416). And we cannot think it very fair that while when Roman Catholic writers are commenting on a passage of an ancient writer, and considering it in connection with its context, they are constrained to give one explanation, they should, in controversy with Protestants, pick the passage away from its context, and present us with another explanation.

Mr. P.—What you say appears strange, but I shall examine into it; meanwhile I should be glad to know how you can possibly reply to the arguments of Epiphanius against the heresy of Arius, part of which consisted in maintaining that the prayers of the living afforded no relief to the dead.

C. L.—This is coming to the fourth century; and unless you prove that the doctrine existed in the Church in the previous century, proving that it existed in the fourth century will not answer your purpose. For we all know that Purgatory was believed in by the majority of Christians in the fourteenth century, and if it was not so taught in the third century, it is a matter of mere historical curiosity at what precise century between, the belief was introduced. However, we have no reason to shrink from discussing the question—"Was Purgatory part of the faith of the Church in the fourth century?" For victory on this ground will not answer your purpose; but if we show, as we expect to do, that it was not a part of the faith of the Church at that time, of course, all pretence to earlier antiquity for the doctrine, as an article of faith, falls to the ground at once. There is one small point, however, at which we wish to take exception. You speak of the heresy of Arius, who disputed the utility of prayers for the dead; and we wish to explain that the Aerius who held these views, and against whom Epiphanius argues, in his 75th heresy, is a very different person from the arch-heretic, Arius, who denied the Divinity of our Lord.

Mr. P.—Doubtless he was: I never intended to confound the two, although I was careless in spelling the name.

C. L.—The only reason we mentioned the point is, that the views of Aerius may be discussed on their own merits, and that a needless prejudice against them may not be excited in the minds of our unlearned readers, who might imagine that it was the Arch-heretic, Arius, with whom the opposition to these prayers had originated.

Mr. P.—Take the benefit of the distinction, whatever that may be; but let us see your answer to the plain statement of Epiphanius, that prayers for the dead were a custom handed down to him from the primitive Church.

C. L.—Remember that we are now discussing Purgatory, and not prayers for the dead. We freely acknowledge that prayers for the dead were used in the fourth century; and that the section of Epiphanius, to which you have referred, contains his answer to the question of Aerius—what was the use of these prayers? Now, surely, if Purgatory was part of the doctrine of his Church in his day, we should find some mention of it in his answer to this question. If you were to ask any Roman Catholic child now, "why do you pray for the dead?" He would be able to answer, clearly and distinctly, "To get their souls out of Purgatory." If the good bishop had known as much of the late theories of temporary punishments after death as every Roman Catholic child knows now, he would have been at no loss for an answer to Aerius. But, on the contrary, he does not take this simple ground, but is exceedingly vague and unsatisfactory. You blamed us because, in a former number, we only gave vague accounts of the reasons why the Primitive Church used prayers for the dead. The fact is, we cannot tell you more than the early fathers knew themselves; and all those fine theories, so harmonious, and so logical (only so baseless), which delight you now, were not known in these days. In this essay of Epiphanius, you will find the main ground he takes up is, that the Church had handed down the practice of such prayers, and that it is presumptuous in Aerius to find fault with it. Just read over this essay of Epiphanius again: tell us plainly whether in this controversy with Aerius he could possibly have omitted to have brought forward all he knew about Purgatory; and own that the result is, that the Church of his day had defined nothing on the subject.

Mr. P.—I ask no more than your acknowledgment that prayers for the dead were used in the Primitive Church, and if such prayers were not to get their souls out of Purgatory, what else were they for?

C. L. That these prayers for the dead do not necessarily presuppose a Purgatory is proved by the fact that the primitive prayers included the Blessed Virgin, the Apostles, the Martyrs, &c., and surely you do not maintain that these were in Purgatory.

Mr. P. I have already answered this objection. The Saints were named in these prayers, as Epiphanius says, to do particular honour to Christ, whose saints they are: and this honour was done by entreating God to have mercy on the departed through the saints, whom they named along with them.

C. L. You much mistake if you suppose that in the ancient prayers the saints were named to offer the prayers through them; the prayers were most decidedly and unmistakeably for them. So (Apostolic Constitutions), "we offer unto thee for all thy saints that have lived well-pleasing in thy sight from the foundation of the world, for patriarchs, prophets, holy men, apostles, martyrs, confessors, bishops, presbyters, deacons, sub-deacons, readers, singers, virgins, widows, laymen, and all whose names thou knowest." Or again, St. Chrysostom's Greek Liturgy (Bened. vol. xii. p. 792), "We offer unto thee this reasonable service for the faithful deceased, our forefathers, fathers, patriarchs, prophets, and apostles, evangelists martyrs, confessors, eneratites, and every spirit perfected in the faith, especially for the holy undefiled most blessed lady, the Theotokos and ever Virgin Mary." Here you see so late as the fifth century, the saints, apostles, and Virgin Mary prayed for with other Christians indiscriminately. The praying through them was an improvement of a later age. We have already given in this paper a notable instance of this alteration. In the ninth century Hincmar informs us that the following prayer for the soul of St. Leo, stood in the old Roman Missal:—"Grant O Lord that this oblation which thou hast appointed to be for the relaxation of the sins of the whole world, may be of advantage to the soul of thy servant Leo." But, in the time of Pope Innocent III, we learn that the prayer had been altered to the following—"Grant, O Lord, that this oblation may be of advantage to us by the intercession of St. Leo!"

When Epiphanius says that we pray for the saints to do especial honour to Christ; he does not mean 'by using their intercession,' but, as the context plainly shows, to do our Lord this especial honour, that he alone is to be considered above our prayers, but that all others, however eminent in Christian virtue, must be placed on a different level, and must be considered as fitting subjects for our prayers.

Mr. P. I grant that there are prayers for the saints in the early liturgies, but I have St. Augustine's authority for saying, that in their case these prayers must be understood as thanksgivings and not as propitiations.

C. L. It is true that St. Augustine, in whose time the veneration for the martyred saints had begun to reach a high pitch did put forth this then novel doctrine. But nothing can be more forced than to contend that the very same words are to be understood in the case of some as a petition and in the case of others as a thanksgiving. The fact is, that the ancient liturgies in recording the prayers then made for the Virgin and the saints, not only prove that prayers for the dead do not necessarily imply a belief in Purgatory; but also contain important testimony against the cultus of the saints. In the earliest ages, they prayed for them without scruple, and considered Christ as alone above our prayers. As the veneration for the saints increased, St. Augustine had recourse to forced explanations of the forms which still existed in his liturgy; but, as time went on, it was found intolerably inconsistent to pray for those who were supposed to be in heaven interceding for us, and the forms of the liturgies were themselves changed.

Mr. P. I cannot admit St. Augustine's explanation to be forced in the least degree.

C. L. Then why does not your church still continue to pray by name for the Virgin, St. Peter, and St. Paul, &c.? Confess that you would be shocked at being asked to join in such a prayer. But, at any rate, you grant all we require, when you own that prayers were offered by the Church for the saints and martyrs, and that these saints were not supposed to be in Purgatory. It follows, then, that the mere fact that the deceased were prayed for, is not sufficient to prove that the persons prayed for were supposed to be in Purgatory. We have as good a right to say that the mention of the names of all the deceased were only thanksgivings, as you have to say that the mention of the names of the martyrs were so.

Mr. P. But how did prayers for the dead arise in the Church, if Purgatory were not part of her creed?

C. L. Very simply—in prayers for the living. The church liturgy, for instance, contains—"We offer unto thee for all thy faithful servants, and especially Philip, our Bishop." Well, Philip dies, and they say—"shall we leave out his name now? Not so; let us testify our belief that he is, though unseen by us, still in being and with the Lord. The case is only the same as if he had journeyed from us to a distant place. We shall, by our mention of him in our prayers, show our love to him, our pious belief concerning him, and, at the same time, our conviction, that of all who are in being, it is Christ alone whom we cannot, without insult, pray for."

It was in feelings such as these that prayers for the dead originated. We would gladly say something more as to the different theories that were invented to explain the benefit which the dead might be supposed to derive for such prayers. We should wish also to produce some passages from St. Augustine which decisively prove that in his time Purgatory was no part of the faith of the Church. The length to which our remarks have already run warns us that we must put off any further observations to next month. We will only conclude by remarking, that when Mr. Power undertakes to establish Purgatory by the tradition of the Church, he undertakes a task which the best Divines of his own communion have long since acknowledged to be hopeless. The only principle on which Purgatory can be defended is, that the later church possesses light which was unknown to the earliest. It was on this principle that Purgatory was boldly defended by one of their most famous English divines, Cardinal Fisher, Bishop of Rochester, who was martyred by Henry VIII., and who wrote against Luther in the following terms—

"Whoever reads the commentaries of the ancient Greeks, will find no mention, as far as I can see, or the slightest possible, concerning Purgatory. Nay, even the Latins did not all at once, but gradually enter into the truth of this matter. . . For a while it was unknown; at a later date it was known to the Church universal. Then it was believed by some, by little and little, partly from Scripture, partly from Revelations" [that is to say, from ghost stories—Ed. C. L.].—Assert. Luther. Confut. 18.

We conclude then for the present by saying that those who would prove Purgatory from the Fathers, must be more learned than Cardinal Fisher. One question, however, we wish to ask for our information, before we part. You say that the "nature of the purifying fire of Purgatory, and the term of its duration, form no part of the Church's doctrine." We want to know whether it is any part of your Church's doctrine that there is any purifying fire in Purgatory at all?

ON THE INTERNAL EVIDENCES OF THE CATHOLIC RELIGION.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

SIR—A feeling of deep interest in the religious controversy between Catholics and Protestants, has led me to be an attentive reader of your journal from its commencement. I feel bound to acknowledge the learning, candour, and impartiality with which your discussions, for the most part, have been conducted; and I think it must be confessed that you have proved how little evidence is to be derived from the ancient fathers, in support of the reverence which the Catholic Church has always paid to the Blessed Virgin, and other important doctrines which we are taught to believe.

But, sir, even granting that you have proved all this (and that is a very great concession), you must yourself be quite conscious how little you have done to shake the hold which the Catholic faith possesses over the affections of the people of Ireland. The testimony of ancient authors is the least part of the evidence on which we rely. You have prudently abstained from touching on the internal convictions which in all ages, have vouched for the truth of our faith to multitudes of sincere and pious men, to a Fenelon, a Bossuet, a Pascal. It is the boast of Catholicism that it comes home to the wants and wishes of the mass of mankind in a way in which no other religion ever yet has done, and it thereby proves itself to be the religion of the heart. The whole system of the Catholic religion—its sublime ritual—its fasts and penances—its intercessory offerings for departed souls—its saints and confessors interceding in the presence of God—its devotions to the Virgin Mother of God, all are but so many links of the chain, whereby the faith which we profess (in common with the majority of the Christian world) is entwined around the deepest principles of our nature. When Protestant divines are contending with Deists and Infidels, they rightly dwell on the beautiful adaptation of Christianity to the wants of fallen man, as one of the proofs of its being a divine revelation. I admit the validity of the argument; but I want to know why Catholics may not advance a similar argument in their controversy with Protestants, in order to prove that theirs is the only true and genuine form of Christianity? Protestantism, in the aspect under which it daily presents itself to Catholic eyes—namely, as it is exemplified in the lives of the great mass of professing Protestants—is (as you yourself must allow) a cold, lifeless system, unable to make any solid impression on the heart or affections. There is nothing in it to call forth those deep and hidden emotions of love and devotion, which find such scope and exercise in the beautiful and impressive ritual of the Catholic Church. In proof of this, I confidently appeal to the experience of all those persons who have made any inquiries into the religious condition of the mass of the population, in almost all Protestant countries, not even excepting enlightened and intelligent England. There is, indeed, plenty of wrangling upon religious doctrines, among certain classes, but how little hold has religion itself upon the daily life, the hopes and fears, the joys and sorrows of the multitude; how rarely do they turn to it for comfort and consolation under the trials and calamities of life! When the heart of some poor penitent, gushing with feelings of sorrow and contrition, and groaning under the burden of sin, seeks for some sympathising bosom whereon to repose the burden of its griefs, how does your church endeavour to satisfy the intense craving of his soul? You tell him that penances are unavailing, that priestly absolution is but an empty sound. You forbid him to turn his thoughts to the sainted martyrs and confessors; you tell him that it is rank idolatry to fly for refuge to the blessed mother of God; and what do you offer him instead? You give him the thirty-nine articles! You set before his mind a dry and barren abstraction of a Deity, enveloped in a cloudy maze of dogmatic theology! As well might you hold forth an empty vessel to the parched and thirsty wanderer in the desert, as tell the sorrowing and heavy-laden soul to be content with such as a religion as this.

My argument, therefore, is briefly as follows:—If adaptation to the wants and infirmities, not of a select few, but of the whole mass of mankind, be among the proofs of the Divine origin of a religious system, I must conclude that the Catholic faith has greater claims upon our reverence and regard than any religion such as I have described, which strips Christianity of all that can make it lovely and attractive, and leaves nothing behind save the lifeless skeleton, a fit subject for logical disputants and intellectual anatomists.

DERMOT MACMANUS.

Grange, May 20, 1853.

We have already invited the earnest attention of our readers to the foregoing letter, and to what we are about to say in reply to it. No more important topic has, we think, appeared in the CATHOLIC LAYMAN than that suggested by this letter. A religion to be true must be adapted to the wants and infirmities, not of a select few, but of the mass of mankind. It must not be a system cold and lifeless, unable to make any solid impression on the hearts and affections. It must be capable of being entwined around the deepest principles of our better nature—and have something in it to call forth the deep and hidden emotions of love and devotion which we in a spirit of grief, admit to be but little exemplified in the lives of the great mass of mankind, Protestants or Roman Catholics. It must have something better to set before the poor penitent, groaning under the burden of sin, than a dry and barren abstraction of a Deity, enveloped in a cloudy maze of dogmatic theology; and if the religion of any Church, Catholic or Protestant, be indeed one which strips Christianity of all that can make it lovely and attractive, and leaves nothing behind save the lifeless skeleton, a fit subject for logical disputants and intellectual anatomists, away with such a religion from the earth!

If we did not feel from the bottom of our souls that our religion is not such, we should never have written a line in this paper, nor indeed would the CATHOLIC LAYMAN ever have had existence.

We must take leave to begin by correcting Mr. M'Manus as to a matter of fact. It is not true, when a penitent groaning under a sense of sin seeks in the Church of England for something to satisfy the intense cravings of his soul, that she offers him nothing but her thirty-nine articles, and a dry and barren abstraction of a Deity. It is true, indeed, that she forbids him to trust in the merits of saints or martyrs, or to look to them as mediators and intercessors. It is true that she warns men, as they regard the safety of their souls, not to peril them by "flying for refuge" to any created being, or offering religious worship to any but the Supreme God. But why does she do this? Is it not because she would have them trust to the one great intercessor between God and man, not a dry and barren abstraction, but the ever-blessed Son of God, the Lord Jesus Christ, who, though co-eternal and co-equal with God the Father, condescended to take on him man's nature, that being touched with the sense of our infirmities[a] after laying down his precious life for the sins of the world, he might be for ever at the right hand of his Father making intercession for us? Is this system—of which the all-merciful Jesus (who wept at the tomb of Lazarus before he restored him to life) is the centre and the life—a lifeless system, unable to make any solid impression on the heart and affection? And is there, indeed, nothing left to make the religion of the Bible lovely and attractive, while that Bible remains the only authentic record of the life and sufferings of our Blessed Lord. If the Church of England determines to know nothing but Jesus Christ and Him crucified, it is because the great Apostles St. Peter and St. Paul did the same, and whether the system they taught or that now taught by the Church of Rome be most "enveloped in a cloudy maze of dogmatic theology," or whether the religion of the Bible be not that of the heart and affections, rather than that of logical disputation, we shall not shrink from examining, with all the earnestness which such a topic demands from every rational being anxious to save his soul.

The feelings which Mr. M'Manus's letter has evoked are indeed of no ordinary kind, but we must restrain the emotions which such charges have naturally excited, and endeavour calmly to consider the argument conveyed by it, though we find it would be impossible to make more than a few preliminary observations on so extensive and important a subject in our present number.

We think our correspondent has begun by confounding two things essentially distinct. Internal evidence and internal convictions. We do not think that the external and internal evidences of religion should ever be dissociated, or that either should be represented as able to stand alone; but were we obliged to admit one to the exclusion of the other, the evidence which any religion contains within itself—that is, the internal evidence of its truth, we have always considered the most satisfactory and conclusive kind of evidence, as being the most independent of fallible human testimony; but internal convictions, as distinct from internal evidence, are too often in favour of what is false, to make them safe guides without further examination.

Nothing is true merely because any man or any number of men are convinced that it is true; but that which has proof within itself must be true.

When our correspondent asks why Roman Catholics may not advance against Protestants in order to prove that theirs is the only true and genuine form of Christianity, the same argument that Protestant divines use against infidels and Deists, drawn from the beautiful adaptation of Christianity to the wants of fallen man, we understand him, therefore, as referring to the internal evidence which that beautiful adaptation affords, and not merely to the persuasion of any man or set of men, that it is a true religion because it suits the wishes of unregenerate human nature.

In discussing this subject, however, we would distinguish between the wants and the wishes of fallen man. The mere fact that we want a thing, is not in itself a proof that we have got it; for we live in a world which sin has blighted, and where we have to bear the want of many things which we believe we should have enjoyed had man not fallen. Still when direct evidence has been produced of the divine origin of a revelation, it is a strong confirmatory argument, if that revelation be found to supply some at least of those real wants of which mankind have always been conscious, that it comes from Him who alone is able to supply these wants. But a system which is adapted only to the wishes of fallen man may, for all we know, come from the enemy who first brought man into the fall, and awakened in his breast the wishes of a fallen nature.

The nature of the argument used by Protestants against Infidels and Deists is as follows:—

All nations of the world, in every age, have felt that they were liable to the wrath of God, and hence dreaded that wrath. All religions have ever consisted in sacrifices and explations for the purpose of turning away the wrath of God, and procuring his favour. There is no record of any nation who have not felt this great necessity. This universal sense of guilt and helplessness so deeply felt, is proof enough that man does need some means of being reconciled to God; and this is confirmed by a fact as universal, that all mankind were ever doing those things which their own reason and conscience testified were wrong. Here, then, comes in the argument which Protestant Divines urge as a strong confirmation of their faith, against infidels and Deists. Our revelation not only explains the causes of this universal sense of the need of being reconciled to God, and of this universal doing of what man knows to be wrong, but it provides the only remedy that has ever proved effectual to cleanse the conscience from the sense of sin and guilt—the only one that has ever given a real feeling of peace with God; the only means that have ever proved effectual to enable man to act up to the light of his own conscience and reason. This, when once we come to know it, strikes every man at once, as internal proof that the religion of the Gospel is, indeed, from God, who alone can give us peace with God.

This evidence of "adaptation or suitability to the universal wants of fallen man—that is, in fact, supplies him with that which he cannot do without—is one of the strongest that any religion can possess; and we heartily agree with Mr. M'Manus that a religion which does not possess it can have little claim on our hearts.

But have we equal reason to believe that the things which "fallen man" have ever wished for the most earnestly, as the remedy against this fear of the wrath of God, was, therefore, the thing most adapted to his real wants? We appeal to the history of mankind, and to the experience of every individual, whether the most universal desire of fallen man has not always been to find some way of escaping from the wrath of God, without forsaking the pleasures of sin. Is it not the natural desire of every man to spend his life here in the enjoyment of sinful things, and yet be saved from the wrath of God hereafter? And must we therefore conclude, that a religion which should profess to do this, must, therefore, be true; because it was so admirably adapted to the universal wishes of man. We see here, then, the difference between adaptation to "the wants" and to "the wishes" of "fallen man." The one is internal evidence, in some degree, that the religion comes from God; the other may even afford presumption that it comes from Satan.

The argument used by Protestant divines against Deists and infidels has ever been of the first kind, never of the last. Those divines have always argued that Christianity was perfectly adapted to meet the real wants which mankind universally felt—not that it satisfied all their fancied wants—and they have never argued that it must be true, because it was just the way that all mankind wished to have their wants provided.*

[a] "It behoved him in all things to be made like unto his brethren, that he might become a merciful and faithful high priest before God, that he might be a propitiation for the sins of the people. For in that wherein he himself hath suffered and been tempted, he is able to succour them also that are tempted." "Having, therefore, a great high priest that hath passed into the heavens—Jesus the Son of God; let us hold fast our confession. For we have not a high priest who cannot have compassion on our infirmities; but one tempted in all things like as we are, without sin. Let us go, therefore, with confidence to the throne of grace: that we may obtain mercy and find grace in seasonable aid."—2 Hebrews, 17, 18. 4 Heb., 14, 16. (Douay Bible)

* NOTE—Some able Protestant writers have judiciously and strongly cautioned their readers against pressing the argument in question too far. We may give, as an illustration, a passage from the able work entitled "Lessons on Christian Evidences; or Lessons on the Truth of Christianity," used by permission of the Board, in the National Schools in Ireland; 18th Edition, 1852, p. 74:—

"Sec. 6. Great care should be taken not to misunderstand what has just been said; because you may hear from some persons what appears, at the first glance, very like it, though, in reality, quite different. I mean, that you may meet with persons who profess to despise and dislike all that is commonly called 'evidences for the truth of Christianity;' and who say, 'Let a man but feel the want of it; let him feel how suitable Christianity is to the needs of such a being as man, how it supplies such motives, and such guidance, and hopes and consolations, as human nature requires; and then he will want no evidence to convince him of its truth;' with a great deal more to the same purpose.

"Now, all this may seem, at the first glance, very plausible, but on reflection, you will perceive that it is setting up man—each man for himself—to be the standard of divine truth. On this principle each one is to receive, as a revelation, whatever religion suits his own judgment of what is good, and his own wants, and wishes, and tastes. Now, we know how widely men differ from one another on these points and what various and erroneous systems they are, accordingly, disposed to embrace. For instance, the Jews, at the time when Jesus appeared, felt a want of a victorious and mighty earthly deliverer, who should exalt their nation, and reign in great worldly splendour. The kingdom of Jesus, which was a 'kingdom not of this world,' and which admitted 'Gentiles to be fellow-heirs,' was precisely what they did not want. It did not at all suit their hopes, and wishes, and habits of thought. And, accordingly, the greater part of them rejected Jesus, and followed those false Christs who promised to lead them to victory over the Romans. Jesus indeed, appealed to the evidence of his mighty works, which those false Christs produced no evidence at all, except the suitableness of what they taught to the judgment, and to the feelings and wants of the Jews. But most of the Jews, acting on the very principle I have been speaking of, disregarded evidence altogether, and gave themselves up to their own feelings, resolving to believe what suited them best.

"In like manner, when Mohammed proclaimed himself a prophet,

Rather they have argued, and rightly too, that we must expect that what is really suited to the wants of fallen man, will be just what man in that state does not like nor wish for. For consider what is meant by "fallen man." It means that man's nature is corrupt—that his affections are turned away from God, and set upon things that God hates—that his desires are fixed on the very things that cause his ruin and his misery. How, then, can the remedy for his fall be agreeable to the desires and inclinations that spring out of that very fallen nature itself. We think that those who believe in the divine origin of Romanism, on account of its admirable suitableness to human nature, forget that the great aim of Christianity is professedly to regenerate man's nature. Christianity does not profess to accommodate itself to the tastes and reasons of man, or (as the law of Moses did) permit things on account of the hardness of man's heart, but gives man the promise of God's Spirit to change their hearts, and render them "new creatures." Accordingly, though the Pagans of Italy, in St. Paul's time, were just as fond of altars and sacrifices, images, shows, and spectacles, as the Christians of Italy are now, St. Paul never thought of accommodating the simple worship of the Church to their tastes; and though the Greeks at Corinth were quite as fond as St. Thomas Aquinas or any of the modern schoolmen of subtle and abstruse inquiries, St. Paul was so far from indulging them therein, that, for that very reason, he was determined to know nothing among them but Jesus Christ, and him crucified.—1 Cor. 11, 1, 2.

We may go farther still, and deny that the promptings and cravings of man's fallen nature have ever pointed to the true remedy. We may affirm that they have always tended either to oppose and reject, or at least to corrupt and distort the remedies which God had provided.

Is there any instance, in any nation of the world, of men's cravings after something that would set them at peace with God, having led them to a true remedy? Did not their own judgment and devices ever lead them to what was ineffectual, degrading, and wicked? These promptings and cravings of fallen nature are well stated in a conversation between Balak, the heathen king, and Balaam, the prophet, recorded by the prophet Micah (ch. vi. v. 7), "May the Lord be appeased with thousands of rams," said the heathen king, "or with many thousands of fat he-goats? Shall I give my first-born for my wickedness, the first fruit of my body for the sin of my soul?" We may accept this as proof that even heathens felt that something more precious than man could give was needed to make our peace with God. But the greatest effort ever made by the cravings of fallen man, was to lead men to sacrifice their own children to atone for their sins! Here we learn how far that nature is from guiding us aright to the remedy. Fallen nature never attained to the answer which the prophet gave, short as that answer comes of what the Gospel reveals—"I will show thee, O man, what is good, and what the Lord requireth of thee: verily to do judgment, and to love mercy, and to walk humbly with thy God."

So far we trust Mr. M'Manus will agree with us, and think we have given, at least, a fair statement of the argument. The feelings and experience of all mankind, especially when that experience leads to what no man wishes for—a sense of guilt, and terror of judgment to come—is proof of the real wants of man, that he needs something to make his peace with God. But fallen man's desires and wishes to have his wants supplied in a particular way, is no proof whatever that the way he wishes for is the right way.

And when we once know that God has spoken, and revealed his way of providing for the wants of fallen man, it is surely no longer open to man to argue that some other way of his own devising must be better. Man cannot then say—"I see, indeed, that such is the way that God has provided and revealed, but my own feelings and convictions teach me that such and such other things which God has not mentioned are more suited to my nature and my wants. I see and feel that these things are more adapted to the wants and infirmities of the mass of mankind than the things which God has provided and revealed to me; and therefore I conclude that these things have a greater claim upon my reverence and regard."

We think this would be the greatest abuse of private judgment that man can commit.

We are no enemies to private judgment—that is, we think that men ought to use the faculties of reason which God has given them, to learn that will of God which He has revealed to them. But our own reason must be kept in subjection to the wisdom of God. Having once ascertained what things he has provided for our salvation, then it is reason as well as faith to believe that the things chosen by God must be the fittest for their purpose. And though we cannot see the fitness of these things—nay, even though we should think that the things have not fitness in themselves—yet it is reason, as well as faith, to believe that as instruments in His hand they have a power that cannot fail. It is reason as well as faith, to believe that "The foolishness of God is wiser than men: and that the weakness of God is stronger than men."—1 Cor. ch. i., v. 28.

We do not say this with any desire of weakening men's expectations that the things which God has provided for supplying our wants will be found to be the most fit for their purpose. We only say it to guard men from drawing a hasty conclusion against those things, if, at first sight, they should seem less fit than other things for the purpose.

We have thought it well to state exactly what the nature of the argument is before we proceed to examine how it applies. We trust our valued correspondent, however predisposed, in point of feeling and taste, to differ from our views as to what form of religion is best calculated to call forth the deepest emotions of love and devotion, to afford solid comfort and consolation under the trials and calamities of life, will, at least, admit that we have stated the nature of the argument fairly. We shall proceed to consider it further in our next.

THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN IN KILPATRICK.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

MR. EDITOR—I intended some months ago to write you word what was thought and said of your paper in our little town of Kilpatrick, but I never could find courage in my mind to think that I could write such a letter as you would be at the trouble of reading. For all that, I think if I could have written down properly many of the things I knew of, at the time when they were fresh in my mind, that they would have amused you; but they are old stories now, and I cannot make a long history about them. I mind well, though, the time the paper first came down, and how puzzled the boys were to know who sent it to them. Only it was guessed that 'twas the same people sent it as sent down the Telegraph; for there used to come down at that time as many of the Telegraph every week as would have filled a canal boat, and nobody had anything to pay for them. There didn't none of the CATHOLIC LAYMAN come to me at first, and the first I heard of it was from Brian Kennedy, who works for me on my little farm, and who lent me a number or two, telling me there was very fine reading in it. So, though I am a Protestant, I never grudge to hear what the Catholics have to say for themselves, and I liked your paper mightily, and many a talk I had with Brian and other of the boys about the things that were in it. What we liked most to read about was about Pat and Jim, that talked by the road; only we often wondered how you, that was so learned, would demean yourself by printing what's said by them that only talk just the same as we do ourselves. And, indeed, 'twas that put it into my head that you would print my letter if I was to write to you, for I have got a good education, and sure 'twill be easy to write as good as that, anyhow. Well, the paper had been coming about three months when I was told that Father Sheehy had spoken against it from the altar, and threatened those that would be reading it. Poor Father Sheehy is a quiet, fat slob of a man himself; but they say that he is in dread of his superiors, who say that he is not active enough, and that he is to be sent away to Killenagory district, if he lets the Jumpers get a footing in the parish. So this time he stirred himself in earnest. It was not only in the chapel he spoke, but he went and told the postmaster to send back all the papers to Dublin, and not to deliver one to any member of his flock; but Mr. Jackson answered him, that it would be as much as his place was worth if he was to do such a thing, and that he might be sent to gaol if he did not deliver the papers as they were directed. So then Father Pat went round the parish and got up all the papers he could find, and wrote "refused" on them, and sent them back to Dublin—all, except Brian Kennedy's; for he got into such a passion when Brian would not give him his paper at once, when he asked it, that he snatched it from his hand, and tore it in pieces, and flung the bits on the road. Poor Biddy Kennedy had a troublesome job sewing them together afterwards. Well, next month there was the same work; but still the papers kept coming. I suppose the people of Dublin saw that many of the papers that were marked "refused" had the marks of being well read before they were sent back; and some of the boys never gave Father Pat their papers after the first, and let on to him that they had not come. At last Father Pat was fairly tired out—that same was not hard—and now plenty of papers come down every month, and nobody says a word again them, and there only come three Telegraphs now to all the parish. I get a copy of the LAYMAN myself now, for, as I can well afford it, thank God, I would not be beholden to the boys, the time the priest was giving them such trouble about their own papers; and I sent up my 3s. 6d. to Mr. Curry and it has come regularly ever since. But I wish, sir, you would tell Mr. Curry that Tim Donovan, of this town, has got no paper the last three months; and though at first, he used to abuse the paper, and to say that lighting his pipe was too good a use to put it to, he was very angry it did not come to him, and says he does not know why he should be left out, when it is sent to his neighbours.

But, sir, what I wanted to tell you, when I began my letter, was about a talk I had with Mr. Townsend, our clergyman, about your paper. It was on last Tuesday evening three weeks that some of the neighbours were over at my house, and I was reading the CATHOLIC LAYMAN for them, and it came on to rain cats and dogs. I suppose you remember what a power of rain we had then; I thought that the weather would never get fine; but, I am sure, that if we had some of that same rain now, the crops would be a deal the better of it. Well, Mr. Townsend, who was going by, came in, and asked for shelter; so we gave him a chair and he sat down, and I was shutting up the paper, but says he—"Don't let me stop the reading;" and so, though I did not want it, he made me go on and finish the article I was reading. And indeed, I was ashamed enough, for the article was all about the Fathers, and it wasn't only that I was afeared I might be miscalling some of their long names, but I knew of old that Mr. Townsend hadn't much liking to those same Fathers; for I have been hearing him preach once a week, and oftener, now for a long time, and never a word out of the Fathers does he put into his sermons, from one year's end to another. And once that I was telling him of a book that Father Sheehy had lent Tim Donovan, that was all sayings taken out of the Fathers, says he to me—"Do you read your Bible well, and if you know well what Peter and Paul taught, you need not care much what Chrysostom or Augustine thought? They may have the fathers, says he, but you have got the grandfathers; for, sure, it's not alone from us that the blessed Apostles are entitled to respect, but the Fathers themselves were as much bound as we to listen to what they say." So, when I thought of this in my mind, I felt ashamed as I was stumbling over the names of the Fathers, thinking what Mr. Townsend would say to it; and when I had done, I said—"I hope, sir, you don't disapprove of what I was reading; but myself, and other of the neighbours, take great pleasure in reading this paper every month." "Quite contrary," says he, "I read the paper myself, and think very well of it; but, even if I did not approve of every word of it, I would be glad to see you all taking an interest in inquiring about religion, and trying to find out where the truth lies. And I like the paper, because it's called the LAYMAN, if it was for nothing else, because there are too many in this country who seem to think that it's no one's business but the clergy to learn anything of what God has revealed to us. They seem to think that they are to get their clergy to save their souls for them, without their having anything to say to it; just as you would get Dick Conry to make your brogues for you, and not care to see how he did it if he did it well. That's why I am glad that the laymen are now beginning to see that it's some business of their own to find out whether they are on the right road or not. If they go wrong it will be no excuse for them that they followed bad guidance, when it was their business to look out better who they trusted to. When our Lord came into the world, many of the Jews did not believe him, because they trusted their priests, who said that he was a deceiver; but Jesus never said that those who rejected him would escape because it was their priests who led them wrong. He only told them that when 'the blind led the blind both would fall into the ditch.' And Dennis," says Mr. Townsend to me, "you know very well that though it is my duty to teach you, and I try to fulfil my duty in that respect, yet I never ask you to believe anything on my word. I give you chapter and verse for all I say to you; and I am as glad as St. Paul was himself when those he preached to searched the Scriptures to examine whether what he said was true." So I should have told you, sir, that, amongst others that was there, was Tim Donovan, that came up to have an argument with me—he's fond enough of one, and he finds plenty to say about all that's in the paper—and when Mr. Townsend came in I saw he didn't much like it, and I think he would have gone away only for the rain that came down like as if it was out of a sieve; and, besides, there's not one in the parish that would wish to do an uncivil thing to Mr. Townsend though he produced no miraculous evidence, he was joined by a multitude of followers. His religion suited a sensual, and gross-minded, and warlike, and ambitious people. He promised them victory and plunder in this world, and, after death, a paradise of sensual enjoyments. And, finding that such a religion suited their tastes and wants, they embraced it without seeking for any further evidence of its truth. The Hindoos, again, and other Pagans, adhere to their own religion without any evidence, and find it suitable to their own wants and tastes.

"And the same must be the case with all the most extravagant corruptions of Christianity that have arisen from time to time: such as that of the ancient Gnostics, who thought to obtain immortal life without practising moral virtue, and who had a taste for idle speculations concerning the nature of God. No one of these corrupt religions could ever have arisen at all, or have been received, if those who introduced it, and their followers, had not felt a 'want' of some such system.

"It is plain, therefore, that the principle I have been speaking of tends to lead men into an endless variety of errors.

"Sec. 7. But the course I have been recommending is, in reality, exactly the reverse of all this. Jesus tells us that if any man is willing and desirous to do the will of his Heavenly Father, he shall know the truth of the doctrine. You must begin, therefore, by a readiness to follow, not your own will, but the will of God; and to receive whatever shall appear to come from him, however contrary to your own expectations or wishes. And if in this temper of mind you proceed to examine those evidences which Jesus and his Apostles appeal to, you will see good reason for believing in the Gospel. And then, if you embrace the Gospel and labour to conform your heart and your life to it, you will perceive that it does suit the nature and the real wants of man. For you will perceive that it tends to enlighten his judgment, and to improve his moral taste, and to lead him to live according to the best principles of his nature, and to secure him the truest peace and comfort. And in proportion as you come to perceive all this, you will thus obtain a strong additional confirmation of the truth of Christianity.

"But you will have obtained this, not by rejecting evidence, and resolving to conform your religious belief to your own tastes and inclinations; but, on the contrary, by striving to conform your own tastes and inclinations to your religious belief."

since the year of the famine, when he didn't spare himself; and many a one in Kilpatrick owes their life to him that year, and indeed he was near dying himself of the fever he took before it was quite over. But when Tim Donovan stayed, he was not the boy to let any one have the talk all to himself; and bedad, says he, "I hope your reverence will not take offence; but I think, if you knew you had a right commission you would talk in a very different style, and that you would not encourage your flock to call in question what you tell them. Why, when I asked Father Pat last month to give me some proofs from the Bible that we might offer prayers to the Blessed Virgin (for Dennis here had been trying to make out that there were not any), Father Pat turned round on me sharp, and said, 'What nonsense it is for you, man, to be bothering your head about Bible proofs. Can't you be satisfied to attend to your duties as you always did and leave those matters to your clergy?' And he went on to explain to me that what he taught me was on the authority of the Church, which was infallibly true, and that I was committing a great sin if I asked for any other proof. So there, sir, is the way our clergy talk, because they are sure that they are in the right; but it's no wonder that you, Protestant clergymen, that have got no certainty among you, should not object to your flocks calling in question what you tell them."

"I see," says Mr. Townsend, "you think that, because I wish Dennis to take the Bible himself and see the proofs of everything I tell him, I can't be as sure of my doctrines as Mr. Sheehy is of his."

"Just so," says Tim.

"Well," says Mr. Townsend, "suppose you went to Loughmanagh fair to buy a horse, and suppose there were two men that had each a horse to sell, and both said that he was sound, but that one of them would let you give his horse every fair trial, and get a veterinary opinion if you liked, and that the other man did not wish to let you look in his horse's mouth or examine him in any way at all, which do you think would be the man that really believed his horse was sound? Or suppose that you were selling beasts there, and that you were offered gold in payment for them, which would you think best of, a man who said his sovereigns were good, and you should take them on his word, or of a man who wou'd let you ring them and weigh them, and make sure for yourself whether they were good or not? I suppose you would say, that if he was sure himself his gold was good, he would never let you examine it: but I would say, that the man that is really sure is the man that does not object to having all he says well tried and looked into. Take my advice, Mr. Donovan, read your Douay Bible well, and try to get your priest to give you his proofs out of it for what he teaches you; and if he objects to this I would not trust much to any man who would give you no better satisfaction than that he was so sure that he was right, that he scorned to give any proof of it.'

"I am no Biblical," says Tim Donovan. "The Bible may be your rule of faith, but it isn't mine. It's out of the Fathers that the church learns many things that you Protestants haven't got in your Bible."

So when he talked of the Fathers, I said—"There's plenty of the Fathers in this paper at any rate; and that's, sir, why I thought you might not approve of it, because I know you are not much given to quoting them."

"I believe," says Mr. Townsend, "one reason why I don't quote them much is precisely the reason why the priests do, and that is, that I wish you to be able to judge yourself of the proofs of what I teach you, while there is nothing they dislike so much as that their people should ask them for proofs of what they tell them. When I prove a doctrine to you out of the Bible, I know that you can get a Bible for a shilling, and that you can find out for yourself, in five minutes, whether I am telling you right what's in the Scripture or not. But where would be the good of my quoting the Fathers to you, except I wanted, as some do, to stop your mouth with them? Why 'twould take you more than £100 to buy a set of the Fathers; and you should build a new wing to your house to put them in when you had bought them, and I doubt if your Tramp, though he is a good plough horse, could draw them home for you in one journey; and 'twould be twenty years before you had read them all, if you worked hard at them, and supposing you had learning enough. And might I not as well ask you to believe upon my own word at once, as send you away from the Bible to the Fathers, that I know you can't get at? I remember a story I read of a woman that was not very fond of telling the truth; but whenever she wanted to say anything that she did not think would be believed on her own word, she used to say Mrs. Harris told me that, or Mrs. Harris will swear to that; and the joke was, that nobody but herself knew who Mrs. Harris was; so nobody could get at her to find out whether it was true or not. Now, I think, when the priests send you to the Fathers, they have no more idea of your really going to consult them, than this woman had of her friends going to consult Mrs. Harris, but it sounds better than giving one's own word for what one says."

"Well, sir," says I "The CATHOLIC LAYMAN does not agree with you, or they would not quote so much of them."

"I don't object to quoting the Fathers," says he; "for many that read that paper have a good deal of learning. But I will explain to you how that is. When I ask you to show me from Scripture that it is right to pray to the Blessed Virgin, the priests will say, 'We own there is not much about it in Scripture, but we'll prove it to you from the Fathers.' Well, then, I confess I would not be for going any further. I would say, if God meant us to do it, he would have told us in his own Word; and when you can find no warrant in that for your doctrines, I don't care where else you get proofs for them. However, the CATHOLIC LAYMAN meets the priests on their own ground, and I think he shows that they have not their own way there as much as they would like you to suppose; and that, though the priests make use of the Fathers, to throw dust in the eyes of people who ask them troublesome questions out of the Bible, yet the early Fathers say nearly as little as the Bible itself about the doctrines peculiar to Roman Catholics, and they would be nearly as much puzzled to prove them out of the Fathers of the first three centuries as out of Scripture."

"But why do you say the first three centuries?" says Tim Donovan, "why might not any of the Fathers do?"

"Because," says Mr. Townsend, "it is not enough for us to know that St. Bernard, suppose, held such and such a doctrine; what we want to know is, whether he got it by tradition from the apostles. Now, the farther we go from the apostles the harder it is to make out a proof of tradition; and if there be any doctrine which neither the apostles themselves mention in their writings, nor any other Christian writer for three hundred years, I think it is hard to believe any one afterwards who tells us that the belief of such doctrine is necessary to our salvation."

"Well, sir," says Tim Donovan, "I think that those who lived so long ago as the fifth and sixth century ought to have known exactly what the apostles believed."

"The fifth century may be a long way from us," said Mr. Townsend, "but it does not follow that it was near the apostles. I dare say Brian Kennedy remembers that, some years ago, when my sister was going out to New York, he wanted her to take money and messages to his brother that lives in New Orleans."

"You ought not to bring up that old story against me, sir," says Brian. "We know more about America now than we did then. I remember we thought then that two people that went to America would be as sure of meeting each other as if they went to Loughmanagh fair; but now I know that it's a big place, and that New York and New Orleans are hundreds of miles from each other."

"Well," says Mr. Townsend, "it's much the same with the Fathers. People are apt to think, because Pope Gregory the Great and St. Paul both lived more than a thousand years ago, that their being both a long way from us makes them near each other. They forget the five or six hundred years that lie between them; or, perhaps, they don't think what a length of time three or four hundred years is, and how little we know ourselves, by tradition, what happened three or four hundred years ago."

"So now, Dennis," says he, "I have no objection to your reading, if you like, what the CATHOLIC LAYMAN tells you of the fathers, if you'll only remember this, that on that ground Protestants have every thing to gain and nothing to lose. If there was one orthodox father in the fourth century who did not believe in Purgatory, this would be conclusive proof, that it was not the doctrine of the Church in his time, and that, therefore, it had not been handed down by tradition from the Apostles. But if Roman Catholic writers could produce one such writer who did believe in Purgatory, they would have no cause to triumph, as they would be apt to do. They must first show that this was not merely that writer's private opinion, but that it was the belief of the generality of Christians of his day. And then they must show that it was the same in the century before that; and then, again, in the century before that, and so on; and if they break down in any of these proofs their whole doctrine falls to the ground. No tradition could get to the fourth century without passing through the three before it; that's why, if the CATHOLIC LAYMAN could show that the priests had not the fathers of the first three centuries on their side, we might be saved the trouble of looking into those that were after."

"One story is good till another is told," says Tim Donovan, "and I only wish that one of the priests that has learning would think it worth his while to answer some of these articles you are speaking of, for, I am sure, if one of them liked, he could prove that you are all wrong, as easy as anything."

"I am very sure," says Mr. Townsend, "the conductors of the CATHOLIC LAYMAN would be willing to print anything the priests have to say for themselves; but if you wish to know what that is, you can very soon find out, for there's Mr. Sheehy turned round the corner at the foot of the hill, and when he comes up we can ask him."

"Is it Father Pat coming," says Brian Kennedy, "I would not for five pounds he caught me talking about the Fathers with the parson." So out he flies through the back door and Tim Donovan after him, and so down through the oat field, and they were gone before you could say peas; and, sir, I am afraid I have made too long a letter about nothing, but if you think this worth printing, may be I'd write to you another time.—And so no more at present from your humble servant to command,

DENNIS GASTERN.

FARM OPERATIONS FOR JUNE.

(From the Irish Farmers' Gazette.)

The Turnip Crops.—Finish the sowing of Swedes as early as possible in the month; if this cannot be accomplished by the 15th at farthest, it will be much better to substitute Dale's hybrid, to be followed by the purple-topped Aberdeen, the sowing of which may be continued till the end of the month; but the earlier in the month these valuable varieties are sown the better. The white globe or red Norfolk may be sown from about the 20th of this month till the middle of the next; but as it is hazardous to put off sowing till the last moment, the earlier these important operations are concluded the better.

Swede Turnips and Mangel-wurzel, if sown early, should now be so far advanced as to require hoeing out and singling to the proper distance. This is an operation that requires much judgment in regulating. In good, deep, loamy soil, and warm, well-sheltered aspects, they should be hoed and singled out to stand from 15 to 18 inches apart in the drills; if left closer, the plants stand a chance of being drawn up too much to foliage, at the expense of the bulbs; but in good soils which are much exposed, or lie at greater elevations, or medium soils, from 12 to 15 inches apart will be the proper distances, where blanks occur they should be filled up by transplanting, to which both Swedes and mangels are admirably suited, and, when properly executed, produce as good crops as those from sowing. The best size or age at which to transplant is when the root is about as thick as a man's thumb, though we have seen fine crops raised from plants with roots as large as a hen's egg, and of orange globe of the size of a goose egg. The plants for this purpose should be taken carefully up, trimmed of all leaves, but a few in the centre, and the roots dipped in a puddle, composed of fine, rich earth and soft water. The place to be planted should be freshly turned up with a fork or spade, and the plants carefully dibbled in, so as that the roots be not doubled up. Cloudy, dropping weather is best for this purpose, but it will succeed well, even though the weather be dry, when carefully conducted.

Carrots and Parsnips will now require hoeing and thinning: eight to nine inches apart will be about the proper distance to leave them, and the hand-hoe should be kept busy amongst them, to keep down weeds, till the plants are strong enough to admit the horse-hoe and grubbers, which are necessary to pulverise and keep the soil loose and friable between the rows.

Beans and Peas should be hoed between, and earthed up, when cultivated in rows or drills; in broadcast cultivation careful hand-weeding must be resorted to when necessary.

Clover and Grass Seeds, if not sown immediately after the corn crops, no time should now be lost in doing so, as when the corn is shooting up into the culm, or seed stem, it will be destructive to use the harrow or roller, to cover the small seeds.

Flat Dutch Cabbages, for main crops should now be planted in rows 2½ to 3 feet apart, and from 18 inches to two feet, plant from plant.

Rape, intended for transplanting after early potatoes, spring vetches or after the corn is removed, should be sown not later than the 20th; or, rather, there should be two sowings made, the first about the beginning of the month, and the second by the 20th; the land should be clean, well cultivated, and manured, and the surface fine. Mark it out in four-feet beds, with narrow paths between, sow the seed thinly, cover with an inch of fine mould; they will be fine strong plants to put out from August till the middle of October, according to requirements. The hundred-headed cabbage, a very valuable variety, may be treated in the same way.

Winter Vetches, &c., will now be nearly consumed, and as the breadths get cleared off, prepare for and sow such varieties of turnips as are most suitable to the time and season.

Potatoes will now require careful hoeing and weeding: if in drills, a little earth should be drawn up to the stems as they advance; if in beds, they should have a little fresh earth raised from the furrows, and spread over the beds just as or before they shoot above the surface.

Buck Wheat may now be sown on exhausted light uplands, to be ploughed in as a manuring crop, after the land has been well and deeply ploughed, or digged, and cleaned. When in flower, the crop should be rolled with a heavy roller, and then ploughed in, as a preparation for autumn sown wheat, or laying down land to grass is an excellent mode when manure is scarce. Buck wheat may now also be sown for the production of seed.

Soiling Crops—such as vetches, rye-grass, and clover, &c.—should henceforth be abundant and in their prime, for house-feeding.

NUNNERIES.

The great increase in the number of nunneries in these countries, during the last few years, has brought the questions connected with those institutions more prominently before the public. In these countries, where employment in general for the male part of the population is abundant, and where emigration generally allures the unemployed away from our shores, the increase of monasteries is not likely to occur. Not so with regard to nunneries; for, as to them, the very same causes lead to their increase, and of this the Roman Catholic Church has eagerly availed itself.

During the middle ages, when violence was rife, and protection for female virtue from lawless force was often to be found only within the walls of the convent, reasons did exist for these institutions which certainly have no place at the present day. And now, undoubtedly, the only reasonable inquiry can be, whether religion, rightly understood, does, in any case, require persons to separate from the natural ties of relationship, renounce intercourse with the world, and enter into vows, to adopt a course of life which can, if necessary or desirable, be followed without them.

Now, we do not purpose to enter into the theological question, but we are anxious to call the attention of Roman Catholics to the evils necessarily arising out of such institutions, and to their obvious tendency to accumulate wealth in the hands of those who have the control or management of them; for, if they have such tendency, it surely is not unreasonable to infer that the motives of those who maintain their existence are, at least, open to grave suspicion, and are well calculated to excite the attention of those members of their own persuasion, who are not satisfied to encourage the grasping disposition of an ambitious priesthood. To enable such persons, therefore, to form a correct opinion on this subject, we will lay before our readers the facts of some cases which have, of late years, come before the public notice.

The first case to which we would refer is that of Fulham v. M'Carthy; for, as the facts proved in it were made the foundation of a decree of the Court of Chancery, and were, consequently, the subject of protracted discussions, their accuracy can hardly be doubted, particularly, as the parties against whom the allegations were made, declined to go before a jury, to contest their truth. It appeared that two daughters of a wealthy Roman Catholic gentleman, at Cork, had entered as nuns into the Ursuline Convent there. With each of them, on their entrance, the father had given a portion of £1,000, on the understanding (as his son expressly stated before the Mortmain Committee) that they were not to participate further in his property. Some years afterwards, he died intestate, and his property, which amounted to about £90,000, became divisible amongst all his children, and the distributive share of each of the sisters, who had become nuns, would have amounted to nearly £10,000. It appeared that each of these sisters declared to several members of their own family, that they considered themselves as having no claim to any share, and their wish was to remove the legal claim, by an assignment to their brothers and sisters; indeed, one of them, in a conversation with her brothers, stated she had applied to the superioress for permission to do so. To this application the superioress said that she had no power, but told her to apply to the bishop. The bishop, however, declared he had no power, and, when urged to say who had the power, he replied, "Nobody," and referred her back to the superioress.

The bishop's own statement as given in the cause confirms the fact of this application, for he admits that he told her that he had no power to grant her permission, or to dispense with her vows of poverty, and that she could not, consistently with such vow, alienate from the convent the property, and that, according to the rules and regulations of the institution, any property devolving upon her or upon any other professed nun, became the property of the community. The poor nun then said that the superioress had already referred her to him; upon which the bishop said—"You must observe your vow of obedience." The sisters, it would appear, notwithstanding these plain intimations of the will of their superiors, still resisted; but, at length, were coerced into signing the necessary deeds, assigning their property to the convent; and it was upon foot of these assignments that legal proceedings were instituted.

Of the means by which these assignments were obtained we have no obscure intimation in the evidence given in the cause. Mrs. Murrogh, another of the sisters, and whose evidence the Chancellor stated to have been wholly unimpeached, says—"My sister Maria stated that she had signed a certain deed, in conformity with her vows of obedience. The other sister said she hoped the convent would never get a farthing of the money; and, previous to her signing the deed, she declared in the presence of the witness and of her brothers—that if she was obliged to sign a deed it would be like the act of a dead person, and that she would have no more power over her will or act than a dead person would have; that it was out of her power to avoid signing the deed, in consequence of the strictness of her vow, the operation of which she compared to the effect of the presentation of a pistol by a highwayman about to rob another."

This evidence of the sister confirms the evidence of the brother, who, in his examination, stated, that the same sister declared—"That she feared she would be obliged to sign the deed in compliance with her vows, and would be obliged to state that her acts were free and voluntary." After the deed was signed, the same sister said—"That she knew she did an act contrary to her conscience, but let the sin be on those who caused her to do so." The same witness said—"That having called the attention of her sister Maria to the statements of an affidavit made by her, and which were at variance with her sentiments as expressed to himself, she replied—"I refused to make that affidavit in my own person as coming from Maria M'Carthy, but I told the solicitor if he put the word "religious" into the affidavit I would then take it. He then asked her this question—If one of the young ladies of the convent was obnoxious to the superioress, and you were desired to give her arsenic, would you do so under your vow of obedience. She said she would not be asked to do so. To which the witness very naturally replied—'Maria, do not say so—as they have asked you to make an affidavit which you refused to make in your own name, and to assist in proceedings taken contrary to your wish and without your consent.'" The same witness also stated that the other sister told him, "that if all the sufferings during her whole life were contracted within the space of half an hour, it would not equal what she suffered since her father's death in reference to this matter; and that she had seen a book in the convent, in which it was stated that the punishment for serious crime was to be immured, and fed on bread and water, and that, in some cases, persons had died of it; and that it had been decided that any member of the convent speaking or acting against their claims to this property would be guilty of mortal sin."

Now, this evidence was believed, and was the foundation on which the decree of the court rested; and, we would ask our readers, to consider well the workings of the system thus disclosed. It is obvious that, for one case thus brought before the public notice, fifty would occur of which no intimation would escape beyond the walls of the convent. The influence that the priesthood exercise over the members of their own flocks—the unwillingness to bring discredit on their spiritual superiors—the effect which the teaching of implicit obedience must produce in the minds of the unhappy inmates, and the dread of incurring those penalties which, it appears, are denounced, even against the apparent hesitation to comply with the commands of their superiors, all combine to make it difficult, if not impossible, to bring such cases before our legal tribunals, or submit them to the ordeal of public opinion. But the very possibility that such things can occur, is surely sufficient to justify the Protestant objections to such institutions. And when Roman Catholics remember the class of persons from whom votaries are always sought—that it is invariably the wealthy and well-endowed who are urged to enter these communities—that the vows of poverty thus taken by the wealthy have a direct and manifest tendency to augment the general wealth of the great spiritual corporation to which they are attached—these things, surely, should excite their suspicions, and lead them to investigate narrowly the reasons on which such institutions are maintained.

To us, we confess, they appear wholly inconsistent with the spirit and tenor of the Gospel, which, in all its teachings, deals with mankind as social beings, bound to perform social duties, and in its precepts enjoins what our conduct should be in the various relations of life. It is in the daily duties of life—in our intercourse with our fellow man, that the best exercise of Christian feeling and Christian principles is to be found. And to reject the means thus appointed by Providence for our probation and trial appears to us to set at nought the ordinance of God, and to dethrone the God of nature from his throne; because, in his mercy he has also revealed himself as a God of grace.

IS THE PROTESTANT BIBLE A CORRUPT AND MUTILATED TRANSLATION OF THE HOLY SCRIPTURES?

We suspend our papers on the Douay Bible, for this month, for the purpose of giving insertion to the following valuable letter, which comes in very well into our series, as it applies to the notes of the present Douay Bible, the same examination which in our last number we applied to the text, and which thereby very much strengthens our argument.

Those who compare this letter with their Douay Bibles will probably observe that, in two or three places (such as Phil. ii. 7, and Hebrews i. 3), the Douay Bible, published at Derby, which the writer of this letter used, differs from the Douay Bibles now in use in Ireland. The notes which the writer gives from the Bible printed at Derby, are the same as those in the Irish Bibles. With very few exceptions these notes have been introduced into the Douay Bible in modern times. Very few of them were in the old Douay Bibles. We have not been able to trace back the new notes, farther than the Testament printed with Dr. Troy's sanction in 1803.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

Sir—I trust that your Roman Catholic readers will duly appreciate your remarks under this title, and will profit by the service rendered to them by our translators of the sacred Scriptures.

You have satisfactorily shown that, if our version be the "Devil's Book," Romanists are much indebted to that book for the translation which they now possess.

In your examination you have shown the emendations made in successive Romish editions, up to the one now in circulation. If I am not anticipating the course of your arguments, I would beg to offer a few remarks on this last edition.

I have before me the edition published by Messrs. Richardson of Derby, with annotations by Dr. Challoner, which bears on the title page Dr. Wiseman's approval, dated from Birmingham, January, 1847, and "published with approbation."

The persons in authority, feeling how imperfect is the present Roman Catholic edition, and admiring the fullness and completeness of our authorised translation, in addition to the several emendations and corrections in the text embodied in the present Romish edition, as shown by your articles, have, in the notes, suggested still farther emendations and corrections. They have placed their corrections in foot-notes, and, doubtless, in a very short time, we shall see these, also, incorporated in the text, when they are held enough to publish another new edition.

The following are a few of the proposed emendations set out in the foot-notes of the Roman Catholic Bible now in use; and, to limit my remarks, I will take the New Testament alone.

It will be observed that, in most instances, the Romish version conveys no meaning, which is to be explained by the foot-notes which foot-notes, actually borrow, in most instances, the exact words, and always the sense conveyed, by our authorized version.

In the following arrangement I place the Roman Catholic version first, then the foot-note, and, lastly, the Authorized version.

R. C. standing for the first, N. for the note to the Romish version, and P. for the Protestant or Authorized version.

Such, then, are some of the proposed emendations borrowed from our Authorised version, the so-called "Devil's Book"!

Allow me to add one more remark.

Mr. Ward, in his "Errata," you inform us, "complains loudly of the heresy of the Protestant Bible, in translating the Greek word εκκλησια, congregation instead of Church," you might have added to your well directed arguments that the same word is rendered "society" in their own translation in Acts ii., 47. Roman Catholics can know a very little of their own Bible, otherwise they would not make such blunders, when they undertake to censure Protestants.

I am, Sir,
Your most obedient servant,
C. H. COLLETTE.

THE PASSOVER AND THE EUCHARIST.

THE doctrine of the Eucharist forms such a prominent subject of controversy between the Churches of Rome and England, that, although it has been frequently discussed in our pages, yet we deem it needless to make any apology for bringing it again under the notice of our readers. The point which we are now about to discuss is one which is not generally adverted to, and Roman Catholic divines especially have, for the most part, omitted all mention of it. We hope, nevertheless, to show that it is not undeserving the careful consideration of all who value Scripture truth, and are anxious to learn all that the Bible makes known to us upon this important subject.

The Council of Trent, as most of our readers are aware, delivered the doctrine of the Roman Catholic Church, respecting the Eucharist, in eleven canons, which were passed in the thirteenth session of the Council. The first of these canons is as follows:—

"Whosoever shall deny that in the most holy sacrament of the Eucharist, there are truly, really, and substantially contained the body and the blood of our Lord Jesus Christ, together with his soul and divinity, and, consequently, Christ entire; but shall affirm that he is present therein only in a sign or figure, let him be accursed."

Again, the third canon of the 22nd session of the same council, respecting the sacrifice of the mass, runs as follows:—

"If any one shall say that the mass is only a service of praise and thanksgiving, or a bare commemoration of the sacrifice made on the cross, and not a true propitiatory offering; or that it only benefits him who receives it, and ought not to be offered for the living and the dead, for sins, punishments, satisfactions, and other necessities, let him be accursed."

From these canons, it is abundantly clear that the Church of Rome holds that the wine in the Eucharist is changed into the real, actual blood of our Blessed Lord; and that, in the sacrament, this blood is offered up to God as a real propitiatory sacrifice, to make atonement for the sins of the living and the dead.

The Church of Rome declares further, in the second canon of the 22nd session of the same council, that our Lord, by the words—"Do this for a commemoration of me," appointed his apostles priests, to offer his body and blood. And we learn from the Acts of the Apostles that, shortly after our Lord's ascension, it was the custom of the Apostles, with the other converted Jews, to "break bread from house to house" daily—that is, to observe a daily celebration of this sacrament.

The question, then, naturally arises, did the Apostles and the Jewish converts really believe that the wine of which they partook in the Eucharist was really and actually the blood of our Blessed Lord? If they did, the controversy is, of course, settled; for, in a doctrine of such importance, all true Christians are bound to follow the inspired teachers whom Christ appointed to establish his Church in the world.

But did the apostles believe this? The Council of Trent must have supposed that they did; for if St. Peter and the other apostles believed that, in the Eucharist, they partook of wine and not of blood, the venerable Fathers who composed the council would scarcely have been so uncharitable as to utter a sweeping anathema against them. This is the point, however, on which we beg leave to entertain very serious doubts, and our reasons for doing so are as follows:—

One of the laws given by God to the Israelites in the wilderness, is contained in the following passage of Leviticus (Lev. xvii. 10, 11, 12, Douay version):—

"If any man whosoever of the house of Israel, and of the strangers that sojourn among them, eat blood, I will set my face against his soul, and will cut him off from among his people. Because the life of the flesh is in the blood, and I have given it to you, that you may make atonement with it upon the altar for your souls, and the blood may be for an expiation of the soul. Therefore, I have said to the children of Israel, no soul of you, nor of the strangers that sojourn among you, shall eat blood."

This injunction is given in such solemn words, and fenced in by such appalling sanctions, that it is scarcely possible to conceive a religious Israelite wilfully violating it. Not only were the whole people, Jews as well as Gentile proselytes, forbidden to eat blood, but the reason is expressly added by the Divine lawgiver—"Because it is the blood that maketh an atonement for the soul." It was the very fact of the mysterious but necessary connection between the shedding of blood and the remission of sins, which is assigned as the reason for this law. All use of blood was forbidden, but more especially were the Jews prohibited from eating blood which was offered up upon the altar, to make an atonement for the souls of the people. The blood of atonement was consecrated by the special command of God, to the one solemn office of making reconciliation between God and man, and the Almighty saw fit, in consequence, to prohibit the Israelites, under the most solemn sanctions, from eating any manner of blood (כלרם).

It is scarcely possible to conceive that the Apostles, who must have frequently heard this law read to them in the ordinary services of the Synagogue, must not have been struck by the contradiction between it and the words used by our Lord in the institution of the Eucharist, when taken in their bare, literal imports. We read in St. Matthew's Gospel (xxvi. 27) that, "taking the chalice, he gave thanks and gave to them saying, drink ye all of this, for this is my blood of the New Testament which is shed (ἐκχυνόμενον) for many, unto remission of sins." Let us suppose that the doctrine of transubstantiation is true, and that the apostles actually believed that the wine in the cup which was given to them by their Divine Master was really and truly his blood, identical in substance with the blood which then ran in his veins, must not Christ's command to them to drink this blood have appeared absolutely contradictory to the Mosaic law—a law, be it remembered, which, as our Lord himself informs the Jews, he came "not to destroy but to fulfil"—Matt. v. 17. That law, as we have seen declared—"I will set my face against the man that eateth blood, and will cut him off from among his people, for it is the blood that maketh an atonement for the soul." Our Blessed Lord said to his apostles, when giving them the cup—"Drink ye all of this; for this is my blood which is shed for many for the remission of sins." The very same reason is assigned for the prohibition of blood in the Old Testament, and for the use of the Eucharistic cup in the New—namely, the connection between blood and the remission of sins. If the doctrine of transubstantiation be true—if the actual, corporeal blood of Christ is drank in the Lord's Supper—it seems plain that the very same action—namely, the use of blood—is, at one time, forbidden by God, and at another time commanded, and that the same identical reason is stated both for the prohibition and the commandment. This would be thought strange conduct in any human legislator—how much more so in him "with whom there is no variableness, neither shadow of turning"—Jam. i. 17. Who is "the same yesterday, to-day and for ever"—Heb. xiii. 8. And further, is it reasonable to suppose that if the Eucharistic cup really and actually contained blood, and if the apostles believed that it contained it, they would have all drank it, in express defiance of one of the plainest and most solemn prohibitions of the Mosaic law?

The evangelists, however, do not seem to have been at all aware that there was any difficulty in the case. When our Lord, after using the words we have cited above, gave the cup to them, we do not find that they made the slightest objection or remonstrance. St. Mark simply states, "they all drank of it," and adds no further comment. Now this unhesitating compliance of the apostles with a command which sounded like a plain violation of the Mosaic law, seems explicable only in one or other of two ways, either the apostles did not believe that the cup really contained the actual, corporeal blood of Christ—in which case, of course, they might freely partake of it without any violation of the law—or, if they believed that the miracle of transubstantiation had really taken place, and that the wine was physically converted into the blood of Christ, they may have conceived, nevertheless, that they might drink of it without sin, because they had our Lord's express authority and command. Let us inquire into the probability of this latter view of the case.

We have before cited the remarkable words in which our Lord expressly disclaimed the intention of annulling or setting aside the Mosaic law. "Do not think," said he, "that I am come to destroy the law or the prophets. I am not come to destroy, but to fulfil. For verily I say unto you, till heaven and earth pass, one jot or one tittle shall not pass of the law till all be fulfilled"—Matt. v., 17, 18. From these words we may judge how very improbable it was that Christ would dispense with one of the weightiest commands of that law, by enjoining his apostles to partake of blood—blood shed for the remission of sins—and, therefore, expressly prohibited for that very reason by God himself. But granting, for the sake of argument, that our Lord did give this command, the difficulty still remains, that all the Apostles, who had such intense reverence for the Mosaic law, seem to have complied with this open violation of the law, without the least word of remark or inquiry. St. Peter, who was forward enough with his remonstrances on other occasions, is now as silent as his companions. Did he believe that the law might be safely disregarded in virtue of Christ's command? No; for his conduct, on a later occasion, remarkably proves his deep unwillingness to break through one of the common precepts of the ceremonial law, even when ordered to do so by the voice of God himself. The occurrence to which we refer is related, at length, in the 10th chapter of the Acts. St. Peter, we are told, saw, in a vision, a sheet let down from heaven, wherein were beasts of various kinds; and there came a voice to him—"Rise, Peter, kill and eat." But Peter said—"Not so, Lord, for I have never eaten anything that is common or unclean." Thrice, we are told, the vision was repeated—thrice the Divine command came to him, and thrice he refused to comply with what seemed to him a violation of the law—a law, which, he asserts that he had never broken, by eating anything that was common or unclean.

Our readers may now judge for themselves in what light St. Peter and the other Apostles must have viewed our Lord's words, used at the institution of the eucharist. If they believed him to assert that the cup actually contained his own real, corporeal, physical blood, and that this was what he drank himself, and commanded them to drink likewise, then we do not hesitate to assert that their silent and unresisting compliance appears not only unaccountable in itself, but is contradicted by the recorded behaviour of one of the chief of the Apostles, under circumstances of a much simpler kind—where the command came directly from God, and involved a much more trifling infringement of the Mosaic law.

If, on the other hand, the disciples interpreted our Lord's words in accordance with the well-known custom of the paschal feast, which they had just celebrated, then the whole narrative becomes plain and easy. In that feast, we are told, the Jews, while partaking of the unleavened bread, which they were commanded to eat, used to say the following words—"This is the bread of affliction (לחמא דעניא) which our fathers ate in the land of Egypt."* Of course they did not think it was the self-same bread which their fathers ate in Egypt, but it resembled it, and was a representation of it. So, in like manner, when our Lord used the words, "this is my blood of the New Testament," the Apostles might naturally conclude him to mean, that the wine in the cup was a symbol or representation of his blood—an interpretation which would be confirmed by the fact that, in the very same sentence, after consecration, he called it "the fruit of the vine." Compare Matt. xxvi., 26, 28, 29.) If so, his command to them to drink it would plainly involve no violation of the Mosaic law and would naturally call forth no remark or remonstrance from them. The whole narrative becomes plain and consistent; no fundamental precept of the law is violated, and the Old and New Testaments are in perfect harmony. If, however, the dogma of transubstantiation be true, then the whole becomes nearly inexplicable. Our, Lord, without one word of explanation, gives a command to his Apostles to violate the law forbidding the use of blood, a law which was first given to Noah (Gen. ix. 4), which was re-enacted by Moses (Lev. xvii. 10), and, what is stranger still, was afterwards prescribed by these same Apostles to all the Gentile converts (Acts xv. 29)! The Apostles immediately, without one word of remonstrance, comply with this command, and perform an action which was forbidden under the most awful penalty in the law of Moses; and yet, at a later period, one of these very Apostles refuses to break this law in a much smaller matter, even in obedience to God's express desire. We do not say that it is impossible that all this can be true: but we certainly do affirm that the above considerations appear to us to add greatly to the other difficulties which are involved in the belief of transubstantiation.

DIALOGUE ON THE CONSTRAINED CELIBACY OF THE CHURCH OF ROME.

NO. III.

Eustachio.—You have asserted very freely that the law of celibacy, imposed upon our clergy by the Church, is a new law: you have said, moreover, that it was your intention to bring forth more ample proofs of this than those which you have already adduced. I release you from this trouble, however, since, if you will listen to what I am about to say, you will be convinced that it is impossible to introduce into the Church of Rome new doctrines or new laws. If any one should attempt to introduce any novelty into a church, which sets up to be the chief, as well as the most ancient, and to have descended by a lawful chain of successors from Jesus Christ himself, all Christendom would be grieved at it; all her doctors would strongly oppose it (at least all those who were not the inventors of the novelty); it would be resisted by councils, and the learned would immediately take pen in hand, to write against the innovator. Now, if the law against the marriage of the clergy is new, as you maintain, in what manner was it established in the Church? Why have the priests, the friars, the nuns, and, and, in fact, all the ecclesiastical orders accepted it? Why have not the councils maintained the primitive practice, supporting it, as they ought to have done, by strong arguments?

Salviano.—There are many things, my dear friend, which, in spite of bishops, princes, councils, and all who have opposed them, have been, nevertheless, established in the Church of Rome. Truly many learned persons have opposed the new law of celibacy, as well as various councils, some sovereigns, and many subjects of the first rank, both ecclesiastics and secular persons. I might present you with a host of writers who, from age to age, have loudly exclaimed against the new law, and have stoutly contended for the liberty granted them by Christ. In fact, Isidore, William Durandus, Alderigo Bishop of Agusta, bearing the title of saint, as well as the whole of the Greek Church, manfully opposed all who tried to deprive them of it. This latter Church would never consent to be subject to the Roman Church. Thence it is that the Greek ecclesiastics contract marriage, according to the law of Justinian, of the year 530—(In autent. de sanctiss. coll. 9). Cardinal Bellarmine writes to this effect—"The Roman Church does not approve of it, believing it to be an abuse. She grants it, however, to the Greeks, with whom peace would easily be made if they held no other error." We are fully convinced of this. It is a small thing, in fact, whether the Greek clergy marry or not; Rome would easily make peace with them, provided they did not impugn the authority and the supremacy of the Roman Pontiff. The Greek Church directs this question to the Latin Church—"Who gave you authority to forbid the marriage of the clergy?" Why does not Rome answer her? Why does she not justify herself? Let the Latin Church answer for once, but let her bring forth convincing arguments in reply. Who gave her authority to forbid things granted by God—to forbid marriage to ecclesiastics, whilst it has been granted to them from heaven?

Eustachio—I cannot deny that your arguments are very weighty, nor do I know how the Church of Rome can answer them. He who does not see the truth of these reasons is blind; he who does not yield to their force is obstinate indeed. We must either admit that men are wiser than God, or we must pronounce them rash, when they enact laws in opposition to his. To say that a man can make ordinances contrary to the ordinances of God—to say that the Pope, who is but a man, can make and unmake the Divine law—to call vice virtue, and virtue vice—these are abominable axioms, but such wares are not worth much in our days.

Salviano.—The law of celibacy, impugned by us, was promulgated and observed in the diocese of Rome many ages before it was enforced in many other dioceses. Mention is made of a letter of Pope Siricius to Imerius, by which he forbids marriage to the clergy, saying—"They who live in the flesh cannot please God" (In Tomo 1 Concil., p. 74); as if living in the state of matrimony was the same thing as living in the flesh; as if the most glorious saints of the Old and New Testament had been displeasing to God. It is true, however, that many learned men consider this letter to be a forgery. Another Pope—viz., Innocent the Second—puts marriage in the list of uncleannesses—Canone decernimus, distinct 28. And St. Gregory, the first Pope of this name, desired that he who suffered from the stings of the flesh, to the danger of his eternal salvation, should have recourse to marriage.—(Conjugii portum petant., De Cura Past., part 3., cap. 30). Six thousand heads of young infants, that were taken out of a fish-pond, having been brought to this saint, he was horrified at the sight, and acknowledged that the forbidding of marriage to the clergy was the cause of such barbarous butchery. Then sighing, he exclamed—"Oh, it is better to marry than to burn." "It is better to marry than to give occasion to such black crimes."—(Vide Balœi. Act. Pont. Rom., p. 46. Francof, 1567). This fact, so lamentable, was also related, by St. Ulrick, to Pope Nicholas.—(In Catol. Test. Ver., lib. 9). These things happened exactly at that time in which the Popes were trying to bind the prohibition of marriage upon other Churches; and those who were of this party pretended that they had St. Gregory on their side, but St. Ulrick proves the contrary, asserting plainly that St. Gregory did not belong to their sect—"I smile," said he, "at their rashness, and I weep for their ignorance."

Eustachio.—In truth I do not know how they were able, in process of time, to enforce that law. Pray tell me by what means they obliged Christendom to yield to it. I know that the Bishop of Tarragona, in writing from Spain to Siricius, Bishop of Rome, acquainted him with the resistance of the bishops there against the law of celibacy.

Salviano.—That resistance was still stronger in England and in Germany. I would never come to an end if I were to tell you of all the tricks by which the Bishops of Rome tried to force celibacy upon the clergy on the other side of the Alps, and of all the difficulties which they met with in the attempt; what, in fact, was left undone in the eighth century to induce the English clergy to abstain from marriage, and to oblige those who had already married to separate from their wives. How many miracles were invented; how many deceptions were used to make this holy state odious, and to render the married clergy hateful to the people. Amongst other things a paper was produced, upon which were drawn out twelve articles against the marriage of the clergy; and in order that these articles should have greater authority, it was declared that this paper had been brought there by the Angel Gabriel. Images were even made to speak. In the year 975 those ministers who would not separate from their wives being deposed, and some time after being about to be re-established in their parishes by a majority of votes, a voice was heard to cry out—"The opinion of those who are in favour of the priests is not sound." As the people were given to understand that this voice had proceeded from an image which was set up there, the poor priests lost their cause, and were driven out of the Church in consequence, by King Canute, and were afterwards expelled from the College of Oxford, by King Edward. These things happened, as Polydore Virgil relates, about the year 1020—Lib. 6, Hist. Angl. In the year 1097, William gave leave anew to the clergy to marry, which King Henry also did about the year 1120. The Archbishop of Canterbury, however, opposed King William, and in a synod, held at London, in the year 1102, forced celibacy on the clergy. But a short time afterwards an abominable vice, which we dare not name, having been introduced amongst the clergy, strong complaints were made about it to the Archbishop himself; and he not being able to find any remedy for it, since he neglected that prescribed by God, could do nothing further than to make it known to the Roman Pontiff. The Pope sent John, a cardinal, into England, who, in another synod, held in London, in the year 1125, forbade marriage again to the clergy. This did not occur, however, without an evident scourge from God, for the said prelate was, on the following night, caught in bed with a harlot, and taken. King Henry having then, as we have already stated, granted marriage anew to the clergy, the Roman Pontiff sent there Albert of Ostia, who put the finishing stroke to the work, by forbidding marriage altogether to the English clergy, as it came to pass, in fact, in the year 1138. Balacus cent. 3, cap 10. There were, notwithstanding, in England, after that, many clergy, most celebrated for piety and learning, who lived in the holy state of matrimony, and begot children for their country and for the Lord. In Ireland also, up to the year 1130, many married bishops were to be found, as St. Bernard attests, in his life of Malachy.

Eust.—Truly, all that is very surprising. Tell me now how things went on in Germany. The Germans would not easily have parted with that liberty which they had already possessed for so many years, but, doubtless, the French may have less stoutly resisted the new law.

Salv.—The practice of this new tradition did not succeed more easily either in Germany or in France. Geolibo, Bishop of Magonza, was son of Gerald, who had been bishop of the same diocese—Avent. lib. 3, p. 294. That took place in the eighth century. Paschal, Bishop of Coira, about the year 760, had his lawful wife called—"Antistites et episcopa Curiensis." And traces of this are still to be seen upon her tomb. In the year 1075, the priests of Germany had their wives, as Aventinus asserts. Lib. 5, p. 579. Whilst the priests of Italy had, for a long series of years, been deprived of wives, the clergy of Germany and of France were married; and about the year 1090, there might be reckoned up as many as twenty-four bishopricks, in which all the clergy, from the highest to the lowest grade, were married.

Eust.—Who succeeded finally in bringing them to obey so severe a law? And how did it happen that all these vast countries were not thrown into confusion by the execution of such a law, since, indeed, it is a hard thing to allow one's self to be deprived by men of that which was granted by God?

Salviano—The Nicolaitans, the Callistians, and others had already desired that the clergy should live in celibacy; but the man who laboured indefatigably in this work was Gregory VII., who, having acted as Pope before he was so actually, succeeded thus in causing to be promulgated some vigorous laws against the marriage of the clergy. But, as soon as he had mounted the Papal throne, he left no means untried to carry out his object, launching from the Vatican the thunders of excommunications, interdicts, and a thousand other jugglerics of the Papal forge. After him Pope Paschal II. did the same thing. "It was then," as Aventinus relates (lib. 5, p. 452), "that a most fierce sedition broke out. The parish priests were against the Pope; the people against the priests; and the profane were cruelly exasperated against the clergy. . . . The married priests were despised to such a degree that they burned their tithes, threw into the dirt the Host consecrated by them, and trampled it under foot (a wondrous monument of Catholic respect for their beloved transubstantiation), as they said that those priests who had wives could not consecrate. . . . There were some, however, who cursed Hildebrand, saying from the pulpits, that whilst he dared to bear the titles of Vicar of Christ and God upon earth, he made a Babylon of the church, and carried on the work of Antichrist in the temple of God. They went on to say, this man by asserting that he is infallible covers his ambition, forges fables, corrupts annals, falsifies oracles, adulterates the Divine Scriptures, making them favourable to his lust. Others also said, the law of Hildebrand can only be agreeable to fornicators, since they, instead of one lawful wife, may take to themselves 600 concubines. Isfeldese subjoined—"The clergy of Germany exclaimed that the Pope was a heretic and of unsound doctrine, for that having forgotten the words of Jesus Christ—"All cannot receive this saying;" and those of the apostle, "It is better to marry than to burn"—he strove to oblige men by force to live, as if they were angels; and, whilst he forbade them to follow the course of nature, he opened wide the road to fornication and uncleanness. Firm in their opinion, they chose rather to give up the priesthood than to put away their dear wives, and said that they would watch to see if the Pope (in whose sight the married were unclean) would find angels to govern the Church of God.

In the year 1075, Gregory VII. sent the Bishop of Coira to Magonza, with an express order to force all the priests of that diocese either to renounce their wives or the priesthood. The Bishop of Magonza assembled a synod in the month of October, in which, when he wished to promulgate the prohibition of marriage which he had received, he found such a resistance among the clergy that he was obliged to give it up. Nay, these priests were so exasperated that they threatened to take away his life. All that I have said, and even more, is certified by Isfeldese and Nauclerus. In the year 1076, at the time of Pentecost, a council was held in Vormezia, at which the Bishops of France and Germany assembled; and as Gregory VII. had excommunicated the Emperor, so the council deposed the Pope, who was accused and convicted of various crimes. Amongst the other wickednesses for which he was condemned were these, that he separated husbands from their wives; that he preferred harlots and concubines to chaste spouses, and adulteries and incests to holy matrimony—(Avent. lib. 5, p. 570). Even the Bishops of Italy, to the number of eight, having assembled in the Canton of Ticino, subscribed to the decree of this council, though, to say the truth, these, and many others were not stedfast, as they were too much in dread of the wrath of Hildebrand.

BY HIS EMINENCE CARDINAL WISEMAN.

Cardinal Wiseman having, in the manner stated in our last number, endeavoured to establish the complete dependence of the Holy Scriptures for vitality, authenticity, and inspiration upon the authority of his Church, proceeds to explain the threefold grounds upon which she refuses to give the Bible indifferently to all.

First, he says, the Church will not give the Word of God indiscriminately to all, because God himself has not done so. He has not made reading an essential part of man's constitution, nor a congenital faculty, nor a term of salvation, nor a condition of Christianity, but he has made hearing so; for he tells us that, "faith cometh from hearing, and hearing from the Word of God." He did not give the world the means of multiplying books, by machinery, till after his Church had flourished for fourteen hundred years, and had bred thousands of martyrs, educated hundreds of doctors and learned men, trained myriads of holy religious to perfection, sent millions of believers to the heavenly Jerusalem, converted nations, planted churches, &c., &c.; and it is asked, if no Providence watched over the Church while she achieved all this? God did not give his Apostles a precept to write, a code to be written, a liturgy or a prayer to be recorded: and this branch of the subject concludes by saying that, if the first persecutors, who hunted inexorably after the Scriptures, had succeeded in destroying them, or if any portion of them had been lost, still the Church, and the faith once delivered to the saints, must have remained complete; because the Holy Spirit, who indited the precious page, would still continue to preserve its substance unimpaired—"For independent of, and anterior to, all written word, was the promise that he should teach the Church all truth."

How many curious reflections are suggested by this argument! That "reading is not an essential part of man's constitution" is a curious reason to offer to the "Catholics" of the nineteenth century for restricting the use of the Bible! and in placing in opposition to this, the text that "faith cometh from hearing, and hearing from the Word of God," Cardinal Wiseman forgets, for a moment, that there was then a "written Word of God." He puts the narrowest construction upon the word "hearing," which frequently, in Scripture, bears a much wider sense than merely listening with the ear. Thus God is spoken of as "hearing" in the sense of attending to prayer. Abraham, in the parable, says, "they have Moses and the prophets, let them hear them;" and, "if they hear not Moses and the prophets neither will they believe if one rise again from the dead" (Luke xvi. 29, 31), showing, plainly that it was the belief of Moses and the prophets (who, by the way, being then dead, could only be learned through their writings), and not merely hearing them with the ear that was meant by the word "hearing." We might ask, why the Apostles wrote at all if they were not inspired to do so, and if it was not in obedience to the Divine command to "Preach (the word implies to proclaim or publish, not merely to preach orally) the Gospel to every creature?" We might, also, refer to the express command to St. John to write his vision in the Apocalypse, and point to the injunction to abstain from writing a particular part of it, showing the Divine superintendence over the work in which he was engaged. Again, we might bring forward what Cardinal Wiseman himself loves to dwell upon, the analogy between the Old and New Testament dispensations, where the people were first brought out by signs and wonders, the law was then delivered orally, and, afterwards, the Scriptures were written, the use or the interpretation of which would appear to have been by no means confined to the Priests. But, supposing there were any weight in this argument, founded upon the difference between the reading and the hearing of the word, or upon the time that elapsed before it was written, or before printing was invented, it would appear to tell much better if the Church had not adopted the Scriptures as inspired, and if the argument had been directed against such adoption. We could understand the argument, however untenable it might be, "These Scriptures have been written without authority; 'faith cometh only by hearing,' and as the Spirit promised to lead us into all truth before they were written, we will reject them as part of the means of fulfilment of that promise." But we confess that it still appears quite unexplained to our minds how the mere time at which the writing or the printing of the Word was vouchsafed by God to the world can affect the question, not of its reception into the canon of the Church, but of the number of persons who shall be permitted to read it. We cannot help suspecting that if it had been delivered in writing, in the first instance, the Church of Rome, finding the free use of it injurious to her claim to universal authority, would find some other excuse for restricting its circulation.

But the Cardinal proceeds to his second reason.

Secondly, the Church does not permit the indiscriminate use of the Bible, because God has not given her the "instinct to do so." As he has neither furnished her with the means, nor with the command, "so he has not instilled into her that spontaneous impulse that guides her to new duties, in favour of this mode of propagating the faith." He gave her, the Cardinal says, "first, apostles; secondly, prophets; thirdly, doctors;" and the questions, "Are all apostles?" "prophets?" "doctors?" could have been answered negatively till now. It was not communicated to the Church that every one was a doctor, and might become an apostle, which, he asserts, is the result of universal Bible reading, &c. "Men are now deemed fully qualified to teach the heathen, if they have a sufficient supply of Bibles to distribute, in some ludicrous translation, and have themselves learnt sufficient of Bible phraseology to perfect them in cant." God has fixed in the heart of his Church the instinct of unity, &c.; and the argument is wound up thus:—"If, then, we still prize unity, should we not be mad, putting all questions of principle and duty to a revealed system and law aside, to reject what has been its safeguard till now, and try what has been its destruction? For, be it remembered, the Catholic Church is no experimentalist."

The above argument is incapable of being controverted in point of fact. We cannot deny that, so far from the Roman Catholic Church having been endowed with an "instinct" to circulate the Scriptures, she has the common instinct of self-preservation to induce her to shut them up; nor can we doubt what the Cardinal candidly avows, that no sacrifice is too great, even to the withholding of God's word, in order to preserve and maintain that external, formal, nominal unity, on which the safety of his Church depends, and whose aim is the universal domination of the priesthood, and the universal subjection of the laity. We by no means wish to dispute that the "indiscriminate reading of the Bible" has been the "destruction" of that kind of unity; that to permit such reading would be "to reject what has been its safeguard;" and that upon this question the "Catholic Church" is not likely ever to become an experimentalist. While we admit these facts for the Cardinal, we must leave it to the judgment of our Roman Catholic readers to estimate their weight as an argument against the free circulation of the Scriptures, and to judge if the surrender of their liberty and their reason to others (to say nothing of the peril of Divine wrath which they must incur if they are in error in rejecting the means of grace within their reach), is not too large a price to pay for the maintenance of that kind of unity, unknown to the early history of Christianity, which implies nothing more than spiritual despotism on the one side, and slavish submission to assumed authority on the other.

The insinuation that "colonies of artizans, with wives and children, all pensioned for the work, under the title of missionaries," are shipped off to convert the heathen, we cannot pass by in silence. This statement must be placed in the same category with other statements of Cardinal Wiseman's on matters of fact. He well knows that at least the Church of England sends forth no missionaries but her own ordained and educated ministers; and if we consider the studious and laborious lives of those men, their devoted piety and zeal, their indomitable courage and perseverance in facing and surmounting apparently unconquerable difficulties—their patient plodding in the learning of languages—their untiring toil in turning that knowledge to the sole purpose of its acquisition—the translation of the Scriptures—the ingenious devices—the application of a syllabic alphabet to the language of the Cree Indians, unmanageable with our orthography—the invention for the Chinese of a simple written language, in lieu of one so difficult as to be beyond the reach of foreigners, and hardly capable of being acquired by natives—and then, when we reflect upon the self-sacrifices, the disinterestedness of those men, and the wonderful success of their labours, we have no fear that any but the wilfully blind and ignorant can be misled into the belief that this "noble army" is composed of men "uneducated, unspiritual, unqualified for the work."

But the Cardinal says—

Thirdly, that the Roman Catholic Church "cannot, and must not, adopt the Protestant course, because we have no reason to admire its fruits or its expectations. We see no motive to be satisfied with the reckless experiment which others are trying, we do not see morals improving or crime diminishing, but the contrary. We see dogma after dogma disappearing; baptismal regeneration is gone; the Eucharist is scarcely believed in; even the Divinity of our Lord is faintly held to, and that generally obscured by Nestorianism or some other ancient heresy. No one can dream that faith in these great truths will revive through the diffusion of Bible reading," &c.

We have before observed, that to attribute an increase of immorality or crime to the reading of Scripture is mere assumption, unsupported by proof. When a portion of Christendom shook off the yoke of the Roman Church, and freed itself from the inquisition, and all those severe temporal punishments by which that Church maintained her authority, we know of no substitute that could have withheld the seceders from the depths of vice and sin, but the gentle, yet all-powerful, sway of the Gospel. Experience proves, in direct opposition to Cardinal Wiseman's assertions, that in Germany, Switzerland, and elsewhere, civilization, in the Protestant districts, is in advance of that in the Roman Catholic. We may add our own observation, that among Protestants of the Church of England, the parish or district where the Gospel is most diligently read and most faithfully preached is the most distinguished for morality and propriety of conduct, and where it is neglected the opposite effects appear. The alleged rapid disappearance of dogma after dogma is mere exaggeration and assertion, in support of which no facts are cited. That a difference of opinion has occasionally arisen respecting the sense in which the Church of England uses the term "regenerate," in her baptismal service is true; but the assertion that "baptismal regeneration is gone" is a misrepresentation founded on a perverted view, both of the point in dispute and of the precise decision in the Gorham case. The doctrine of the Eucharist, as professed by the Church of Rome, is, doubtless, not believed by Protestants, but, so far as the Church of England is concerned, we may venture to say that her doctrine is, and always has been maintained in its integrity, and that, at least upon that subject, there is no schism amongst her members. The Divinity of our Lord is denied by a sect, who may, in one sense, be called Protestants, but who can scarcely be denominated Christians. We can answer for the Church of England, by challenging Cardinal Wiseman to prove the existence, in that church, of any doubt or question upon the subject. We know not to what other "ancient heresies" the Cardinal alludes, but we boldly assert that the doctrine of our Lord's Divinity is as essential a tenet of the Church of England as it is of the Church of Rome, unobscured by Nestorianism or any other heresy, which no one, who has ever read the Articles of the Church of England, could for a moment venture to controvert. Indeed, we only advert to this matter at all to prevent the misapprehension that might arise if we left this undiscriminating assertion of Cardinal Wiseman altogether unnoticed.

THE MARLEYS.

A STORY OF REAL LIFE.

Such of our readers as have been educated in the Roman Catholic religion, and have ventured to read and inquire for themselves into the ground of their faith, and have seen reason to think that the system in which they have been brought up is one not unmixed with error—but yet are deterred by timidity, or prudence, from avowing the real state of their minds on the subject—may, perhaps, take an interest in the narrative that follows.

Many persons, we believe, are disposed to think, that because they are not placed in what are called "independent circumstances in life," it is not to be expected that they should act in an independent manner in matters respecting the concerns of the life that is to come. "It is all very well," say they, "for those who are not engaged in trade or business, and not dependant on others for daily employment; it is all very well for persons in the upper and middle ranks of life, who are born in comparative freedom from the coercion and tyranny that can be brought to bear on us; they may give honest expression to their sentiments, but we, however serious or sincere, dare not do so." Now, we do not think lightly, nor do we mean to make light of the dangers and difficulties of an honest renunciation of error, and we appreciate to the fullest extent the moral fortitude of the individual who boldly and valiantly takes up the cause which he believes to be true, whatever his position in life may be. But we deny, that the trials to which such persons refer as peculiar, are confined to the humbler walks of life, and we would illustrate, by a brief narrative of incidents which are not fictitious, that the difficulties and dangers of free and honest inquiry after truth are not confined to any rank or degree, nor to any age or sex, and that, nevertheless, the path of duty, if boldly and honestly pursued, leads uniformly to a successful and happy result. With this view we introduce to our readers the history of a Roman Catholic family into which truths hitherto unknown made their entrance, and forced their way under circumstances of considerable disadvantage and chequered with difficulties of a nature quite as formidable as any that the terrors of mere physical force, or the tyranny of exclusive dealing, or social separation, can impose on freedom of thought in another sphere of life.

Major Marley was a member of an ancient Roman Catholic family, which had resided for a couple of centuries in the County of W——. He was a man of strong impulses, warm affections, but of a violent and uncontrolled temper. This latter characteristic was, perhaps, to be attributed to the defect of his early education, and from his having started in life, to seek his fortunes at the age of fifteen, with the slender provision of an eighth son, whereby he became the master of his own movements, at a time when judicious training and moral control are most needed. Being an intelligent and spirited youth, he worked his way vigorously through the world, and secured to himself in his latter years a respectable independance, upon which he had retired at the time to which our little narrative relates.

Major Marley was a man of acute observation and strong common sense, and we believe in his inmost heart despised the puerilities and superstitions which he saw practised around him by his humbler fellow-religionists. He was one of that class of which, in our intercourse with respectable Roman Catholics, we have met several instances, who take for granted that their religion comprehends or admits of two different standards of belief—the one intended for the educated and intelligent, the other for the vulgar and credulous. He certainly did, in common with many steadfast Roman Catholic gentlemen whom we could name, laugh at the absurdity of beads and reliques, and ridicule the idea that the prayers of the plump, plethoric parish priest could keep his soul out of Purgatory; and he repudiated the invocation of saints and angels as more than unnecessary. When, with military frankness and freedom, he would canvass such topics with Father Paul O'Reilly, the parish priest, his reverence would comfortably assure him, that such as he were not called on to do or to believe all these things; that many of them were the vulgar notions of the lower orders of Roman Catholics, and for which the Church was in no way responsible.

Major Marley having, as we have said, very little confidence in the remission of sins at the hands of Father O'Reilly, was, for this reason, perhaps, somewhat negligent in his attendance at confession; and, though most strict in enforcing the discipline of his Church upon every other member of his family, the old gentleman himself was rather regardless of fasts and penances, and such like observances: indeed, his Bishop had provided him with the convenient dispensation so readily given to a weak stomach, when accompanied by a strong will; and the discipline of fishes and slops on Fridays was considerately spared to a delicate gentleman, who never had a pain or an ache till a week before his death, which overtook him in the eightieth year of a life spent, nearly to the last, in the full vigour of health and strength.

But, perhaps, the most decided of the Major's irregularities was in respect of the Sacrament of the Eucharist. He used, rather freely—and perhaps irreverently—to tell his pastor that he felt it to be impossible to believe that the wafer which Father Paul gave him to eat was the flesh and blood of the Saviour.

The good father would debate the subject with his presumptuous and independent parishioner to the best of his ability: he would bring forward every argument and text which he had been taught at Maynooth; but finding his disciple invincible, instead of excommunicating him with bell, book, and candle-light, and pouring upon him the vials of his wrath and the anathema of heresy and schism, he gently sought to conciliate his friendship and satisfy his reason by assuring him, that surely, at all events, he spiritually eat and drank the body and blood of Christ in the worthy reception of the Sacrament of the Holy Eucharist. Good Protestant doctrine was thus conceded to the contentious Major, so long as he outwardly conformed to the communion of the Holy Roman Catholic Church. Major Marley was a man too shrewd to be put off with shallow sophistries, and he was too wealthy and influential in the parish to be lightly offended and driven into Protestantism. If a new chapel was to be built, or the priest's house to be enlarged, or the orphans' school to be maintained, the foremost and most liberal man in the parish to contribute was Major Marley. So that his assistance was too large, his example too influential, and his character too much respected to be sacrificed for such small irregularities as his notions about the Eucharist, or penance, or Purgatory, fasting or fish; and, accordingly, the wide indulgences of this most accommodating church were enlarged just to the letter of his requirements. Any indulgence that he demanded was freely conceded—any omission of which he was guilty was gently passed over, so long as the scandal of public disaffection was avoided. Had he indecently gone to church, or publicly taken to reading the Bible for his family, the thunders of Rome would soon have been rattling around his ears in a terrible clatter; but as he only expressed his doubts and indulged his cavillings in the presence of the orthodox Roman Catholic father, it was more conducive to the interests of the Holy Mother, the Church, to permit him to have his little sneer at Purgatory, and to disregard the fasts, and absent himself from confession and the Sacrament of the Eucharist, than to incur the risk of estranging a useful member from the communion of the faithful. And here we cannot but admire the wonderful flexibility of a system which is, in a certain sense, "all things to all men," which adapts itself to every phase of human life and character, and accommodates itself to every eccentricity and perversity of human nature—which has a scale of faith suitable to every natural intellect, from the most sceptical and fine-drawn to the most credulous and superstitious.

Father O'Reilly knew his man. Major Marley, though he took leave to think for himself, and to doubt and to cavil at anything that did not commend itself to his own plain, downright, common sense, was, nevertheless, one of the strictest disciplinarians in the world, as to the religious conduct of the members of his household. His pride of family and early associations would have revolted at the least semblance of apostasy with horror. To turn his back upon the religion of his ancestors was, in his mind, as disgraceful as to desert his colours on the field of battle, and go over to the enemy of his king and country. Protestantism was nothing short of open rebellion against the good old Church, which, whatever might be its faults and failings, still he considered to be the old Church. At all events it was the Church in which he and his great grandfathers had been born and bred, and, therefore, to it he was a staunch, unswerving adherent, and however he might argue with Father O'Reilly, or with Archbishop M—— himself, no other person dared to impugn its doctrines or its discipline in his presence.

At the time we speak of, Major Marley's family consisted of his wife—a mild, amiable lady—and three unmarried daughters, and from them he exacted a rigid observance of every fast and feast, and a strict attendance upon every ordinance and ceremony of the Church.

The major was himself declining in years, though not in strength. Mrs. Marley was still in the prime of life, being many years younger than her husband. Marcella, their eldest daughter, was a strict and devoted Roman Catholic, and had most conscientiously endeavoured to instil the principles in which she believed into the minds of her younger sisters, Edith and Adeline. They were her juniors by many years, and were then just entering into life in the happy, buoyant period of early womanhood. Edith had just attained her seventeenth year, and was in the full possession of a light heart and gay spirits, upon which care sat lightly, and to which everything furnished a source of enjoyment. Adeline, though younger in years, was more sedate and serious in manner, and grave and reflective in disposition. Indeed, the gay and mirthful Edith formed a striking contrast to the sober and demure Adeline; but this diversity of disposition formed no hindrance to the entire union of heart and devotedness of mutual affection between sisters who had played together in happy childhood, wandered over the same meadows in innocent pursuit of gaudy butterflies and wild flowers, which they seemed loth to disturb.

Hollywood, where their childhood and early years had been spent, was a sweet, romantic spot, to which nature and art had contributed every possible adornment. The gardens and plantations, which surrounded the old house, were of singular beauty, and formed a paradise of flowers and shrubs, where everything luxuriated, and opened out its choicest colours and fragrance. Such a place was suited to develop a sentiment of romance in the youthful mind; but, truth to say, neither Edith nor Adeline possessed a superfluity of sentimentality, in the modern sense of the term. Deep in feeling to an intensity, and warm and affectionate in disposition, either might be said to be deficient in the romance of the novel-reading school. Edith was a great admirer of poetry, and could recite the finest passages from the best authors, and her disposition was light and gay, and exuberantly joyous; still her mind was eminently of a practical turn. Adeline, on the other hand, was more disposed to explore the recondite secrets of philosophy and art, and rarely ventured into the regions of poetry or fiction. Although both sisters were deeply imbued with a religious feeling, all the sentimentality of the family had devolved upon Marcella. She could poetize for an hour upon a moonbeam, and people the deserted Abbey of Hollywood, which adjoined the grounds of the old house, with cowled monks and mitred abbots, receiving homage from proud and lordly barons, and spreading their abundant hospitality before their retainers. Wandering through its desolate aisles, she could recall to fancy the times of the supremacy of the Roman Catholic Church, and sigh for its restoration to its pristine pomp and power. The solid columns and graceful arches of the old abbey suggested to her imagination a hierarchy of scholars and gentlemen, and a respected and venerable priesthood, which once trod its sacred pavements, and chaunted their matin and vesper hymns within its consecrated walls, and her mind would become sad at the recollection of the vulgar dialect and clownish mien of Father Paul O'Reilly and his two curates—Father Walsh, who was suspected of being no votary of temperance, and Father Daveren, who was said to have been surprised in reading along the roads, under cover of his Breviary, love songs, more suited to a gay cavalier than a Christian priest. She could not help sometimes exclaiming, "Ichabod, Ichabod; how is the glory departed from Israel?"

To Edith and Adeline the ruins of the old abbey furnished very different topics for reflection, which, if they were less poetical, were more practical. They in their secret hearts had long since begun to doubt many of the legendary doctrines of the Church, of which it is said, to doubt is to disbelieve. The conviction of error had taken possession of the mind of each, and without direct communication or suggestion from the other. It was a secret hid in the innermost recesses of their minds, of so terrible a nature, that it seemed fraught with tremendous consequences. The bare idea of apostasy was invested with such apprehensions, that the first doubt was distrusted as a temptation from the evil one. When the doubt became fixed and immoveable, it was regarded as an awful secret, a dread and terrible mystery, to disclose which might conjure up the foul fiend himself from hell.

It was upon an evening in June, as the summer sun was setting in a flood of light behind the hills, and Edith and Adeline were returning homewards after a protracted walk in the adjoining demesne of Admiral Taylor, they sat down to rest on a portion of the old abbey walls. The sisters were repeating some particulars of their conversation with Emily Taylor, their companion in their walk—a wild, giddy girl—who had, perhaps inadvertently, asked them "Had they ever read the Bible?"

"I wonder (said Adeline) what put it into Emily's head to ask such a question?"

"I am sure I cannot tell (replied Edith), but I observed that you, Adeline, avoided the question, and gave her no answer."

"Then, Edith, I think you were equally slow in giving an answer yourself."

Edith and Adeline were mutually silent for some minutes, until Edith said, in a half confidential but decided manner—"The fact, Adeline, is, I have been for some time reading a Bible, and the more I read it the more inclined and resolved I am to read it through, and examine whether what I hear be in accordance with the Bible or not. St. Paul himself praised the Bereans because they searched the Scriptures from day to day, to see whether what he taught was according to them or not; and if an apostle was not offended at his teaching being examined in that way, I fancy that nobody else has a right to complain if theirs be examined."

"I confess," said Adeline, "I have been looking into a Bible myself. It was given to me by Jane Stewart. I met with such a passage in the Acts of the Apostles, and the text so struck me, that I wondered could it be in any Bible but the Protestant Bible; I scarcely believed that it could: so I asked mamma to lend me the large pictorial Bible out of the book-case, and I compared the passages, and, do you know, they are word for word—the same in both—and I can never get it out of my mind why the priests dislike our reading the Bible so much."

"Well, then, Adeline, as you have been reading the Bible as well as I, I will tell you why, I think, the priests make so much work about letting us see the Bible, and why they say so little about the Bible themselves. I suspect, indeed I am quite sure, there are many things which they tell us that cannot be reconciled with the Bible, and that is just the reason why they forbid it to be read without their authority. For my part, let them say what they please, I will read this Bible, and see how these matters stand; and more than that, I will ask Mr. O'Reilly, the first time I see him, in what part of the Bible we are told to pray to the Virgin Mary, or to saints or angels, for it appears to me to be most expressly forbidden to worship any being but God himself, and prayer is an act of worship the most decided we can well offer."

"But, dearest Edith, take care that he does not find out that we have been reading the Protestant Bible, and bring papa's anger down upon us."

"Oh, as to that, as you and I have kept our secret so long and so well from each other, there is no fear but we can keep it from Mr. O'Reilly."

The sisters returned home more thoughtful than usual, but each relieved of a great load, that oppressed her mind, while charged with a secret which she dared not communicate to the other. The tie of mutual confidence was once more restored, and more strongly confirmed than ever, cemented by a new bond of sympathy. Thenceforth they communicated to each other, from day to day, the subject of their thoughts and the result of their inquiries, and found more and more to be dissatisfied with in their earlier instruction. They soon discovered that the grand fundamental doctrine of the New Testament was justification by faith, in the finished work of Jesus Christ, and that the seeking the assistance of saints and angels, and of the Blessed Virgin Mary, was both unscriptural and dishonouring to God himself.

Some weeks after this, Father Paul O'Reilly was a guest at Hollywood, upon a Sunday, as usual, and Edith determined to get near him at the dinner table; and when she found him in the height of good humour, after partaking plentifully of the good things provided, and her father deep in argument with his son-in-law, Mr. Waring, she said—"Sure, sir, we are not required by our Church to pray to saints or angels; are we?"

Now, Father O'Reilly would rather talk of anything in the world than divinity, especially controversial divinity, and most particularly after dinner. It spoiled his digestion, and disturbed that peaceful serenity which he said Providence had provided as a concomitant on a comfortable dinner. He would talk for ever on the quality and body of the Major's port, and the flavour of his grapes and melons, or the chit-chat of the neighbourhood; but anything bordering upon controversy he detested, and considered a most decided bore. But, constrained, in courtesy, to answer Edith's point-blank question, he said—"What makes you ask such a question as that, my dear?"

"Why, sir," said Edith, "it has occurred to me very often that it is a very questionable thing to do, and I wish to know exactly whether it is commanded by the Church or not."

"Well, my dear, it is not exactly commanded by the Church, but it is commended. The Church is a kind and gentle mother, and does not constrain the faithful on such matters. But you know the blessed saints in glory, around the throne of God, and especially the Blessed Virgin, the Mother of God, must have more influence with him, and are purer and more bold to approach him than any sinful creature like you or me can be; and, therefore, it is well to have their intercession with Jesus to make him favourable to us, and it is only for this that we are to pray to them."

"But surely, sir, Jesus himself has told us whosoever cometh unto me I will in no wise cast out; and if that be so, why need we go to the saints, instead of to the Saviour direct?"

Father Paul replied, rather impatiently, "That it was quite unnecessary to argue the question, as the Church did not command it, but only recommended it."

And after giving this very unsatisfactory solution of the difficulty, he seized upon a passing observation of the Major to escape from divinity to the more congenial topic of boat racing, then on the tapis; the gentlemen discussing a match gotten up under the auspices of Admiral Taylor, Major Marley, and some neighbouring gentlemen, to come off early in the ensuing month.

However, Edith and Adeline were not so easily satisfied as to rest content with Father O'Reilly's explanation. It struck them that it amounted to an admission of connivance and express recommendation of idolatry and creature-worship by those who are so ignorant or superstitious as to practice it, leaving the Church a convenient loop-hole of escape from the charge of error, when confronted with the light of common sense and the plain texts of Scripture.

This set them more and more upon inquiry and diligent examination of the Word of God: with what results we shall state on a future opportunity.

THE TALK OF THE ROAD.—NO. XIV.

"Well, Pat, how is it with you now?" said Jem, when they met next on the road.

"I do'nt know, Jem," said Pat, "I'm down entirely."

"And what are you down for at all," said Jem, "has Father John been at you again?"

"No, Jem, it's not that," said Pat, "it's worse entirely."

"And what's the matter at all?" said Jem.

"Why it's afeard I am that the Bible's setting me astray after all," said Pat.

"And what's the matter at all with the Bible?" said Jem.

"Why it's troubling my mind in me," says Pat. "Sure before I read the Bible, my mind was uneasy enough, not knowing nothing at all; and didn't I think when I'd know the Bible, I'd have no trouble at all; and now my mind is more troubled in me nor ever, and I can't get it quiet at all."

"And what is it that's troubling it at all?" said Jem.

"Why, then, its showing me how wicked I am," said Pat;" and it's showing me how good I ought to be, and how I ought to love God entirely, and do everything in life for the love of God; and, then, it's so hard to love God entirely, and it seems as if my heart couldn't love him at all; and it's telling me to love my enemies, and Father John itself, and it's so hard to do that any way. But it's the badness of my heart entirely that the Bible's showing me, and what will become of me at all if it's so bad? And, then, evermore it's coming into my mind that the Bible is setting me astray."

"Well, Pat," says Jem, "sure you're not that bad; sure you're not worse nor another; sure all the neighbours calls you a decent, quiet, civil boy, and sure you're taken to reading the Bible."

"Well, but it isn't what the neighbours says of me," said Pat; "what does that signify? Isn't it what God says of me, when he looks just straight into my heart? It's that that signifies; and don't I feel entirely that I'm a sinner, and nothing but a sinner? And doesn't the Bible itself say—'The soul that sinneth, the same shall die'—Ezekiel xviii. 4. And isn't that me? And doesn't it say—'The wicked shall be turned into hell;' and don't the Bible show me that I'm wicked, and what will I do at all, at all?"

"Well, Pat," said Jem, "if the Bible isn't agreeing with you, maybe if you just put it away for awhile, you could come back on it again where it wouldn't trouble you so much."

"No, Jem," said Pat, "I can't do that at all. It's taken hold of me, and I can't get shut of it at all; and I wouldn't neither, Jem, for all it's done to me: what would I take to at all? Is it the scapular, or the like of that I'd take to? Or would I take to Father John and his cursing? And sure I can't do without something now. And what can I take to only the Bible? And I'll stick to that, if it kills me; sure I know nothing else can do me any good."

"Well, Pat," said Jem, I'm sure the Bible's good too; but why would it trouble you that way, when it does'nt set me astray?"

"And isn't it as bad for you as for me, Jem," said Pat, "does'nt it make us all out to be as bad as other? Doesn't it say, that 'They are all under sin,' and that every mouth is stopped (Rom. iii. 2, 19), and what will we do if not one of us at all can have one word to say at the great judgment of God?"

"Well, Pat" said Jem, "I did'nt think of it rightly before, and I do'nt know what we'll say at all; only this, if we're all that bad, and all sinners entirely, does'nt God mean to save some of us anyway, by Jesus Christ? Sure your not going to say, that there won't be none at all saved by Jesus Christ? and if we're all sinners, sure some of us sinners will be saved by Christ."

"Well, Jem," said Pat, "that's the only thing that stands to me at all; but, somehow, I don't see how that can be, and that's just what I want to come at."

"I'll tell you how we'll get it," said Jem, "won't we just go down to Mr. Owens, and ask him?"

"Well, I'll try that any way," said Pat, "for if any one can show it to us, he will."

So off they went to Mr. Owens. And when they got into his study, he asked them was there anything they wanted to talk about. So Pat let it all out then, and, said he, "your reverence, the Bible's setting me astray entirely."

And how is that," said Mr. Owens.

"Why, your reverence," said Pat, "It's telling me that I'm a sinner entirely, and that all sinners will be turned into hell, and what will I do at all?"

"Well, that's all right so far," said Mr. Owens, "if the Bible didn't tell you that, it would do you no good at all."

"And how's that, your reverence?" said Pat, for he thought it mighty odd.

"Did you know Jemmy Gougerty?" said Mr. Owens.

"Aye, did I," said Pat, "didn't he die in the fever that came after the praties failed?"

"And what about him?" said Mr. Owens.

"Why, he just went raging mad with the fever," said Pat, "and he said he was quite well, better nor ever he was in his life, and that he didn't want a doctor at all."

"And didn't they send for the doctor?" said Mr. Owens.

"No, indeed," said Pat; "for his wife was dead, the creature, and there was none but the childer with him, and when he said he was quite well, they never thought the doctor was wanting at all."

"And the doctor told me, two days after," said Mr. Owens, "that that was just the case, he could have cured, only he never was sent for at all."

"And what has that to do with me and the Bible, your reverence," said Pat.

"Why just this," said Mr. Owens, "that a man ought to know when he is sick and wants the doctor. Are there not many people that are mad about their souls, and don't know that they want Jesus Christ, the great physician of souls, at all?"

"Well, that's me, sure enough, your reverence," said Pat. "I was mad that way long, long enough; and the more I wanted Jesus Christ, the more I didn't know that I wanted him."

"Well, that's just what I mean," said Mr. Owens. "If the Bible didn't make you feel that you are a sinner, and that you want a Saviour, it would just be doing you no good at all."

"Well, it's done that for me, anyway," said Pat. "But how will I be saved, if I'm a sinner? that's just what I want to know."

"Do you know Mr. Nulty?" said Mr. Owens.

"Well, I do," said Pat, "and many's the day I worked for him, and a good man he is."

"Is he good to the beggars?" said Mr. Owens.

"Well, he's mighty hard to them that chooses to live by begging, and won't work at all," said Pat, "but he's the best man at all to them that works hard, and can't do it. Don't I know Pat Flaherty, that works harder than any man in the parish, and didn't his cow die on him, and he hadn't the rent, and wasn't he processed and decreed for it, and hadn't the gripper a hold of him, to take him off to jail; and didn't Mr. Nulty come for'ad in the court, and just lay down the money for him."

"And did the gripper take him to jail then?" said Mr. Owens.

"How could he," said Pat, "when the debt was paid for him?"

"Well, and if Jesus Christ should pay for your sins," said Mr. Owens, "what have you to fear the gripper of souls?"

"Aye, and is that the way, your reverence," said Pat; "well, I'm seeing it now, sure enough."

"Don't read half the Bible, Pat," said Mr. Owens, "that's a bad way, read it all; and if it makes you see that you are a sinner, and that you want a Saviour, it will make you see, too, that you have a Saviour, that is able and willing to save you. Just listen to this," said Mr. Owens (and he turned to 1 Tim. i. 15, Douay Bible, and he read), "a faithful saying, and worthy of all acceptation, that Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners, of whom I am chief."

"And who was that, that was chief of sinners?" said Pat.

"It was the great Apostle St. Paul himself, that said that of himself," said Mr. Owens.

"And was he a great sinner?" said Pat.

"He calls himself 'chief of sinners,'" said Mr. Owens; "and look what he says here," said Mr. Owens, and he turned to Acts xxvi. 10, 11—'Many of the saints did I shut up in prison . . . . . and I punished them often in every synagogue, and compelled them to blaspheme.'"

"And why did Jesus Christ take him for an apostle if he was that wicked?" said Jem.

"Read the next verse to what we read in the Epistle to Timothy," said Mr. Owens; and he handed the book to Jem (and a Douay Bible it was). So Jem read—"And for this cause have I obtained mercy; that in me first Christ Jesus might show forth all patience, for the information of them that shall believe in him until life everlasting."

"Well," said Pat, "that's good, for there's a pattern that he will save sinners."

"Listen to this," said Mr. Owens, and he read from the Gospel of St. John iii. 16, the words of Christ himself—"'God so loved the world, as to give his only begotten son; that whosoever believeth in him, may not perish, but may have life everlasting.'" And then Mr. Owens went on—"Does not this show you that whatever is wanting to bring you to life everlasting, Jesus Christ is willing to do for you?"

"It does, your reverence, and I'd like to know, what he will do," said Pat.

"If you believe and trust in him," said Mr. Owens, "he will stand up for you at the great day, and say—'I have taken this man's sins upon myself, I have paid for all his sins; and his soul is mine, that I may save it for ever, and won't that do?" said Mr. Owens.

"That's just what I want, your reverence, to make me happy," said Pat.

"Well," said Mr. Owens, "you have read your Bible to some purpose, to see that you want a Saviour; now read your Bible again, to see what that Saviour did for you, and you will find comfort for your soul."

So Pat went home with a hopeful mind that night, and we hope to hear more of his reading yet.

The Catholic Layman.

DUBLIN, JULY, 1853.

We feel it to be our bounden duty, from time to time, to give our readers satisfactory proof that they do right in reading our paper.

Our paper is an appeal to our fellow countrymen to consider, calmly and seriously, the questions which concern their souls and ours. Thousands have responded to our call, and do read our paper; and many Roman Catholics, as well as Protestants, do promote our object, by their contributions to our pages.

We do not wish that they should read our discussions with an uneasy mind, uncertain whether they are doing right or not. We know that many are warned against reading the Catholic Layman, as if the very act of doing so were a sin. The warning rests upon such arguments as this—that they who have the truth, should never condescend to argue or discuss with those that have not; that it is like putting truth and falsehood on a a level; that discussion always leads to error and not to truth, and therefore that Catholics should never argue or discuss religious matters with heretics.

There is another argument sometimes urged against discussion—that it excites angry and uncharitable feelings and passions. We are no way afraid of this charge been made against us; we leave it to our readers to say whether we are liable to it. But the arguments above mentioned may cause some to read us with an uneasy conscience, and it is for them we now write.

They are not only told that Catholics should avoid all discussion with heretics, but they see this example now everywhere set by Roman Catholic priests. This was not always so; in our own day there have been "discussions," "Pope and Maguire," "the Downpatrick discussion," "Gregg and Maguire," and many others besides. But latterly the priests have shrunk from all discussion. It is not for want of being invited; their ablest men are now everywhere invited to discussion by the clergy of the Church of England and Ireland. Their travelling missionaries, Lockhart and Rinolfi, Dr. Cahill, Dr. Marshall, and various others, have been repeatedly invited to discussion of late, and everywhere they decline. It is clear that they are resolved not to venture into discussion again; and there seems to be much reason to think that the Pope and the Bishops have forbidden them to do so; and it is since they have adopted this new plan that we hear all the arguments to prove that it is wrong for "Catholics" to enter into any discussion with those whom they think in error.

Now, we think, two things are plain from this—1st, That they feel that discussion of their reasons and ours, will injure their cause, and advance ours; for, if they thought that discussion would serve their cause and injure ours, they would, no doubt, come forward to discuss with us. 2nd, Their reasons are only invented to serve a purpose, since, up to a few years ago, they never thought it wrong to enter into discussion.

Our object now is to show our readers that discussion and examination of the reasons on both sides, was never thought wrong by Catholics in ancient times, while the Church held fast to the faith contained in the Scriptures; but that, on the contrary, it was always the true Catholics who invited discussion and sought for it, and it was always those who were engaged in upholding error that cried out against discussion, and that said that they who had the truth should not discuss with those who had it not.

We have a striking instance in the conduct of one of the greatest, and best, and wisest of the Fathers (perhaps the greatest of them all), St. Augustine, in which he was joined by no less than 266 bishops of the Church of Africa.

No case could better serve to illustrate our discussions now; for the question in Africa then was, as it now is with us—"Which is the true Church?" Is it not interesting to us now to see how the Catholic Church in Africa, under the guidance of St. Augustine, dealt with such a question nearly 1,500 years ago? Is it not interesting to see whether Catholics then thought it right to discuss such a question with those who differed from them, and to see how they discussed it?

The facts were these: Donatus had got himself ordained Bishop of Carthage, where Cecilian was Bishop already, under pretence that Cecilian had fallen off from the Catholic Church. Hence arose two rival communions, which soon spread over all Africa. In the province of Numidia the Donatists became more numerous than the Catholics.

The Donatists boasted that they only were the Church; they only had Bishops; they only had the truth. The Catholics made no such claim. They acknowledged the Donatists as brethren, though erring.

The Donatists scorned to discuss the question, "which was the true Church," with those whom they did not acknowledge to be a Church at all, just as the Roman Catholic priests in Ireland do now. The true Catholics continually invited the Donatists to discussion, and at last succeeded in forcing them to it.

We possess a report of the proceedings at this discussion. We quote it from the valuable collection of councils made by two French Jesuits, Labbé and Cossart, vol. ii., p. 1336, &c. Ed. Paris, 1672.

About 266 Catholic Bishops were engaged in it, and perhaps nearly as many Donatist Bishops. Fourteen managers were appointed on each side, St. Augustine being one of the fourteen for the Catholics.

The Donatists, when at last compelled, by the Emperor's order, to attend, did everything to make delay and difficulty, and to evade discussion. They said (cap. 4, p. 1419), that "they were forbidden by the divine law to sit down in the same place with their opponents;" while the Catholics were willing to sit down with them.

Marcellinus, the tribune and notary, who conducted the proceedings, proposed that each party should sign their name to a report of what they said, so that they might not be able to deny it afterwards (c. 13). St. Augustine answered that his party had already bound themselves in writing to do so (c. 14). The Donatists refused to do so (c. 16). We have seen such things at discussions in Ireland.

When the Donatists were driven to say something for themselves, it consisted wholly of bold and confident assertions, for which they gave no proof; such as this—, We say that we are Bishops of the truth of our Lord Christ (c. 10)." To which the Catholics replied, "there is need to prove that they are Bishops of the truth, and not to boast of it" (c. 11).

The Catholics were equally anxious to avoid all excuses for delay. Thus, when the Donatists objected to their opponents assuming to themselves the name of Catholic, saying that the right to that name was in dispute between them, St. Augustine avoids using that word in the discussion, saying—"they object to the Catholic Church, or—that I may speak without controversy—the Church which we hold" (c. 226). Would any Roman Catholic priest go this far now to promote discussion?

We might illustrate our Irish controversies, in a variety of particulars, from this most interesting discussion at Carthage, but we must be brief. The following speech of St. Augustine shows the whole state of the case, and allows us to proceed to the great question, and how he dealt with it:—

"It was to the Catholic Bishops (i. e., at their request) that the holding of this discussion was granted. The Emperor's decree proves this. We have both come; here we are; and God has commanded us to be disputers and discussers rather than goers to law; and the Emperor, who fears and serves God, wishes for nothing else. Let nothing be introduced which is not necessary to the business. . . . . How long shall this so great expectation of the people be kept in suspense? All are thinking about their souls; and we are hitherto creating delays, that we should never come to the end of knowing the truth!"—c. 21.

But the manner in which St. Augustine and the Catholics dealt with the question itself is worthy of notice above all. From first to last they maintained and asserted, over and over again, that the question—"Which is the true Church?"—was to be settled by the Scriptures alone.

Thus Fortunatianus, one of the Catholic managers, says to the Donatists:—"We show the Catholic Church from the law (Moses), the prophets, the evangelists, the Psalms, and all the divine writings. . . . . We bring forward the Gospel to show the Church with you."

And St. Augustine himself (c. 101)—"We hold that Church which we find in those Scriptures, in which we also have learned Christ. Forasmuch as our Scriptures, to the authority of which both parties are subject, commend to us CHRIST and his Church as a holy marriage—CHRIST the bridegroom, she the bride; where we learn of Him, there also we should find her. If, therefore, we have now arisen, and consider to what communion of Christians in Africa we should be joined, beyond all doubt, we should hold to that which we find in the Scriptures." And again (c. 187)—"If, therefore, it be inquired concerning the Church—What it is? How great it is? What sort it is? the Divine Scriptures alone are sufficient to point her out."

It is equally remarkable that St. AUGUSTINE nowhere appeals to Rome or to the Bishop of Rome, to decide which was the true Church. No such notion appears in this discussion. But when the Donatists wanted to make out that CECILIAN was the father and head of the Catholics in Africa, St. AUGUSTINE, instead of saying (as some would now say) that the Pope was the head of their Church, answers thus: "We call those fathers, for the sake of honour, who have gone before us either in time or merit. It is otherwise when we come to inquire whom we have as father, in respect of the faith; whom we have as father in respect of life everlasting; whom we have as father in respect of holding to the Church, and possessing the promises of God." To all this he answers, "I have a Head, but He is CHRIST."

It seems St. AUGUSTINE knew nothing of "CHRIST's Vicar upon earth."

What St. AUGUSTINE thought of the necessity of obedience to the Pope, we will show some other time. We conclude here with the testimony of another great Catholic Bishop, OPTATUS, of Milevis, who worked with St. AUGUSTINE against these same Donatists:—"No tribunal can be found on earth concerning this question; a judge must be sought from heaven. But why need we reach to heaven, when we have his testament here in the Gospel?—(De Schis. Don., l. v., c. 3.)

Our readers may wish to know, what was the result of this famous discussion. Orders were given that this discussion should be read in all the Churches every year; and, in a short time, it came to pass, that the Donatist Church dwindled away to nothing, and there was again but one Church in Africa.

If Roman Catholic priests dare not now follow St. AUGUSTINE's example in discussion, if they cannot hope to produce the same results, it is principally because they cannot use the same means—they cannot prove their Church out of the Scriptures alone.

We trust we have now done something to satisfy our readers that discussion is right, and to show them also on what principles it should proceed; and we simply ask, can they wish for a greater authority than St. AUGUSTINE?

ON THE INTERNAL EVIDENCES OF THE CATHOLIC RELIGION.

IN returning to the consideration of Mr. M'Manus's letter, we desire to repeat, in the first instance, our deep conviction that any religion which does not claim to be the religion of the heart—which does not apply the strongest and highest motives to move the affections of the heart—can have little claim to be from God (for "God is love"—1 John iv. 8), and little deserves to find acceptance among men.

We also desire to repeat our conviction that a religion can possess no stronger internal evidence than its suitability to the wants of fallen man; while, each day, reflection makes us feel more strongly that the fact of a religion meeting all the wishes of our fallen nature should make us very suspicious of the snares of Satan, who first planted those wishes in our breasts, and whose best weapon against us is still to make false promises of supplying them all.

Our business now, in reference to Mr. M'Manus's letter, is to enquire, 1st, which the Church of England or of Rome sets before men the highest motives to move the deepest affections of the heart of man; 2nd, which proposes the religion most suited to supply his real wants; 3rd, which is clearest of the charge of conciliating the wishes of a fallen nature, by making offers and provisions which God has not made.

Mr. M'Manus has compared the two churches, in reference to the first and second of these points; and it is necessary that we should follow him in this: we trust that he will think that we only complete the subject of his letter in adding the third.

With respect to the first question: "which religion sets before men the highest motives to move the deepest affection of the heart?" we ask Mr. M'Manus to consider, in the first place, that the two churches agree in some things, and differ in others. Now, if the things in which the two churches do agree, be, indeed, the highest motives to work upon the deepest affections of man's heart, then, the only question is, which church puts these things forward most prominently—which church gives them the chiefest place—which is most careful that all should know them—which is most careful that nothing else should supplant those things in the hearts and affections of men? But, if the things which the Church of Rome holds, and which the Church of England rejects, be, indeed, the things which Mr. M'Manus thinks are those which apply the highest motives to move men's love to God, then we must enquire, whether these things be, indeed, from God? for, if not, Mr. M'Manus must be mistaken; for we expect he will admit, frankly, that those things which are revealed by God to lead our hearts and draw our love to him, must be fitter for that purpose (whether we at present see it or not) than any inventions which men have made for moving our affections. The waters of Jordan were really better than the rivers of Abana and Pharphar for cleansing the leprosy of Naaman, whether he saw the reason or not; and though he saw not this reason at first, yet, doubtless, he saw it afterwards; and we see now that the choice of Jordan was really suited to direct his heart aright to God, for it pointed to the God of Israel. (See 2 Kings v.—4th Kings, Douay Bible.)

How, then, stands the case between the churches—in what do they agree—in what do they differ?

In what do they agree? We must be very brief—but the greatest and noblest things bear brevity best—it is enough to say what they are.

Hear the words of our Blessed Saviour's own appeal to men to draw their hearts by love to God, through him:—"For God so loved the world as to give his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him may not perish, but may have life everlasting."—(1 John iii. 16.)

Is this no appeal to "the heart of a poor penitent, gushing with feelings of sorrow and contrition, and groaning under the burden of sin?" Can it do nothing to move our hearts with love towards God? Let St. John, "that disciple whom Jesus loved" (John xxi. 20), and who was himself in consequence, in an especial manner, "the Apostle of love," answer this question—"Let us, therefore, love God, because God first hath loved us."—(1 John iv. 19.)

Does Mr. M'Manus see no force in this appeal to the best affections of a soul groaning under the burden of sin? or will he say that this is a mere "dry and barren abstraction of a deity." We ask him to consider who brings this message of love and grace from God to man: it is the man Jesus Christ; himself perfect man, as well as perfect God. "In all things made like unto his brethren, that he might become a merciful and faithful high priest before God, that he might be a propitiation for the sins of the people; for in that wherein he himself hath suffered and been tempted, he is able to succour them also that are tempted."

It is not easy nor possible to express the comfort that God's children feel in every trial, in looking to a Saviour who has felt every trial, bodily and spiritual, that they can feel (though always without sin), and for this reason, that they might look to him as one who can feel for them. Such a Saviour is to them no "dry and barren abstraction of a deity;" he brings the very essence of the Godhead himself within the reach and comprehension of their love.

In this great object, and these effectual motives of love towards God, both churches professedly agree. We have quoted from the Roman Catholic Bible, which suits our purposes here as well as the authorized version of the Church of Rome.

Our heaviest complaint against Rome is this: that professing to believe such things as these, she does not rely simply on them to move men's love to God; but, treating them with cold neglect, she multiplies all other means, of human invention, of moving the affections of men.

How does Mr. M'Manus judge of these things? The two churches agree in these things: yet Mr. M'Manus condemns the one, notwithstanding that her great and chief object is to hold up Christ the Saviour as the true object of the love and adoration of men. He extols the other, not because she proposes such objects and motives of love, but because she has "a sublime ritual—fasts and penances—intercessory offerings for departed souls—saints and intercessors interceding in the presence of God—devotions to the Virgin Mother of God," all of which, he says, are but so many links of the chain whereby the faith which he professes is entwined around the deepest principles of our nature."

Did the blessed Apostles know how to preach that faith; or how to move men's hearts with love to God? And was it upon these things that they relied? In all the accounts that Scripture gives of their earnest preaching (that preaching which converted the world)—in all their earnest and affectionate letters to their converts, we find no mention of these things. Mr. M'Manus, himself, admits in his letter—"it must be confessed that you have proved how little evidence is to be derived from the ancient fathers in support of the reverence which the Catholic Church has always paid to the Blessed Virgin, and other important doctrines which we are taught to believe." And yet he makes these things (which must be, by this admission, mere inventions of men in later times) the test of the religion of the heart, to the utter forgetting of the grace and mercy which God has revealed to us through Jesus Christ our Saviour! He still suffers from the practical teaching of the Church of Rome. She has laboured to keep these human inventions ever before his eyes—she has coldly neglected to set Christ, his nature, his office, his character, and his grace and mercy before him; and he does not yet see how wonderfully suited the Saviour is, as shewn to us in Scripture, to draw to himself every affection of the hearts of sinners oppressed with the sense of sin.

But, why did he not bring forward more "links of the chain" by which his faith is "entwined around the deepest principles of our nature." Why did he not bring forward the scapular and all the lying stories connected with it, so sedulously used to touch the hearts of the Irish peasantry—why did he not bring forward the holy coat of Treves, the winking picture of Rimini, the fanatical delusions of the "Adolorata" and Estatica," by which the Church of Rome imposed on the heart of the late Earl of Shrewsbury? Why not mention the countless succession of lying wonders which the Church of Rome, in all latter ages, has produced or countenanced—why not all the legends of the Breviary, which the Roman priests are bound to study? Why, in fine, has he not said that the Church of Rome, in our own day, is continually producing a succession of such lying wonders, to touch the hearts of her children, whenever she sees their zeal to flag (as in the Rimini pictures, and other cases above mentioned)?

Are not these things the strongest evidence that she has not the religion of the heart to rely on—that she feels the necessity of a constant production of the inventions of men, to keep up anything like popular devotion? Seriously, we ask Mr. M'Manus if all this be preferable to fixing all our hearts and hopes upon the life and death of Christ for us?

Mr. M'Manus speaks of the sincere and pious men in his communion who have felt the internal conviction of its truth. What we have said of the great things in which the Church of Rome professes to agree with us, may leave us room to hope that some in that Church do find what satisfies their hearts, in spite of the coldness of their Church about it. But the question is, do they find this in what the Churches agree in, or in the things which Mr. M'Manus thinks so important and which we reject? We thank Mr. M'Manus for his instances: he produces Fenelon and Pascal—the latter is, perhaps, the recluse of Port Royal, the disciple of St. Cyran; a member of a community which all zealous Roman Catholics at this day are agreed in calling heretics, because they rejected the decrees of Popes, and neglected the inventions of their Church, to fix all their thoughts upon Christ and his grace as they found them in the Bible; and sore and long their persecutions were at the hands of Rome for this their choice. Fenelon, also, was a man of like spirit, and suffered for it too. Why does Mr. M'Manus take his instances of genuine love to God in members of his Church, from among those who came nearest to us—who thought the least of the things he boasts of, and who dwelt the most on the great things we hold? Is it not a plain confession that these are, indeed, the things that can fill our hearts with love, and make our profiting appear to all?

Mr. M'Manus has much to learn, if he really believes what he says, of what the Church of England and Ireland offers to meet the intense cravings of a soul burdened with a sense of sin—"You tell him that penances are unavailing" (and so they are, indeed, to atone for sin)—"that priestly absolution is but an empty sound" (we tell him that the ministers of the Church are God's ambassadors, and that to them the ministry of reconciliation is committed. 2 Cor. v. 18, 19, 20.) "You forbid him to turn his thoughts to the sainted martys and confessors" (nay, rather we point to that "so great a cloud of witnesses" to make him "look to Jesus" as they also looked. Hebrews xii. 12.) "You think it rank idolatry to fly for refuge to the Blessed Mother of God (we do; for Christ himself is the refuge set before us). "And what do you offer him instead? You give him the Thirty-nine Articles! You set before his mind a dry and barren abstraction of a deity, enveloped in a cloudy maze of dogmatic theology." So Mr. M'Manus asks and answers. Nay, nay, it is not so; we call God to witness. The Church of Rome, indeed, propounds Pope Pius's Creed to any restless soul that seeks for peace in her communion; and refuses any hope of comfort till the poor wanderer swallows every article, with all that is in it, and all that is not in it. But not so we. We highly prize the Thirty-nine Articles for their own purpose; but we do not offer that formulary to a convert, much less to one seeking the cleansing of his soul from sin. We show him Christ, as Christ showed himself on earth: we show him the man Christ Jesus, meek and lowly, dwelling among men; sharing all their sorrows, healing all their infirmities, bearing with all their contradictions, and giving himself to die for their sins. We show his gracious words, "come unto me all ye that labour and are heavy laden and I will give you rest."—Matt. xi. 28. We shew his sacred promise, "Him that cometh to me I will not cast out."—John vi. 37. We point to Christ as still the same, yesterday, and to-day, and for ever.—Hebrews xiii.

8. We point to him still, as one who, in his human nature, feels for our infirmities; as interceding for us now in Heaven before God, and, therefore, able "to save for ever them that come to God by him."—Hebrews vii. 25. We think him the great end and object of all love; and the great object of all our labours is, that nothing else shall stand between, to prevent the groaning sinner looking straight to this great high priest.

Is it of this that Mr. M'Manus means to say; "as well might you hold forth an empty vessel to the parched and thirsty wanderer in the desert, as tell the sorrowing and heavy laden soul to be content with such a religion as this!" Is Christ the Saviour, "in whom all fullness dwells," this empty vessel! or shall we turn from Him who is the Well of Life, to the broken cisterns which men have made, which hold no water?

We might well meet Mr. M'Manus on the practical results of the two systems. He asks—"How rarely do they (in the Church of England) turn to religion for comfort and consolation, under the trials and calamities of life." We thank God we could show him multitudes who draw comfort and support in every trial from the Word and the ministry of reconciliation. But the religion of the heart is not paraded. All outward parade and show is but evidence of heartfelt want within.

But we must ever protest against religion being judged of by the conduct of those who are indifferent to religion; a class too sadly large in every Church and creed. The increasing multitude of Roman Catholics who never go to confession is an instance in point; a stronger instance still we noticed in our number for September last: It is a fact that of Irish Roman Catholics who go to America, not one-fourth continue Roman Catholics there. We gave the testimony of an Irish priest, from his own observation on the spot, that two millions have been lost in this way! What a commentary on Irish Romanism as the religion of the heart!

We shall consider in our next number which religion best meets the wants and wishes of our fallen nature. In the mean time we ask Mr. M'Manus to study the character of the man Christ Jesus, as given to us in the Bible, and consider whether that be not an object capable of moving and supplying every feeling of love of which his heart is capable; and whether it be not true that the more perfectly a religion relies on this best and greatest object, the more truly it becomes "the religion of the heart."

Correspondence.

ON THE VISIBILITY OF THE CHURCH.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

SIR—Instead of sending a copy of my mislaid letter, I beg most respectfully to draw your attention to a synopsis of my arguments and objections compressed within the narrow compass of a sheet of letter paper. My sole object being the investigation of truth, and feeling an earnest desire (one, I think, which ought to be very generally participated in) of knowing the best that can be said on the opposite side, in this enlightened age, respecting the visibility of the Church, I also beg you will address yourself to the real difficulty, in a manner befitting the importance of the subject, without diverging into extraneous topics. I have particularly to request that you will not attempt to hide the real state of the question; truth loses nothing by being seen in its own native colours. If you have God's truth, why not support it powerfully? and if you are in error, why should you impose on your own soul if you would not be classed with those persons of whom our Saviour says, that they had closed their eyes, and that their ears were dull of hearing.—See Matt. xiii. 14, 15.

In the LAYMAN for January, 1853, page 10, column 2, you say you have no difficulty in showing the perpetuity and visibility of the Church; this, then, being an admitted principle between us, I call upon you to show where your Church existed in the days of Berengarius (circiter, A. D., 1040). 2adly—I call upon you to say whether Berenger, or the various councils, churches, bishops, and ecclesiastics that condemned him, constituted the true Church of Christ? 3rdly—If Berenger were the true Church, where was the true Church before he began to broach his errors (A.D., 1016)? and also when he recanted and abjured his errors, and died a penitent Roman Catholic? 4thly—In the LAYMAN for September 1852, page 104, column 2, you say—"The Christian Church had never wholly revolted from God; God had never abandoned her; the fundamentals of Christianity—the means of salvation were preserved in her." You mean, of course, the Roman Church, and the other churches in communion with her, which you here seemingly admit to be the true Church of Christ—"Fair as the moon, bright as the sun, terrible as an army with banners."—See Canticles vi. 9. I call upon you to reconcile these expressions with her being "The Scarlet Lady, 'fallen into grievous and damnable errors,' and drunk with the blood of the saints and martyrs of Jesus." 5thly—Berenger was bound to hear the Church, according to Mat. xviii. 17; to obey his prelates, according to Heb. xiii. 7, 17. Where were these prelates and that Church? 6thly—I call upon you to point out the congregation of faithful men among whom the pure Word of God was preached, and the sacraments duly administered, in the days of Berengarius, according to the 19th Article of the Church of England.

These are the points I urged in my first letter, and I beg most respectfully to say, that in your answer you have evaded them by attacking the doctrine of Images, the Creed of Pope Pius, &c. It seems your correspondents must confine themselves to one topic, whilst you are at liberty to ramble; this plan, if not very honourable, is, at least, very convenient no doubt.

You say Mat. xviii. 17 refers to the offences of one man against another, which the Church was bound to reconcile (See No. for January, 1853, page 10, column 1). Much more, I argue, should she strive to reconcile those individuals to God, who may have offended him by errors in faith or doctrine, and, on the same principle, they were bound to hear; but your exposition of the passage is—"Hear the Church in petty disputes, and matters of minor importance; but if matters of faith or doctrine happen to be agitated, follow your own peculiar whims and fancies." I shall, at present, make no farther comment upon this very popular explanation, which aims at the subversion of all Church authority.

Respecting Heb. xiii. 7, 17, you cannot deny that the prelates here alluded to had the true faith, and that the people were bound to follow them. In like manner, in the time of Berengarius some prelates must have had the true faith, and he was bound to follow them; or there was no visible Church of Christ. I call upon you, again, to point out these prelates, as I have frustrated your attempts at explaining away the above passages of Scripture.

You argue thus:—"The doctrine for which Berengarius was condemned was not in such or such a Creed, ergo, it formed no portion of the faith of the Church; it was but the private opinion of particular doctors and individual bishops." I argue contra. Your Sacrament of the Lord's Supper is not contained in the Nicene, the Athanasian, or the Apostles' Creed, hence, upon your own principles, you should have only one sacrament of the New Law, or else your arguments from the Creeds goes for nothing at all.

Lastly—I call upon you, most emphatically, as the onus lies upon you, to prove that the councils, churches, bishops, and ecclesiastics, that condemned Berengarius, were merely particular doctors and individual bishops, as you assert in the No. for January, 1853, of your periodical, page 10, column 2; and that the great majority of the visible Church supported the opinions of Berengarius.

I now proceed to anticipate some arguments which you may be expected to adduce; just merely to prevent you from wasting time at them, and to compel you to bring forward better, if you have any such in your theological armoury.

First Kings xix. 14, 18 is quoted to show, by analogy, that, as 7,000 faithful existed unknown to even Elijah the prophet: even so the Christian Church may be hidden in the days of Berengarius. I deny the analogy, for three reasons: first, Ahab, king of Israel, and Asa, king of Judah, were cotemporaries (see 1 Kings xvi. 29); and, though Ahab persecuted and exterminated the prophets, still the Church flourished at the same time under good King Asa, in Judah (see 1 Kings xv. 11, 14), the Jewish Church then was not invisible. Secondly, Elijah must have known that Obadiah, the governor, had concealed the prophets by fifties in caves (1 Kings, xviii. 13). And lastly, and principally, we have the infallible Word of the living God, that 7,000 faithful existed at that time in Israel (see 1 Kings xix. 18). Now, as we have no such assurance respecting your Church in the days of Berengarius, I maintain that I have smashed for ever, this argument from analogy.

Next, Protestants have recourse to the expedient of a church within a church, saying that the true believers were mixed up with those of the Romish communion, like the tares and the wheat (see Mat. xiii. 24, 30); but it cannot be alleged that either the wheat or the tares were invisible, so here again the analogy ceases, and this theory is liable to all my former objections from the invisibility; and if Protestants cannot point out any distinct party, it is evident, their church if any previously existed, had become invisible and contradicted our first principle and postulate: "that the Church of Christ is perpetual and always visible."

Mat. xxiii. 2, 3, is quoted to prove that a church may be still the Church of Christ, though "fallen into grievous and damnable errors." Now the errors of the Scribes and Pharisees consisted in their pride, ambition, covetousness, and hypocrisy, against which the eight woes are denounced in the Gospel (see Mat. xiii. 13, 36, and Luke xi. 37, 52). Had they erred in doctrine our Saviour would not have commanded the people to hear them, as he did in the passage so infelicitously quoted by our adversaries; and though the Jewish rulers were, generally speaking, very wicked, there were bright exceptions: Zacharias and Elizabeth—see Luke i. 6, 67; Mary and Joseph—Mat. i. 19, 20; holy Simeon—Luke ii. 25, 26; the prophetess Anna—Luke ii. 36, 37—cum multis aliis, and not to speak of John the Baptist or of the light of the world, Jesus Christ; but who was there to protest against the pretended innovations of Rome, at the period I have selected, except that weathercock, Berengarius, who abjured and relapsed so often.

It is vain, Mr. Editor, to try to embarrass me with the creed of Pope Pius. I beg to remind you of the old adage: "Nihil agit qui item lite resolvit." You are bound not only to prove your own position but to answer the objections stated against it. If you show a disposition to do so by clear and logical deductions, and by Scripture references, as I am, in my humble sphere, a friend to free discussion, I will, from time to time, submit to you my crude arguments and objections, upon several other controverted points; but if you continue to evade, or to hide the real state of the question, as I said before, I shall feel myself at liberty to conclude that the defeat is in the cause and not in the advocate.

With unfeigned thanks for your attention to my communications, I beg to subscribe myself

Φιλαληθης.

The subject of the visibility of the Church is one which we willingly admit to be discussed in our pages. It is, however, an inconvenience that our correspondent should insist on discussing it upon a case (that of Berengarius) out of which no question arises about the visibility of the Church. It is rather hard to ask us to say which, Berengarius or his opponents, were the true Church, when they both professed to belong to the same Church. The Pope and Council drew up a recantation for Berengarius, and they began it thus—"I, Berengarius, an unworthy deacon of the Church of St. Mauritius of Andegave, &c.;" in which it is clear that they looked on Berengarius as a deacon of the same Church as themselves. If Berengarius had been asked—"Which are you or your opponents the true Church?" he would, no doubt, have answered—"We are both members of the same Church, and the only question between us is, which states the doctrine of that Church most correctly." We really can give no other answer to the same question. We do not see how any question arises out of this, as to the visibility of the Church; though we do see a great question as to how far individuals are bound to believe and profess in the words which any bishop or any number of bishops choose to dictate to them.

The only way we can deal with our correspondent's letter is, first, to state plainly what we believe as to the visibility of the Church of Christ; and then to show whether Berengarius was bound, or not, to adopt the recantation dictated to him.

We believe, then, that the visibility of the church consists in a lawful succession of bishops, clergy, and people, professing the articles of the Christian faith, as contained in the Catholic creeds. We believe that in all ages, throughout the world, there has been such a succession of bishops, clergy, and people professing those creeds. The whole of these, as existing at any one time, we take to be "the visible Church of Christ on earth." We believe that Christ always has had, and always will have, such a Church.

So our correspondent has given himself a very needless trouble in finding arguments for us to prove that Christ might have no visible Church on earth.

We do not hold that every error held by individual bishops, or number of bishops, or even by particular churches (as the Churches of Jerusalem, Rome, Antioch, &c.), destroys the visibility of Christ's Church on earth; although such errors do deface the purity of those particular churches, and make them less worthy of Christ. The visible Church of Christ, as a whole, has never professed anything but the Catholic creeds.

Our correspondent has mistaken the meaning of the 19th Article of the Church of England and Ireland, which describes "the visible Church of Christ" as "a congregation of faithful men, in the which the pure Word of God is preached," &c. This is the highest notion we can form of the visible church, one which should be ever in our minds. So far as particular churches come up to this, they have a good claim to be parts of the visible Church of Christ; so far as they come short of this, their claim is weakened and obscured. But this article does not mean that every departure in any degree, from that "pure Word of God," does wholly separate from the visible Church of God: and this is perfectly clear from the latter part of that same article itself, "as the Church of Jerusalem, Alexandria, and Antioch have erred; so also the Church of Rome hath erred, not only in their living and manner of communion, but also in matters of faith;" so it is clear from the article itself, that a church may entertain some errors, even in matters of faith, and yet not wholly cease to be a visible church.

On these principles, we have no difficulty in answering our correspondent's question, "where the visible Church of Christ was in the days of Berengarius?" It was all over the world, wherever there were bishops, clergy, and people, professing the Catholic creed as their faith.

And even though the Church of Rome, and all churches then in communion with her, should have perished, or utterly fallen from the faith, Christ would still have had a visible church on earth; for there were then, as there are now, churches at Alexandria, Jerusalem, Antioch, Constantinople, and all over the east, churches not in communion with Rome, yet, perhaps, greater in extent and numbers, and some of them older than she. So little difficulty have we in answering this question.

And here we must protest against the construction which our correspondent puts upon the words he quotes from the LAYMAN of September, 1852, p. 104—"The Christian Church had never wholly revolted from God; God had never abandoned her; the fundamentals of Christianity—the means of salvation, were preserved in her." On this our correspondent observes, "you mean, of course, the Roman Church, and the other churches in communion with her, which you here seemingly admit to be the true Church of Christ." We spoke plainly, and evidently of the whole church, and our correspondent says, "of course, you mean a part only!"

Now, this is really very unfair, and it is hard to argue on such terms. But we are quite sure our correspondent meant no unfairness. The fact is, Roman Catholics are so drilled into the habit of taking a part for the whole themselves, that they think every one else must do so too. But it really is time for them to look at this great fact, that the Greek and Eastern Churches are really existing, though not in communion with Rome, that they are, perhaps, equal to her in numbers, some of them superior in antiquity, and all of them superior to her in having preserved the Catholic creed without mixture or addition. It is time for them to learn that a part is not the whole.

We trust, we have clearly answered the question as to the visibility of the Church. We have nothing to add, except that we do not think that perseverance in error, when it has once crept in, is necessary to the succession or continuance of a church. On this ground we hold that the present Church of England and Ireland is the same church that existed in these countries before the Reformation; the succession of bishops, clergy, and people professing the same creed, having been then continued, and nothing done but the removal of errors which had crept in.

Now for the only question that really arises out of the case of Berengarius. Are individuals, clergy or laymen, bound to profess anything or everything that any bishop, or any number of bishops may choose to dictate to them? This is really the question that arises out of the case of Berengarius; it is a question of the infallibility, not of the visibility of the Church. To this we auswer, that persons are not so bound to receive everything that bishops may propose to them. But, we do not, on the other hand, adopt the alternative offered to us by Philalethes, that every one is to follow "his own peculiar whims and fancies." A line must he drawn somewhere; this is the way we draw the line; all Christian people are bound to follow the prelates and clergy of the Church, in that faith which Christ and his Apostles delivered to the Church; but if prelates and clergy require people to believe other articles of faith besides what Christ and his Apostles delivered to the Church, then we are bound to refuse to adopt such things as our faith. Does Philalethes deny or adopt this rule? Does he believe everything that every pope or bishop, or council has said? If we do, we promise him a nice collection. If he do not, can he draw the line better than we have drawn it?

We said, and say again, that, Matthew xviii. 17, "to hear the Church," applies only to offences of one man against another; we say so, because our Saviour said so; for he expressly gives that direction to meet this case, and this only—"If thy brother shall offend against thee"—(v. 15, Douay Bible). But Philalethes says of it "much more I argue," should the Church govern men's faith; but his arguments are not Christ's words; and we must beg leave to take that passage simply as Christ spoke and applied it. The other passage he quotes—"Obey your prelates" (Hebrews xiii. 17.) is more to the purpose. We accept that passage as binding us to obey prelates, declaring to us the faith which Christ and his Apostles gave. The same Apostle who gave us that precept has told us also—"Be ye followers of me as I also am of Christ"—1 Cor. xi. 1. But he has told us also—"Though we, or an angel from heaven, were to preach a Gospel to you besides that which we have preached to you, let him be anathema"—Gal. i. 8. We do not understand St. Paul's precept—"Obey your prelates," as giving those prelates a higher power over our faith, than St. Paul claimed for himself; we, therefore, think that we are to follow prelates "as they follow Christ"—that is, in all things in which they follow him; but if any prelates should preach other doctrine to us, than Christ delivered to his Church, we are to connt those prelates anathema.

But one clear case in which Philalethes himself must say that a pope and a council required a man to profess what no Catholic can or ought to believe, will, perhaps, have as much weight as many arguments. Such a case we have at hand; it is the case of Berengarius, which he brings up to us. We have before us the recantation which Pope Nicholas and his council compelled Berengarius to sign. That recantation was put into the canon law, and we quote it from the canon law, so there is no mistake—Decret. de consecrat. Dist. ii c. 42. It runs thus:—The true Body and Blood of Christ is said to be "in a sensible manner (sensualiter) handled by the hands of the priest, broken, and ground by the teeth of the faithful." Now the only possible meaning that can be given to the word "sensualiter" is this: that the Body of Christ is handled, broken, and eaten, in a way that our senses can judge of and perceive; that it becomes the object of the senses; in other words, that the priest knows by the feel, and those who eat know by the taste, that it is the true Body of Christ! Yet, if Philalethes ask any Roman Catholic priest or bishop now whether this doctrine be true, that our senses can discern the body and blood of Christ in the Sacrament, he will be told that this is downright heresy, and not the doctrine of the Roman Catholic Church; for that our senses can perceive nothing but the accidents of bread and wine; and cannot perceive the body and blood of Christ at all; and that it is heresy to say that the body and blood are in the bread and wine "sensualiter," or in a way that our senses can perceive.

Yet this is the doctrine that Pope Nicholas and the Council compelled Berengarius to subscribe!

We are not the first to discover that the plain sense of this recantation is not only contrary to our senses, but is heretical according to the Church of Rome itself. We have said that this recantation stands in the Canon Law, into which Gratian put it. The authorised editions of that law have generally printed with them a commentary called "the gloss," and the gloss says of these words of the recantation—"Nisi sane intelligas verba Berengarii, in majorem incides hæresin quam ipse habuit;" that is, "unless you understand the words of Berengarius in a sound sense, you will fall into a greater heresy than his"! Admitting that the natural and obvious meaning of these words is heresy; and showing that these words must be twisted some way to get rid of the heresy. But there is no way of doing it; the words have one meaning only, and can have no other; that meaning is heresy in the Church of Rome itself!

The fact is, that Pope Nicholas and his council were mere bunglers; they did not rightly understand the Popish doctrine; and it was hard for them, for that doctrine was not settled until afterwards; and hence the difficulty that later authorities found in taking their words "in a sound sense."

Poor "Weathercock Berengarius, who abjured and relapsed so often!" They made him a weathercock indeed; it would have needed the true spirit of a martyr, of a Jerome or a Huss, a Ridley or a Latimer, to have come through that trial; and he had it not. Yet we feel great compassion for those whom the Church of Rome in her palmy days made "weathercocks"; for we know that in her mercy she gave them their choice, either to be "weathercocks" or martyrs.

ON PURGATORY.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

SIR—Permit me to say, that you should first have shown, from unexceptionable authority, the Catholic Church of the third, fourth, fifth, sixth, or even of succeeding centuries, that my citations from Origen are heretical, and have been formally condemned; and when you give this proof you may then call upon me to prove, from orthodox writers of the first three centuries, the doctrine of purgatory. This proof I have, more than once before, called for, yet you have not attempted to give anything of more weight than your own opinion. Mere assertion is the only authority you oppose to these citations; and this, however respectable the party, falls far short of a definitive proof. The doctrine of purgatory remains untouched and unsealed; you have not yet disproved it: these are the real features of the case at present. Do not be tardy in bringing forth the requisite proofs, and the Catholics of the world will bless you for the enlightenment. You tell me to own that the Church, in the days of St. Epiphanius, had defined nothing on the subject of purgatory. I confess; and when you show the heterodoxy of my citations from Origen, I will prove that the Church long before that time taught the efficacy of prayers for the dead, and the remission of sins in the world to come. This you do not deny to be the belief in the time of Pope Gregory the Great. Let me now ask you, can a definition confer being or vitality? Or does nothing really exist but what has already been defined? Your charge, whereby you impute heresy to St. Augustine, is novel and startling. This is a light which the ancient Church had not, and which could not be found in any save in a very modern Church. This is truly a summary mode of disposing of an adversary, whose evidence is otherwise incontrovertible. You must also charge St. Epiphanius with innovation, or admit the distinction he makes between prayers for the saints and prayers for sinners: the former were decidedly and unmistakably thanksgivings, and the latter propitiations; and this fact, together with the cultus of the saints, is unequivocally set forth in the Liturgy of St. Chrysostom, from which you attempt to prove the contrary. First—"By the intercession of the most holy, immaculate, blessed above all, our glorious lady, Mother of God, and ever Virgin Mary, by the virtue of the glorious and vivifying cross, and of all the saints, may Christ, our true God, have mercy on us."—Goar, page 63. This extract contains very important evidence in favour of the cultus of saints (but this apart), with a verification of the distinction recognised by St. Epiphanius.

Again—"It is truly meet to praise thee, Mother of God, who art always to be blest, to be venerated above the cherubim, and incomparably more glorious than the seraphim, who, in all purity, didst bring forth God, the Word; we magnify thee, who art truly the Mother of God. Perfect us, O God, by the prayers of St. John the prophet, precursor, and Baptist, of the saint whose memory we celebrate, and of all the saints; and be mindful of all who have slept before us in the hope of the resurrection to eternal life."—Ibid.

Here we see whether praying to saints was an improvement of an age later than the fifth century, or not; and we also find, that God was supplicated, through them, for mercy on the souls of those who were already departed.

These passages afford palpable evidence that the Apostles, the Virgin Mary, the saints, &c., were not prayed for indiscriminately with the other dead, and that the prayers and offerings made for them were only those of thanksgiving; for it could not be consistent with reason that the Apostles, Blessed Virgin, &c., should be prayed for in common with the other dead, in one part of the Liturgy, and be prayed to, as intercessors, in another part of it. I am most anxious to have the question of purgatory dispassionately and amicably discussed, with Christian and charitable feelings, free from all levity, and from that acrimony which so generally marks the temper of polemical disputants.

I remain, sir, yours sincerely,

EDMOND POWER.

We print the foregoing letter in courtesy to our correspondent, but we do not know that it requires any answer, since he has brought forward no new evidence or argument in support of purgatory. He tells us that we have not disproved it; but our business in this argument was not to disprove it—we were examining what evidence there was for it. We were content to waive for the present the argument that weighs most with Protestants, namely, the silence of Scripture about Purgatory; for Protestants cannot believe that if the Apostles knew that their converts had a prospect of undergoing torments after death, they would be justified, in common honesty, in concealing this from them, and in speaking as if their death was to be succeeded by an immediate entrance into happiness. But, omitting this point, we asked—Could the silence of Scripture be supplied by tradition, and can it be proved that purgatory was the doctrine of the primitive Church by the testimony of any orthodox writer for the first three hundred years? In answer to this question our correspondent has been able to produce nothing better than passages from Origen, which are branded as heretical by the Benedictine editors themselves, and which it is, therefore, not very unreasonable of us to decline to receive as orthodox sentiments. We pronounce, then, the doctrine of purgatory as still "Not Proven," and we think it is plain that if the Apostles and the early fathers had believed in it, it would have been easy to prove it from their writings.

We need not enter into a new subject—the worship of the saints—nor discuss the passages which Mr. Power has cited from the Liturgy which goes by the name of St Chrysostom, out which learned men are agreed did not, in its present shape, proceed from that Father. We quoted this liturgy merely in correction of the evasive expression that the saints "were named" in the prayers of the ancient Church, and to show that prayers were offered in plain words (explain it as you may) for them. Such prayer, we know to have been offered for the saints, from much earlier testimony. And it matters not that, in after times, prayers were offered through them and to them, unless it can be proved that these latter prayers were as ancient as the former. The fact, we believe, was, that in the times when men prayed for the saints they did not pray to them; and when they began to pray to them they left off praying for them.

ON A SACRIFICING PRIESTHOOD.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

SIR—It is evident that "Milner's End of Religions Controversy" has not put an end to controversy between the two contending Churches of Rome and of the Reformation. That astute theologian has charged the Church of England with inconsistency in having her ministers still called priests, while she has put away her altars, and pronounced the Sacrifice of the Mass to be a "Blasphemous fable and a dangerous deceit." And this charge would indeed fall with a crushing force upon the Church of England, if by "Priests" they meant sacrificers for sins, and not presbyters.

But the question is, which of the antagonist Churches, of Rome or England, is right in this matter? The ministers of the former are held to be a sacerdotal college, or caste, ordained to offer for sins; there is no doubt of that. And it is as clear, that the reformers of the latter protested against the idea of such an offering, offered oftentimes (for which cause they suffered death at the stake), and retained the word "Priest," as it had been handed down to them from the earliest ages, as the proper name of a "Minister of the New Covenant," which is rendered, in the authorized version of the Bible, uniformly, by the word "Elder." The controversy between the two Churches may now be brought to an issue at once, by the discussion of this one simple question, which I write this article to propose—namely, are the ministers of the New Testament (or Covenant) priests (ιερεις) apart from the people, to offer for sins? or to offer Christ again and again, for the sins of the quick and the dead? or are they not? Does the eternal and unchangeable high priesthood of the Son of God, who, having finished the work upon earth, which his Father gave him to do, ascended upon high, carrying with him the blood of the eternal Covenant, admit of such an idea, or leave any place in the Church upon earth for a successional atoning priesthood? To whom can they be successional? Not to Aaron, for his priesthood is defunct; and while it lasted, it made nothing perfect. Not, again, to Melchisedec, or to Christ, as his antitype; for that priesthood is absolutely απαραβατος; and since he "sat down" on the right hand of God, no priest coming after him, until he comes again, has, or can have, any authority from God, or from his word, to stand at an altar upon earth, daily ministering. The vail is rent, and under a new and spiritual dispensation every Christian is a priest—not, indeed, to offer for sins (for which there is no place nor occasion) but to "offer unto God spiritual sacrifices, acceptable (their persons being acceptable first) through Jesus Christ."

It follows, that if there be no priest upon earth to offer for sins, then there is no Sacrifice of the Mass; no transubstantiation; no judicial absolution; no lordship over God's heritage; no endless genealogical succession of priests from the apostles, who, in this sense, were not priests themselves; no SUMMUS SACERDOS taking the place of Christ upon earth, who, when he went away, promised to send, in his stead, another comforter, who should be no mortal man, but the Holy Ghost, the personal Spirit Jehovah. In a word—"The priesthood being changed, there is a change also in the law." Under the Old Testament there was a priesthood confined to one family, into which no stranger might intrude, under pain of death. This was the sin of the "tonsured" CORAH, in which he perished, with all that appertained to him. Under the New Testament there is an ever-living priest, Christ himself, whom Aaron and his sons prefigured. And as God has sworn with an oath, that his is the priesthood for ever, whom he has raised from the dead, as the antitype to Aaron's rod that budded, I ask, who, then, are they, or can they be, who shall perish in the gainsaying of the man who "sought the priesthood" in the last day, except the party whom Milner undertook to defend in his "End of Religious Controversy"? SACRIFICE OF THE MASS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

SIR—In a work, called "The Sincere Christian instructed in the Faith of Christ from the Written Word." By Bishop Hay, published in 1845, by the printer and bookseller to St. Patrick's College, Maynooth, at pages 368 and 371, the following questions and answers occur:—

Q. 30. What then, properly speaking, is the sacrifice of the mass?

A. It is an offering made to God, of the body and blood of Jesus Christ, &c.

Q. 37. By whom is the mass offered?

A. (2) By the Bishops and Priests of his (Jesus Christ's) church, who are his ministers and deputies, whom he makes use of, for performing the outward and visible celebration of this sacrifice here upon earth in his stead, &c.

Q. 38. For whom is the mass offered?

A. . . . . For those (the Church) in heaven, in thanksgiving to God for all their happiness, for the Church on earth, according to the four great ends of sacrifice, and for the souls in purgatory, &c.

No Roman Catholic can deny that the teaching in this work ("the Sincere Christian") is in strict accordance with that of the Roman Catholic Church of the present day; notwithstanding which, the Roman Catholic version of the "written Word," from which the above teaching purports to have been taken, promulgates directly opposite doctrines, which can be seen by referring, amongst other passages, to the Roman Catholic authentic interpretation of the words "ETERNAL REDEMPTION," spoken of in Heb. ix. 12, which is given at foot of the page in the explanatory note, Douay Bible, published by Simms and M'Intyre, Belfast, 1840, with the sanction of ✠ Cornelius Denvir, D.D., Roman Catholic Bishop, Down and Connor, given at Belfast, 24th July, 1839—viz.,

Verse 12. Eternal redemption. By that one sacrifice of His blood, ONCE OFFERED on the cross, Christ our Lord paid and exhibited, ONCE FOR ALL, the general price and ransom of all mankind, which no other priest could do.

See also Hebrews x. 14. For by one oblation he hath perfected for ever them that are sanctified.—Douay Bible.

The greatest treasure of which the Church is possessed, is the written Word of God, and yet it is kept locked from the people whose property it is. 1 Thess. v. 27—I charge you by the Lord, that this epistle be read to ALL the holy brethren. See also Phil. i. 1, Eph. i. 1, 1 Cor. i. 2, Rom. i. 7, Colossians i. 2, James i. 1, 1 Peter i. 1, 2 Peter i. 1, Jude i. 1, showing that these epistles were addressed, not to priests only, but to all the faithful.

If you, sir, can find space for the above, it may be instrumental in convincing some one of our Roman Catholic fellow-countrymen of his right, and inducing him to assert his title to an open Bible.

Your obedient servant,

J. B.

CHRISTIANITY IN INDIA.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

SIR—The following short narrative is wholly matter of fact. Perhaps you may give it a place in your paper. The names of persons and of places have been altered, as some of the former are still living; I knew them all; and when I think of these circumstances I am constrained to say—"May I die the death of the righteous,—May my last end be like his":—

God's ways are not our ways, nor his thoughts like our thoughts. Those things or persons to which man attaches great importance are shown by him to be of small value; and, on the other hand, he chooses foolish things of this world to confound the wise, and things which are not, to bring to nought things that are: that no flesh should glory in his presence!

The above reflections were first powerfully brought to my mind when I heard of the conversion of G—— L'Estrange, a young officer in the East India Company's army, of genteel appearance and prepossessing manners, a favourite with the world, and an acquisition in every gay party; but a libertine in principles, and one who truly lived without God in the world. Once, and once only, I was in the same company with him: the occasion was peculiarly painful, owing to L'Estrange's part in the affair, and one which I could never forget. I never was more strongly tempted to adopt the Pharisee's prayer and say—"God, I thank thee that I am not like" ———. But if any such sinful thought did find place in my heart, I was taught by after events to perceive its sinfulness and folly.

One of the peculiarities of European society in India is, the great familiarity and close intimacy which springs up between individuals unconnected with, and previously unknown to each other, who, by circumstances, are thrown together—either at the same European station, or in places remote from all European society, and which, though often in the midst of a dense native population, it is usual to denominate "the jungle."

L'Estrange was, under peculiar circumstances, directed to proceed to the military cantonment of "Belapoor," apart from his regiment On his arrival he had at first some difficulty in procuring a house. A share in one was, however, offered to him by Mr. William Brown, a civilian, a man with whom previously he was slightly acquainted; and this circumstance changed their acquaintance into intimacy, if not friendship. In some respects their characters were dissimilar; L'Estrange was professedly a "man of pleasure"—pleasure (mistaken for happiness) was his idol; indulgence of every sense was his notion of "knowing how to live." He was thoughtless, and, (externally at least,) gay: religion and religious people excited his merriment; he pitied and despised them from his heart. He believed that among them there were many sincere but foolish people, who lost the pleasures of this life in the vain hope of procuring thereby some undefinable happiness hereafter—called "heaven;" a place and a condition the existence of which he doubted; and he held himself at liberty, while he doubted, to act as if he was certain that no such place existed. Brown was as worldly as L'Estrange, but he was a less amiable character. He followed pleasure as earnestly, yet he never seemed to obtain even a momentary happiness from it; he loved reading, but it was of a licentious or infidel kind. He loved poetry, but chiefly that of an infidel or irreligious stamp. He was, to some extent, a thinking man; but he rejected religion as a fable, and religious people as consisting of fools and hypocrites; which predominated, he neither knew nor cared.

Brown had a brother, who, at the time of our narrative, was also at Belapoor. Charles Brown was as unlike his brother in natural as in religious character. Naturally of a cheerful and cordial disposition—his heart had been led to consider the great truths of Christianity, as set forth by Mr. Turpin, a missionary at Belapoor, and heartily to embrace them. He consequently belonged to a comparative small band, who were in derision called "New-lights." Being a married man, his brother's house would not have been a fit residence for him; when, therefore, he visited Belapoor he lodged at Mr. Turpin's.

Thither William Brown was frequently invited during his brother's stay, and, out of regard to him, William endured the "cant and humbug" of the missionary's house. But if he listened with outward decorum to hymns, and Holy Scripture and to religious discourse, his heart had no share in these things. All that he heard seemed but to increase his scorn for, and bitter antipathy to "Methodism," as he called it; and when he returned to his own house, his great delight was to entertain L'Estrange with a full recital of all that he had heard—all, however, grossly burlesqued, and this by the aid of a remarkably accurate memory, added to a ready wit, he was enabled to do, to the no small amusement of his friend.

Things thus proceeded for some weeks. William B.'s visits to the missionary's always furnished him with material for a recitation on his return to his own house; but the bold blasphemies which he uttered on those occasions gradually more and more horrified L'Estrange, while some of the solemn truths (ironically repeated by Brown) uttered by Mr. Turpin, rung in his ears. The words—"What shall it profit a man if he gain the whole world and lose his own soul?" excited a momentary laugh when uttered by Brown with mock solemnity; but these and similar texts occurred to L'Estrange, in after moments; and then followed the question—"What, if these things should be true?" The effect of these thoughts was to make Brown's recitations more and more distasteful to L'Estrange, till, at length, he expressed his weariness of them, and his wonder that Brown could make so bad a return for Mr. Turpin's hospitality, as to turn him into constant ridicule. Brown was surprised at these remarks; but his surprise was greatly increased when, shortly after this, L'Estrange said—"I think that I should like to know Mr. Turpin. Will you introduce me to him?" "Certainly," said Brown, with a sneer, "and I hope that your soul may benefit by his godly admonitions!"

The "hope," thus sarcastically expressed, was realized. L'Estrange was struck with the unaffected cheerfulness which pervaded Mr. Turpin's family. The truths of Christianity seemed there to be felt as a reality; and when Mr. T. read and expounded Scripture, L'Estrange thought, "How solemn and important are these words! How is it possible that I have hitherto lived regardless of them?" L'Estrange's character underwent a total revolution, and as he had been earnest in the pursuit of what he then believed to be happiness, so was he now decided in embracing the life of a Christian. To one whom he had known and ridiculed as a religious man, he thus wrote—"How delighted should I be to meet you now. When we last met I despised you as a 'saint;' now I despise myself, and marvel at the grace of God, who has had mercy on such a sinner as I am." From this time till his death, which occurred a few years after this, at a remote station, L'Estrange never faltered in his Christian course. His end was peace. A brother officer, who attended on his dying hours, writing of him said—"May my last end be like his!"

William Brown outlived L'Estrange by some years; but his dislike of religion, and its professors, in no degree abated—he became morose in character, and addicted to intemperance, from the effects of which he died suddenly, without a friend or countryman near. We cannot follow him to the presence of his God.

FARMING OPERATIONS FOR JULY.

(From the Irish Farmers' Gazette.)

HAYMAKING will generally form the chief operation for the month—particularly that of the artificial grasses, which should be cut and saved early in the month; avoid cutting in wet weather, or, at least, while the grass is saturated with wet, and have the spread-ground well raked up before the dew falls, to enjoy the earliest sunshine and air to dry it before spreading out; for details see the GAZETTE of last week.

Turnips.—Finish turnip sowing as early as possible, and proceed with the hoeing and singling of those already sown and advanced into rough leaf. The horse-hoe should commence these operations, which should be adjusted so as to hoe within two or three inches of the plants, reducing the ridge to about four inches in width, leaving the plants standing about two inches above the general level; the hand-hoes then proceed, and by alternately pushing and pulling, leaving small tufts of plants at the required distance, and destroying all between. Dry weather should be chosen for these operations, as the tools work clean, and the sun quickly dries up and destroys the young plants, and weeds eat up. In a few days the drill-grubbers should be put on to loosen up and expose fresh surfaces of soil to the disintegrating influence of the atmosphere, and bring to the surface any root weeds which may be buried. This grubbing or hoeing should be repeated at intervals, till the crop is so far advanced as to be injured by trespassing on it.

Carrots and parsnips require like treatment with the more advanced turnips, and the singling completed, if not already done, and the young plants appearing since the last hoeing, pulled or hoed out.

Mangel-wurzel and sugar beet must also be frequently horse-hoed and grubbed during the month.

Rape, if sown broadcast, should be hoed as soon as sufficiently high, to eight or ten inches apart; if sown in drills, it should be hoed and singled out as turnips are. Rape sown for transplanting in the stubble land should be thinned out to six inches apart to insure good plants for that purpose, otherwise they will be drawn up weakly, with slender, crooked stems; the thinnings may be planted in nursery beds, well dug and manured, and will make fine plants to range out in August and September. Continue sowing rape during the month as the land gets ready.

Flax should be pulled as soon as ready, which is known by the seed vessels turning a brownish colour, which is generally from the middle to the end of the month. The bolls may be separated by rippling in the field at once, or after the flax is dried in stook before ricking, or it may be ricked with the seed on, on the Courtrai system, and the seed removed in the spring before steeping. The details will be found in another part of our columns of this week. Rape or stone turnips is frequently sown with much profit on the flax stubble.

Corn crops.—This will be the best time to clean the crops of wheat, oats, or barley, of smut. A couple of careful men or boys will go over a large breadth in the day, cutting off the smutted ears with a knife or scissors, letting the severed ear drop to the ground; thus no smut can be bound up with the sheaves, or injure the sample in thrashing.

Peas.—In early localities, early sown peas may be fit for harvesting by the end of the month; when fit they may be mown, or reaped, rolled into bundles, and left to dry, and turned over daily till fit for stacking.

Beans.—The Russian bean, if sown in October last, may be fit for harvesting by the end of the month; they may be reaped, tied in small sheaves with straw bands, and stooked; in dry weather they may be laid on the bands, but not tied, for a few days, which cures the crop more speedily.

Bere and Rye will be ready for the sickle before the end of the month in early localities. Cut before the grain is dead ripe, and bind and stook immediately. Rape may be either sown or planted, or stone turnips be sown as a stolen crop, on the stubbles.

Cabbages should now be planted out with as little delay as possible.

IS THE PROTESTANT BIBLE A CORRUPT AND MUTILATED TRANSLATION OF THE HOLY SCRIPTURES?

We have shown in late numbers the high testimony borne to the Protestant translation of the Bible, in the fact that those who have had to correct and amend the Douay Bible have relied so largely on the Protestant Bible for their corrections. This striking fact may naturally lead candid Roman Catholics to consider whether the Protestant translation may not, perhaps, be right in the things in which the Douay Bible yet differs from it. It must be remembered that many of the things which the Douay Bible has now, at last, adopted from the Protestant Bible, as being right, were long cried out against, even by very learned Roman Catholics, as being gross faults and heresies in the Protestant Bible. It seems now that these outcries and heavy charges, made by learned Roman Catholics against the Protestant Bible, were not sufficient proof that the Protestant Bible was wrong, since in those very things the Douay Bible has now been corrected to agree with it. The Protestant Bible is, therefore, confessed to have been right in those things, notwithstanding the accusations of such learned men as Dr. Wurd. And, therefore, candid men will think that it is, at least, possible that the Protestant Bible may still be right in the things in which it is still cried out against. This probability derives great confirmation from the fact noticed by Mr. Collette, in our last number, that where the Douay Bible still differs from the Protestant Bible, explanations taken from the Protestant Bible are put in the notes of the Douay Bible. It is further confirmed by the fact, that one edition of the Douay Bible, still further corrected by the Protestant Bible, has been lately published by a learned Roman Catholic bishop in America, Dr. Kenrick. We have, therefore, every reason to expect that the Douay Bible, in some time to come, will be still further corrected by the Protestant Bible; and, therefore, we may fairly invite a calm and candid consideration of the points in which they still differ.

There are two points of principal importance in which the two translations still differ—First, where the Protestant Bible has the word "repent," the Douay Bible, generally, has the words "do penance;" and, secondly, where the Douay Bible has the word "priest," the Protestant Bible, generally, has the word "elder." Our present business is to inquire which of these translations is the most correct—which most faithfully expresses the sense and meaning of the Scripture, as the Apostles wrote it in Greek.

With respect to the first of these points, the Greek word is μετανοειτε: and the question is, ought we to translate this "repent," or "do penance?"

Consider first the difference of these two translations:—"Repent" expresses a change of mind; it signifies sorrow of mind for what we have done, and a change of mind, by which we resolve to act otherwise in future. "Do penance" is taken, by all Roman Catholics, for performing, as a punishment on ourselves, works and actions which are painful to ourselves in the performance. The question comes simply to this—Does the Greek word mean to express the change which takes place in the mind within? or does it mean to express outward actions and works done?

Now, the Greek language, above any other language in the world, has a power of making the meaning of its words plain, by the derivation of the words. Young scholars in the Greek language are always taught to fix the meaning of Greek words in this way, by attending to the derivation of the words. We could have no better instance in this very word, μετανοειτε. It is derived from two other Greek words, joined together—the first is μετα, which signifies "afterwards," and νοος, which signifies the mind. We have a saying in English, that "second thoughts are best"—that means that we very often have need to change our thoughts and opinions. We are very apt to go wrong at first; and, on reflection and consideration, we find where we were wrong, and how we ought to change our minds. These second thoughts, or "after thoughts," are generally best; and this is evidently what is implied and expressed in joining together the Greek words, μετα (afterwards), and νοος (the mind). It can have no other meaning than a change of mind, following after reflection and consideration; and this is properly called "repentance." But those two Greek words have no fitness whatever in them to express the performance of outward actions that are painful in themselves.

This is so plain in the Greek words, that if both the Protestant and the Douay translations had been made by translating the Greek into English, there would, most probably, have been no difference between them in this.

And now some of our readers may ask, in astonishment, "And were not both these translations made by translating what the Apostles and Evangelists wrote in Greek?"

To this we answer, that indeed they were not. The Protestant translation was made by translating the Greek; but the Douay translation was not. In former times some one, we do not know who, translated the Greek into Latin, and then the Douay translators translated that Latin translation into English. They say this themselves in the preface of the first Douay Bible:—"We translate the old Vulgar Latin text, not the common Greek text." Now this is a round-about way, and evidently more liable to error; and this may explain why the correctors of the Douay translation should have found the Protestant translation so much more correct than their own.

This fact explains how the two translations come to differ about the words "repent" and "do penance." As we said before, if both had been translated from the original Greek, there would, probably, have been no difference between them; but the Douay translators translated from the Latin, in which they found the Latin words, "agite pœnitentiam." Now, "agite," taken by itself, is certainly Latin for "do;" but all Latin scholars know, that when joined thus with a substantive, it is not to be translated "do." For instance, if a schoolboy should meet in his lesson, "agite vitam," and should translate it "do your life," he would be whipped. He ought to translate it as if it were "vivite," "live." Let any one look at Ainsworth's Latin Dictionary, under the word "Ago," and he will read, "it is often rendered by the verb of its noun, as agere vitam, 'to live;'" there follows then about fifty instances of the same kind, taken from the best Latin authors, and among them "agere pœnitentiam, to repent," taken from Pliny the younger.

Therefore, it is likely that the Latin translator, whoever he was, when he wrote "agite pœnitentiam," meant simply to repent. But it is not only likely, but it is certain, and we have proof of it; for in St. Matthew's Gospel, ch. iv., v. 17, we have an account of the first beginning of our Saviour's preaching; and in St. Mark's Gospel, ch. i., v. 15, we have another account of the very same thing. St. Matthew and St. Mark both agree in reporting that our Saviour said μετανοειτε; yet in St. Matthew, the Douay translators put "do penance" for μετανοειτε; and in St. Mark, for the very same Greek word, they put "repent." So we have here their own confession, that "repent" is a good and proper translation of the word that our Saviour spoke. Why, then, should they insist on translating the very same words in St. Matthew's account of the very same discourse of the Saviour, "do penance?" When the two Evangelists put the same words in their two accounts as that which our Saviour spoke, why should the Douay translators insist on putting two different words, which they say mean different things? The reason of this is to be found in the Latin translation; in St. Matthew's account, the Latin translator wrote "pœnitentiam agite," for μετανοειτε; and in St. Mark's account he wrote, "pœnitemini" for the same Greek word. Is it not clear from this, that the Latin translator thought both forms of expression, in Latin, meant exactly the same thing, since he thought he might put either of them for the same Greek word? And we have seen from the dictionary that he was quite right. But then the Douay translators take hold of this difference, and they insist on putting two English words, which mean quite different things. Both the Evangelists, in reporting that same discourse of our Lord, relate that he used one and the same Greek word. Are we not bound, in translating those two accounts of the same discourse, to give that Greek word the same meaning in both accounts? Yet, because the Latin translator gave two different expressions for it in the two accounts—which two expressions mean the same in Latin—the Douay translators insist on putting two different meanings in the English translations.

Clearly, they must be wrong, either in the one place or the other, for both accounts report the same speech of our Lord, and in the same Greek word; therefore, whichever translation be right, that same translation should be given in both places.

We trust, therefore, that a time will come when some future correctors of the Douay Bible will see that it is their duty to consider which word ought to be put in both places. And we are satisfied that, if they consider it fairly, they will see from the reasons we have given above, that "repent" is the proper translation of μετανοειτε. And thus we may hope that this difference, also, between the two versions will, in time, disappear.

The more it is considered, the more ground there is to hope for this. For why is the word "do penance" kept in the Douay Bible? Is it not to give countenance and support to the Roman Catholic sacrament of penance? We all know that every passage where the words "do penance" occur in the Douay Bible, is constantly quoted to prove that penance is a sacrament of the Gospel: but the more this is examined, the more unsound it will plainly appear to be, for it is quite contrary to the Council of Trent itself. For the Council of Trent says (Sess. xiv., c. 1), that "penance is a sacrament, by which the benefit of the death of Christ is applied to those who have fallen after baptism." According to the Council of Trent, it would be profanation to give the sacrament of penance to those who were not yet baptized. No Roman Catholic priest will deny this. Now, it is clear, that in the discourse of our Saviour, of which we are speaking, he was telling men what they ought to do before they were baptized: and, therefore, it does not serve the Roman Catholic doctrine at all to translate it "do penance," as referring to the sacrament of penance. We have, therefore, every ground for hoping that, at the next correction of the Douay Bible, we will find this also changed to agree with the Protestant Bible, as so many things have been changed already.

We have not space here to consider the other important difference yet existing between the two translations, as to which "Priests" or "Elders" is best, but we will consider this in our next number.

CAN THE INFALLIBILITY OF THE CHURCH OF ROME BE PROVED FROM ECCLESIASTICAL HISTORY AND THE WRITINGS OF THE EARLIER FATHERS?

The theologians of the Church of Rome, when arguing against Protestants, usually endeavour, in the first instance, to establish their peculiar doctrines by the evidence of the written Word of God. A professed recognition of the authority of Scripture looks well, and removes the awkwardness that might result if Protestants alone appealed to the authentic records of inspiration. When the alleged Scripture proof of the characteristic doctrines of the Church of Rome is shown to be, at the very best, most precarious, her champions next fall back upon the stronghold of tradition, maintaining that she inculcates nothing but what has been transmitted by the teachers and preachers of the Church from age to age, beginning with the Apostolic times. And, when they are driven from this position also, they finally intrench themselves in what they deem the impregnable fortress of the authority of the living Church, which is invested with an infallible judicial power in articles of faith. This is a very summary and convenient mode of terminating a troublesome discussion, and accordingly, as might be expected, Roman Catholic controversialists avail themselves largely of it. It becomes, then, an inevitable and a most important question—Does such an infallible authority exist? and what are the proofs upon which its supposed existence rests?

Three classes of argument may be, and generally are, adduced to prove the infallibility of the Church of Rome—First, a priori arguments, derived from the nature of the case, and from the necessity which exists for an infallible interpreter of Scripture, and judge of controversy.

Secondly—Arguments drawn from Scripture, such as our Lord's commission to his Apostles, and His promises to Peter in particular.

Thirdly—Arguments derived from the history of the Church, and the recorded testimony of the earlier Fathers.

It is to the last of these heads that we propose to direct our immediate attention. The others have already been partially discussed in this Journal, and shall be more fully handled in succeeding Numbers.

Before we enter on our proposed subject, it may be well to premise a few observations relative to the defects under which, regarded even as a theory, the dogma of Infallibility still labours, and the consequent obscurity and uncertainty which we have to encounter in discussing it.

First, then, we are not told how we may be infallibly certain that such an attribute as Infallibility has been bestowed upon the Church at all: and, secondly, supposing it to have been conferred, we are not informed where it resides, what is its visible centre and organ. In other words, we are not told who or what is infallible, or why. The Council of Trent, which decided so many points, determined nothing on the great subject of Infallibility. Nor was the omission undesigned. The Papal Legates were strictly enjoined, on no account whatever, to allow any discussion concerning the authority of the Pope. The cause of this reserve it is not difficult to assign, when we bear in mind that the opinions of some of the greatest authorities of the Church of Rome have been, and still are, divided as to the seat of Infallibility. There are, at least, six different opinions upon the subject: some lodging the gift with the Pope speaking ex cathedra; others, with the Pope in the council of Cardinals; others, with the Pope in a general or provincial council; others, in a general council without the Pope; and others, lastly, in the Church diffusive—that is to say, in the whole body of believers throughout the world. Under these six general heads may be found grouped a great number of minor differences. Nor is this all. Even though we should grant (what Bellarmine maintains is agreed upon by all the members of his church) that infallibility is lodged with the Pope in general council, yet it has never been formally determined what Popes have been true Popes; which of the many de facto, or rival Popes, are to be acknowledged de jure. Nor, again, which of the many professed General Councils are really so. A Roman Catholic might, at this moment, deny the existing Pope to be the successor of St. Peter, without offending against any article his creed. And, as to General Councils, while the Gallican Church receives the Councils of Basil and Constance wholly, the Roman Church rejects them both in part. The acts of other Councils are admitted to be adulterated, without any attempt being made to correct them. "This inconsistency in the Romish system," to use the language of the celebrated Dr. Newman,* "one might almost call providential. Nothing could be better adapted than it is to defeat the devices of human wisdom, and to show to thoughtful inquirers the hollowness of even the most specious counterfeit of Divine truth. The theologians of Rome have been able dexterously to smoothen over a thousand inconsistencies, and to array the heterogeneous precedents of centuries, in the semblance of design and harmony. But they cannot complete their system in its most important and essential point. They can determine, in theory, the nature, degree, extent, and object of the infallibility which they claim; they cannot agree among themselves where it resides. As in the building of Babel, the Lord has confounded their language, and the structure stands half finished, a monument at once of human daring and its failure."

No wonder, then, that the Council of Trent did not see fit to lay down any positive statement respecting a point so much contested as this, especially as the claim to Papal infallibility was not distinctly asserted until the dawn of the Reformation. This we shall hereafter prove by the conclusive evidence of facts; for the present we shall content ourselves with merely stating it in general terms. Nor, be it remembered, is this assertion, however startling it may appear, made only by Protestants. The main object of the famous Bossuet's Vindication of the Gallican Synod of 1682, was to prove that the doctrine of the infallibility of the Pope was altogether of modern origin; that for many centuries it had never been held under any form; and that, even down to the 16th century, there were ample proofs of its not having been regarded as an article of faith. He proves this by the decrees of Councils, by the testimony of Fathers, Doctors, and Schoolmen, and by the declarations of Popes themselves, amongst others by the following words of Pope Hadrian VI., when he was professor at Louvain—"If by the Roman Church he meant its Head, the Pontiff, it is certain that he may err, even in things pertaining to faith, in asserting heresy either by his decision or decretal; for many Roman pontiffs have been heretics."* Such was the opinion of the famous Bishop of Meaux, of whom Roman Catholics are so justly proud. This opinion was also maintained by the great Church historians Fleury and Dupin. These profound scholars knew full well, and were honest enough to confess it, that the evidence of ecclesiastical history was utterly opposed to the modern doctrine of the infallibility of the Church of Rome. They knew full well that Pope Liberius had fallen into Arianism, and Pope Vigilius into Eutychianism. They knew that Pope Honorius espoused the heresy of the Monothelites, and was condemned as a heresiarch by Pope Leo II. and his successors.† They knew that the profession of faith of the Popes in the 9th century contained the following clause, in which the possession of infallibility is expressly disclaimed—"We strictly anathematize those, whether ourselves or any others, who shall presume to put forward anything novel, contrary to the evangelical tradition, and the integrity of the orthodox faith and the Christian religion; or shall attempt to change anything, or subtract from the integrity of our faith, or consent to those who, with sacrilegious daring, presume to do so."‡

It is, we repeat, no wonder that the Council of Trent, with such irresistible evidence before it as to the comparative novelty of the doctrine of the infallibility of the Church of Rome, carefully abstained from publishing any decree upon the subject. In our next number we shall proceed to show more in detail that the existing records of Christian antiquity utterly refute the notion of an infallible authority being lodged in any manner in the Church, and specially that the Church of Rome was at any time regarded as its depositary.

* Si per Ecclesiam Romanam intelligatur caput ejus, puta Pontifex, certum est quod possit errare, etiam in iis quæ tangunt fidem, hæresiam per suam determinationem aut decretalem asserendo; plures enim fuere Pontifices Romani hæretici.

† In the "Liber Diurnus Romanorum Pontificum" (ed. Paris, 1680), which was used to the 8th century at the consecration of the Popes, we find the following solemn public declaration made by them:—"Auctores novi hæretici dogmatis Sergium, &c., una cum Honorio qui pravis eorum assertionibus fomentum impendit, cum suprà satis hæreticis, Sabellium, &c., exercumur ac condemnamus."

THE CATHOLIC DOCTRINE ON THE USE OF THE BIBLE.

BY HIS EMINENCE CARDINAL WISEMAN.

In our last number we gave our readers the threefold grounds on which Cardinal Wiseman states that his Church refuses to give the Bible indifferently to all.

The Cardinal proceeds thus:—

"Immediately we hear the words, 'Ha! You own you are afraid of the Bible—you dare not trust your people with it. You acknowledge that if they read it, they would abandon the unity of the Church, and seek relief in the liberty of the Gospel." To this we reply, that we fear anything which we see in others baneful."

He then goes on to argue that in early times the indiscriminate reading of Scripture was an impossibility, because few could read; the faithful heard the word read in the Church, and heard the sermons of Augustine, Chrysostom, or Ambrose. "The instances were few in which any one dreamt of judging for himself, and when he did, he became a schismatic or a heretic. The Church continued through centuries, and as the deepening darkness of the ages into which she descended clouded literature, the more difficult became self-willed interpretation. But, when a revived civilization infused a bold spirit into the world, with the learning of the Pagans came back their haughty spirit. Sensualism incarnated in Luther, fatalism embodied in Calvin, the luxury and the philosophy of ancient Rome, its epicureanism and its stoicism, came to battle with the Church. Luther, by teaching that every man may sin as he likes, if he only have faith—Calvin, by proclaiming that a predestined fatalism imperiously domineers over his actions, opened each his door to vice and crime, unchecked and unbounded. Both agreed in one means of gaining partisans, by setting up the private judgment—that is, the pride of each one, against what had held undisputed sway over the minds of all. Whoever read the Bible was to get rid of all the restraints and holy ordinances of confession, fasting, mortification, monachism, celibacy, penances, &c., and was to live by a rule of his own making, in the liberty which his passions could wring from conscience." The Church, to meet this evil, struck at the root of it, encountered its principle. This was, had the individual the right—not merely to read, but to interpret Scripture according to his private judgment, and follow this in preference to the Church's teaching? To this she answered—"No." But the evil was practical; she met it by separating the two—the reading and the interpretation. She allows the first—"where there is no danger of the second." Three things were necessary for this division: First—an accurate version; secondly—such annotations as keep before the reader the Church's teaching; and, thirdly—such good sense, knowledge, and piety, as would give security that the reader did not belong to the class of "the unlearned and unstable," and would not pervert his own fancies to the authorized interpretations of the Church. To all who came within these conditions, the reading of the Bible in the vulgar tongue was, and is, permitted. The pastors of the church could alone be the judges of their existence. "In countries like this,* in which the very antagonism of Catholics with Protestants keeps alive, and before their minds constantly, the two opposing principles of Church authority and free judgment, restriction is less necessary and scarcely exists; and, on the other hand, in Catholic countries, such as can read, or do read, have access to the Latin version without restraint."

An historical glance at the Reformation, by a Roman Catholic prelate, would be incomplete indeed if it did not include the usual misrepresentations respecting Luther and Calvin. They persuade themselves, by what process of reasoning we know not, that the merits of the controversy are affected by the personal character of the former, and by charges of sensuality against him. The Church of England does not pledge herself to follow the views of either Luther or Calvin, and we advert to this part of the subject not to refute any charge against either of those eminent men, but merely to say in passing, that nothing can be more untrue or inaccurate than the representation given here by Cardinal Wiseman of their doctrines. Nowhere has Luther maintained that "A man may sin as he likes, if he only have faith," and we do not believe that Calvin ever proclaimed "that a predetermined fatalism imperiously domineers over men's actions." Predestination and election are not doctrines confined exclusively to the followers of Calvin, and have been as much maintained and controverted among divines of the Church of Rome themselves as they are among Protestants.

The Cardinal then proceeds to say, that though the Scriptures may be permitted, without restraint, to those who can read Latin, yet the church does not urge them on the people, does not encourage them to read them, does not spread them to the utmost; and for the following reasons:—Whatever is God's work is made at once complete; he "rests from it" when he has accomplished it. Modifications and variations may appear in its secondary parts, but as to organization all is perfect. Thus it was with the creation—so with man. What God does in the physical world, created that man might live, he has done in the spiritual order, established that man might live for ever. When God bestows a system for the spiritual and eternal life it is by revelation. The first revelation completely developed was the old law. This system was delivered in a few days; the brief code of ten moral precepts, the full system of ecclesiastical law, the doctrine of clean and unclean, a priesthood, a worship, a ritual, a calendar—all was given at once; and, to this (saving additional commemorative festivals) nothing was ever added. Yet, at this time, the Book of Genesis (and perhaps that of Job) was the most that was written; the Pentateuch was finished in forty years; then some historical books were added—Joshua, Judges, Ruth, and Kings. How were men saved in the meantime? How could worship be carried on without the chaunts of David? Four hundred years passed before this, to us apparently necessary, portion of the Old Testament was composed, &c. The giving of the Jewish law was the work then of a few hours; the formation of its Scriptures was the work of a thousand years. The first resembled the creation of man; the second, the record of his civilization, The first was life, the second culture. Whatever was necessary to life, that is, salvation, was complete at once. Comparing this course of the first revelation with that of the second, Cardinal Wiseman commences with the descent of the Holy Spirit on the day of Pentecost, which he likens to that of the same spirit on the chaotic elements of the material world. In the apostles there were laid up, unconsciously, the rudiments of the future church—its primacy, episcopate, priesthood, sacraments, powers. There lay locked up commissions of boundless magnitude, to be teachers of the learned, conquerors of the strong, confounders of the proud, salt of the earth, light of the world. When the Spirit descended on them, their latent powers burst into life; the Church in all its perfection and beauty is born to all the world, to all ages. Not to mention Mary, who, the Cardinal asserts, was present, with others, when three thousand laymen were joined to the clergy in a few hours. As completely as the child is the same as the man, so is the Church of Whitsunday that of the third or the nineteenth century. The hierarchy, which is to spread its harmonious rule over the world is there, and Peter already leads its force, and centres in himself its union. The faithful are gathered round them, not to dispute but to learn; they persevered in the breaking of bread, which the Cardinal calls the eucharistic sacrifice and sacrament. Many came to the Apostles confessing their sins, who placed their hands on the baptized, gave them the Holy Ghost—ordained new ministers; and soon the sick were anointed with oil, and were healed in soul and body. There was no room for further revelation. Whatever might be written by an inspired apostle could only be a record of what was already known and believed, a truly important, sacred, invaluable record—a treasure of wisdom—a gift of God, but still incapable of adding to the deposit of faith safely lodged in the Church's keeping. The first Gospel does not appear for twelve years after; and the Gospel of St. John was not written for sixty years after the death of our Lord. If this Gospel had formed a part of a plan of essential salvation, St. John would not have risked such a lengthened space, till he was an aged man, &c. It was, in fact, a new heresy that tempted him to write: had it come a few years later we might have been deprived of his heavenly Gospel. We cannot imagine how a spiritual Jew lived, before a psalm, or a proverb, or prophecy enlightened him, or how Christians grew to perfection, and died for the faith, before a line of the New Testament was penned. They heard, no doubt, the words and actions of our Lord, but only from faithful witnesses—not under the safe-guard of inspiration. Might not the reminiscences written down fresh have satisfied future ages as well, and yet inspiration have been withheld? And as to faith, Jesus Christ had not promised inspiration to his Apostles' writing, but infallibility in teaching. Still the Church, with gratitude and reverence, accepts, cherishes, and prizes the gift of his words to man. When she unfolds it, and reads to her children the smallest passage of her spouse's life, she orders the tapers of the sanctuary to burn round it, and the incense to perfume the atmosphere, and when the priest kisses the blessed text, and whispers his prayer—"Per evangelica dicta deleantur nostra delicta," he expresses more confidence in the Gospel than all the speeches in Exeter Hall can match. Nothing can exceed the value the Church sets on this inheritance, which is exclusively hers, and of which she alone holds the record and the key. But she would be departing from her duty, and from truth, if she held out the Scriptures as the appointed channels of salvation. These existed in their fulness before they were written; in the old law before the Bible; in the new, before the Testament. The means of eternal life contained by the Church are what she urges on the people; she desires them to employ the means of grace confided to her alone—the ministry of her priesthood, in exhortation, reproof, advice, direction—the devout use of the sacraments, especially penance and the eucharist—the employment of prayer, meditation, and watchfulness over the conscience. Such are the means by which saving grace was given. To Bible reading no such gift has been attached. The Cardinal professes to answer the difficulty which he anticipates—that as each book was added to the canon of the Old Testament, a new obligation was imposed of receiving and believing that book; and so a new condition of salvation was added to the law; and so the compilation of the new brought with it a new belief in its inspiration and truth, and thus modified the terms of salvation originally granted. He gives what he terms a brief and simple answer. In each case provision is made for the future contingency. In the old law Moses teaches that prophets will arise which they must hear (quoting Deut. xviii., 18), and the new law had its provision for future inspiration. And where? In the belief of that authority which could alone attest inspiration and sanction a canon. What the line of prophets was in the old law, the unbroken continuance of Divine authority is in the new. It was the church which gave to Christendom a uniform canon, a work not completed till the age of councils. The principle of believing whatever the Church should define, is the very first and fundamental one laid down in the organization of the Church from the beginning. It is not a new condition of salvation, but only an application of one laid down at the very births of Judaism and of Christianity.

We have abstracted this argument at some length, and in Cardinal Wiseman's own words, in order to give the fairest view of its substance; and we would ask, is there from beginning to end of it an argument against at least the free reading of the Scriptures, or a reason why the Roman Catholic Church, even while she denies the right to interpret Scripture, should not urge the reading of it, in her own authorized translation, on every one of her members who is able to read? We regret that want of space prevents us from examining every part of this argument in detail. We must content ourselves with a few words by way of caution to such of our readers as might be misled by specious language, addressed to minds predisposed to that side of the question. First, Cardinal Wiseman professes to give reasons for not urging and encouraging the reading of the Scriptures; what he does defend, however, is a very different thing—namely, that his church does not hold out the Scriptures to man "as the appointed channels of salvation," which, he says, "existed in their fulness before they were written," &c. A good deal may turn upon the meaning of terms; if these words were understood in their ordinary sense we should say, "neither do Protestants so hold them out." Our present purpose, however, is merely to point out that the Cardinal shifts his ground, and writes in defence of one thing while professing to excuse another. It is clear, that though his church considers her own authority and the means she says she possesses as the appointed channels of salvation, and holds them and not the Scriptures out as such, this does not afford a reason for not encouraging the reading of Scripture, and inviting her children to view and examine this "charter of her authority," this "storehouse of her evidences," this "armoury of her defence."

Secondly, There is nothing in this argument which might not have been, with equal force, replied to our Saviour, when he referred the Jews to the Scriptures, as bearing testimony of him, and when he told them that they erred, "not knowing the Scriptures." They might have answered—"We set an inestimable value on those invaluable records, those treasures of wisdom, but we will not encourage the reading of them, because the law was delivered to Moses in a few hours, and the Scriptures were not completed for centuries after; they were incapable of adding to the deposit of faith safely lodged in the church's keeping." Our Saviour would have replied to them, as he did at times reprove them—"In vain do they worship me, teaching for doctrines the commandments of men." "Why do you transgress the commandment of God by your traditions?" "Ye have made the commandment of God of none effect by your traditions," &c.

Thirdly, Great care and caution is necessary in reading this argument, and, indeed, the whole tract, to distinguish between what is true and what is false—what is supported by reference to Divine authority, and what rests upon bare assertion, sometimes on bare insinuation. The fanciful deposit of the rudiments, the primacy, the episcopate, the priesthood, the sacraments, the powers of the church, with the boundless commissions, and the titles of highest dignity in the persons of the Apostles while yet rude and uninspired, is a tasteful and poetical idea, but it has no other foundation than the brilliant imagination of Cardinal Wiseman. The division of the persons present at the feast of Pentecost into clergy and laity, and the representation of the hierarchy as led by Peter, rest upon no better basis. The interpretation of the words "breaking of bread" into the Eucharistic sacrifice, the application of the anointing with oil, &c., are matters of controversy; and our objection to the use of them in this argument is, that though Cardinal Wiseman's arguments are written for Roman Catholics, yet, when one undertakes to answer objections, he should not do so on grounds which the objectors themselves deny to be true. If he does not undertake to give an answer resting on undisputed facts or doctrines, but upon grounds established by the authority of his Church alone, there is no use in this elaborate reasoning at all. The short proposition—"the Church wills it"—is sufficient in the eyes of his Roman Catholic readers; at least it is as convincing as a long train of argument referable in the end to the same ground. The same may be said of the argument founded on the text—"If he will not hear the Church," &c. It is founded upon what Protestants assert is a perversion of the text, and also upon the assumption that the Church of Rome is identical with the primitive Church; that the "Church of Whitsunday" is the Roman Catholic Church of "the nineteenth century."

Cardinal Wiseman concludes with an eloquent protestation of the great love and reverence in which he holds the written Word, the "book of his predilection from earliest youth." What a pity that his love should resemble that of the miser, who hoards his treasure and hides it from the public view, instead of putting it in circulation, for the benefit of himself and the community! What boots it that the kiss, unmatched by the speeches of Exeter Hall, is imprinted on its page, that tapers are lighted about it, that the air is perfumed around it with incense, while it lies closed before the priest? The primary object apparent throughout this tract, that which suggests every disparaging expression, which dictates each irreverent jest at the Bible, its readers, and its "ludicrous translations," is the exaltation of the priesthood, and the complete subjection of the laity—body, soul, and mind—beneath the yoke of their authority. If, in his zeal for this object, Cardinal Wiseman has used arguments unworthy of his high reputation and acknowledged ability, we will do him the justice to express our opinion that he was forced to resort to them for lack of better.

We now take leave of him, wishing him, notwithstanding all his professions, more love, more reverence for the Word of God, and a more constant perusal and study of its pages, commending to his attention especially those parts where our Lord directs that His Gospel shall be preached, (not necessarily by word of month only,) proclaimed and published, not only to every nation, but to every creature: and we venture to assure him that no impediment he can raise, no frantic efforts of his Church and her priesthood, can impede the working of the wonderful and glorious Word of God; that it will still have "free course;" it will never return void to its Giver, but will prosper in the thing whereunto He hath sent it, and by its blessed influence, diffused throughout the whole earth, there will, spite of Priest, Pope, or Cardinal, be daily added to THE TRUE CHURCH OF CHRIST such as shall be saved.

THE OLD IRISH CLERGY.

NO. II.

In illustrating the mode of hereditary succession to ecclesiastical offices and benefices, which prevailed among the ancient Irish, we commenced with a case connected with Clonmacnoise, because the accidental circumstance of the great eminence and repute in their native Church to which the family brought under our notice in that instance attained, has been the means of preserving to us a much more detailed and accurate account of such a succession in their case, than we are able to cite in any other. Next, it might seem a natural course for us to direct our inquiries to the principal religious establishments founded by the three Patron Saints of Ireland, and examine how far anything similar to what we have noticed at Clonmacnoise, may be observable in connection with them—i. e. with Armagh, St. Patrick's principal foundation; Derry and Iona, similarly connected with the name of St. Columbkille; and Kildare, no less famously associated with the memory of St. Brigid. It will be more convenient, however, to pursue a somewhat different order, and, before coming to speak of these last-named foundations, to refer to some other cases which furnish very striking illustrations of the topic now under examination.

1. The interesting ruins of the old church of Killeshin, situated about two Irish miles west of the town of Carlow, mark a spot which was distinguished, in very early times of Irish Church history, as the site of an ecclesiastical establishment of no small celebrity—it having been presided over in the beginning of the tenth century by one who bore the dignity of Archbishop of Leinster. The first mention of the place (by its ancient name, Gleann Uiscan) in the Annals of the Four Masters, is at A.D. 843, where we read that "Aedhan, of Gleann Uiscan, died" in that year. From this period on to A.D. 1082, the place is repeatedly mentioned in the same Annals; and in the interval between occur the obits [i. e. entries of the deaths] of nine Abbots and one Erenach. Among these are the following:—

A.D. 874. DERMOT, son of Corprey, Abbot of Gleann Uiscan, died.

A.D. 915. [At the great battle of Confey, near Leixlip, fell, among others of the nobility] the archbishop MAELMOGUE, son of Dermot, who was of the Ui-Conaonla [tribe], a distinguished scribe, anchorite, &c.

A.D. 917. DONNELL, son of Dermot, Abbot of Gleann Uiscan, died.

A.D. 938. ANVEY, son of Donnell, Abbot of Gleann Uiscan, died.

A.D. 946. CASEY, son of Donnell, Abbot of Gleann Uiscan, died.

A.D. 951. FELIMY, foster son of Maelmogue, Abbot of Gleann Uiscan, sage of Leinster, died,

A.D. 977. FLAN, son of Maelmogue, Erenach of Gleann Uiscan, died.

A.D. 986. KENCORACH, son of Anvey, Abbot of Gleann Uiscan, died.

A.D. 1016. DERMOT Ua Maelmogue [i. e. grandson, or descendant, of Maelmogue], Abbot of Gleann Uiscan, died.

The first abbot here named [i.e. Dermot] was accordingly, as it seems, father to the two next abbots, Maelmogue and Donnell. His son, Maelmogue, who succeeded him, was archbishop as well as abbot, and was father to the Erenach FLAN, mentioned in the seventh entry above. Donnell, brother and successor to Maelmogue, was father to Abbot Casey, named in the fifth entry. Abbot Anvey, successor to Donnell, was father to abbot Kencorach, named in the eighth entry. Abbot Felimy succeeded as foster son (a relationship valued among the Irish as much as that of natural sonship), to Archbishop Maelmogue. Perhaps Maelmogue adopted him before the birth of his own son, Flan, who was erenach of the place more than twenty-five years afterwards.

As it would be tedious to repeat similar observations on all the cases of successions of this kind which remain to be submitted to the reader's notice, we shall, in those which next follow, merely give the lists of names and dates from the Annals of the Four Masters, and trust to the reader's sagacity to observe the interesting connection that seems to subsist between the several parties concerned.

2. In connection with the church of Killtoom, near Castlepollard, in the County Westmeath, five obits of ecclesiastics occur in the Annals. Four of which are these following:—

A.D. 746. Eochy, of Killtoom, died.

A.D. 808. Kellach, son of Eochy, Abbot of Killtoom, died.

A.D. 849. Colga, son of Kellach, Abbot of Killtoom, died.

A.D. 883. Rovertach, son of Colga,* Abbot of Killtoom, died.

3. Lusk is a very well-known place in the County Dublin, midway between the Irish metropolis and the town of Drogheda. Its church was also a very distinguished one in ancient times, as appears by the frequent mention made of it in the Irish Annals. The following interesting list of abbots and other official persons belonging to it, is constructed from the notices of the place, occurring in the Four Masters:—

A.D. 731, CRUNNMAEL, son of Colga, Abbot of Lusk, [died].

A.D. 779 [properly, 784], CONALL, son of Crunnael, Abbot of Lusk, [died].

* In this entry, Dr. O'Donovan's translation has Colgan, by mistake, for Colga: Colgan, in the original, being the genitive case of the name Colga, or Colgu. If Colgan were the right English, the original should have been Colgain, the genitive of Colgan. We omit giving the Irish in full, to save space for more copious extracts.

A.D. 782 [properly, 787], COLGA, son of Crunmael, Abbot of Lusk, died.

A.D. 786 [properly, 791], MURRAY, son of Ængus, Abbot of Lusk, died.

A.D. 791 [properly, 796], MOYNAGH, son of Ængus, Prior of Lusk, died.

A.D. 799 [properly, 804], CORMAC, son of Conall, œconomus [bursar, treasurer, or 'spenser,'] of Lusk, died.

A.D. 800 [properly, 805], MOYNAGH, son of Colga, Abbot of Lusk, died.

A.D. 838, MULRONEY, son of Cahal, Vice-Abbot of Lusk, died.

A.D. 848, RURY [i.e. Roderic], Abbot of Lusk, died.

A.D. 878, ENACAN, son of Rury, Abbot of Lusk, died.

A.D. 891, MURRAY, son of Mulroney, Prior of Lusk, died.

A.D. 902, FLANN, son of Enacan, Abbot of Lusk, died.

A.D. 927, TOOLE, son of Enacan, Bishop of Dulcek and Lusk, and steward of the family of Patrick [died. The office he held as 'steward,' &c., Dr. O'Donevan explains to be that of Proctor of Armagh.]

A.D. 1055, OWAR O'Murray. Erenach of Lusk, and Chief of Ui-Colgain, died.

A.D. 1059, ANNESLEY, son of Owar, Erenach of Lusk [died].

4. By tracing through the Annals the different places in which mention is made of the religious establishment at Slane, in the Co. Meath, we are able to exhibit for it also a succession very closely similar in character to the preceding, as follows:—

A.D. 746, COLMAN of the Britons, son of Faelan, Abbot of Slane, died.

A.D. 768, MOYNAGH, son of Colman, Abbot of Slane and Kilbrew, died.

A.D. 782 [properly, 787], ROVARTACH, son of Moynagh, Œconomus [i.e., House-steward, or Bursar] of Slane, and Abbot of Kilbrew, died.

A.D. 784 [properly, 789], FEADHACH, son of Cormac, Abbot of Louth, Slane, and Duleek, died.

A.D. 797 [properly, 802], AILILL, son of Cormac, Abbot of Slane, a wise man and a learned judge, died.

A.D. 801 [properly, 806], Congal, son of Moynagh, Abbot of Slane, a learned sage and pure virgin, died.

A.D. 809 [properly, 814], Sweeny, son of Moynagh, Œconomus of Slane, died.

A.D. 823, COLMAN, son of Ailill, Abbot of Slane, and also of other churches in France and Ireland, died.

A.D. 838, COLMAN, son of Rovartach, Abbot of Slane, died.

A.D. 843, Lowry, son of Ailill. Abbot of Slane, died.

A.D. 847, Rovartach, son of Colga, Abbot of Slane, died.

A.D. 886, MAELPATRICK, son of Niall, Abbot of Slane, died.

A.D. 920, COLGA, son of Feadhach, Abbot of Slane, died.

A.D. 935, Feadhach, Abbot of Slane, died.

A.D. 938, Sweeny, son of Cu-Breatan, Abbot of Slane, killed by the foreigners [i.e., the Danes].

A.D 946, COLMAN, son of Maelpatrick, Erenach of Slane, killed by the foreigners.

A.D. 954, Maelpatrick, son of Cu-Breatan, Erenach of Slane, died.

A.D. 956, LOOEY, son of Colga, Erenach of Slane, died.

A.D. 1001, KAYLEY, son of Sweeny, Abbot of Slane, died.

A.D. 1053, DONNELL UA KAYLEY [i.e., grandson, or descendant, of Kayley], Erenach of Slane, died.

The series now given, it will be seen, runs through a period of 300 years, commencing just at the same part of our history as that where the MacConnemoght family, mentioned in the preceding paper, is first discernible in the Annals. How decidedly the succession to those ecclesiastical offices at Slane, which are above mentioned, was a family matter, is sufficiently evident from inspection of the names given in connection with those offices, together with the dates accompanying the different entries, and observing the relationships which thus appear to exist between the several persons named in them. If we are unable to trace the family character of the succession in question to an earlier date, it is merely for want of evidence, as far as we may judge from what remains on record concerning the matter; for that feature begins to appear from the very first mention of the Abbots of Slane in the Annals; the earliest name of any of them there given being that of Abbot Colman, A.D. 746, whose name stands at the head of the series above set forth. A like remark applies to the case of Lusk, which precedes; the first of its Abbots mentioned in the Annals being Crunmael, son of Colga, A.D. 731, who stands first in our list of entries connected with Lusk, as quoted from the same Annals, above. Seeing, then, that this principle of hereditary or family succession prevailed as far back in these instances as any remaining record enable us to trace the history of the places concerned, it is reasonable to conclude, that the same principle would be found to have been acted on from a still earlier date, in fact, from the first origin, probably, of the different religious foundations established in these places, had we the additional documentary evidence which would be needed to enable us to form a fuller and more comprehensive judgment concerning this matter. St. Patrick, at least, we know, from what was stated at the opening of No. 1, was considered by the ancient Irish to have had no scruples against giving to such a system the sanction of his own high authority.

5. But to proceed with our illustrations from the Annals. Of Lann Leire, now the old church of Lyn (on the east side of Lough Ennell, barony of Fartullagh, Co. Westmeath), we have occasional notices in them, from the middle of the eighth century to the middle of the twelfth, consisting chiefly of the obits of some six or eight successive abbots, and a few other persons connected with the place. The principal of these are comprised in the following series, commencing with the first Abbot of Lyn mentioned in the Annals:—

A.D. 740, Cuimmene Ua Moynagh, Abbot of Lann Leire, died.

A.D. 776 [properly 781], Moynagh Ua Moynagh, Abbot of Lann Leire, died.

A.D. 843, Gormal, son of Murray, Bishop and Anchorite of Lann Leire, died.

A.D. 848. FEARCHAIR, son of Murroy, Abbot of Lann Leire, died

A.D. 867, FLANN, son of Feorchair, Abbot of Lann Leire, and œconomus (i. e. house steward,) of Armagh, died.

A.D. 893. Carbery, son of Sweeny, Abbot of Lann Leire, died.

A.D. 919. KEANNEY, son of Flann, Abbot of Lann Leire, died.

A.D. 930. Sweeny, Abbot of Lann Leire, died.

A.D. 965. FLANN, son of Œngus, Abbot of Lann Leire, died.

A.D. 1016. Œngus, son of Flann, Erenach of Lann Leire, died.

A.D. 1021. Moynagh, priest and Erenach of Lann Leire, died.

6. The system of hereditary succession shows itself to have been in operation at the great religious foundation at St. Edan, at Ferns, also, although we have not the means of tracing it among the earlier officials of the place, whose names occur in the Four Masters, from A.D. 624 onwards. At A.D. 900, however, and subsequently, we meet with the illustrations contained in the following entries.

A.D. 900. LACHNAN, Abbot of Ferns, died.

A.D. 937. LYNAM, coarb [or Abbot] of Ferns and Tallaght, died.

A.D. 956. FINNACHTA, son of Lachnan, erenach of Ferns, died.

A.D. 965. CARBERY, son of Lynam, Abbot of Ferns and Timolin, died.

A.D. 996. Conn Ua [i.e. grandson, or descendant of,] Lynam, Abbot of Ferns, died.

A.D. 1043. Conor Ua Lynam, Erenach of Ferns and Timolin, died.

A.D. 1062. Murrogh Ua Lynam, Erenach of Ferns, died.

A.D. 1085. Ugaire Ua Lynam, Erenach of Ferns, died.

7. Between some of the entries in the annals connected with the Church of Monasterboice, county Louth, a like sort of relationship may be observed, in these, for instance:—

A.D. 759. CORMAC, son of Ailill, Abbot of Monasterboice, died.

A.D. 762. Dudinver, son of Cormoc, Abbot of Monasterboice, drowned in the Boyne.

A.D. 1056. FLANN MAINISTREACH, lector of Monasterboice, a sage distinguished among the Gaeil for acquirements literary, historical, poetic, and scientific, died December the 18th, as is said,

"Flann of sweet Boice's fav'rite Church," &c.

A.D. 1067. AHERN, son of, Flann Mainistreach, Erenach of Monasterboice, died.

A.D. 1118. Owen, son of Ahiern, Coarb of Boice, [i.e. Abbot of Monasterboice,] died.

A.D. 1122. Fergna, son of Ahiern, [or Mac Ahiern] a wise priest, died.

8. Of the Abbots of the Church of Kilglinn (parish of Balfeaghan, barony of Upper Deece, county Meath), called in the Annals Kildua, these two only are mentioned by the Four Masters.

A.D. 834. Brasal, son of Cormac, erenach, or Abbot, of Kildua and other churches, died.

A.D. 841. Finnacta, son of Brasal, Abbot of Kildua, died.

9. Connected with the distinguished Church of Emly, we have, among others, these obits:—

A.D. 817. Rehawry Ua Mohiern, sage and Abbot of Emly, died.

A.D 870. Kenfela Ua Mohiern, lord of Cashel died, after a long and protracted illness. He was Abbot of Emly.

A.D. 886. Owen, son of Kenfela, Abbot of Emly, died.

10. Among the Abbots of St. Brendan's famous foundation, at Clonfert, county Longford, are mentioned the two following:—

A.D. 776 [properly 781]. Floinia, son of Congal, Abbot of Clonfert Brendain, died.

A.D. 778. Floinia's son, Abbot of Clonfert, died.

11. The entries connected with the Church of Trevet, county Meath, in the Four Masters, contain these following;—

A.D. 788. Dovach, Erenach of Trevet, died.

A.D. 808. Conall, son of Dovach, Abbot of Trevet, died.

A.D. 833. Cormac, son of Conall, Abbot of Trevet, died.

12. The abbacy of the Church of Terryglass, (near Borrisokane, county Tipperary,) was, in the eleventh century, a part of the hereditary property of Brian Boru's family, as appears from the entries in the Four Masters, which we next cite, the Kennedy mentioned in them being Brian's father.

A.D. 1007. Kelcher, son of Donncuan, son of Kennedy, Abbot of Terryglass, died.

A.D. 1009. Marcan, son of Kennedy, head of the clergy of Munster, coarb of Colum, son of Crivhan, [i.e. Abbot of Terryglass,] &c., died. [He was brother to Brian Boru, and uncle of the preceding abbot. This entry is given in a corrupt form by the Four Masters, but easily corrected from the Annals of Ulster, their authority in the matter.]

A.D. 1081. Keleher Ua Kennedy, coarb of Colum, son of Crivhan, died.

A.D. 1152. Finn, grandson of Kelcher Ua Kennedy, coarb of Colum, son of Crivhan, died.

N.B.—The Church of Terryglass having been founded by St. Colum, son of Crivhan, its abbots were styled his coarbs, or successors there.

13. The two entries next cited from the Four Masters, refer to St. Finnian's famous foundation, at Moville, county Down.

A.D. 1061. Tiernach Borkagh, chief spiritual adviser of Ireland, anchorite and coarb of Finnian, died of the plague.

A.D. 1098. Flaherty, son of Tiernach Borkagh, coarb of Finnian of Moville, died on his pilgrimage.

A.D. 1170, [mention is made of] the monk Awlave, son to the coarb of Finnian [i.e. to the Abbot] of Moville; [but no other office beyond that of a monk is assigned to him. The passage referred to seems, however, to imply that he had been an abbot, but was deposed from that office for some offence committed by him.]

It remains for us to consider, as proposed at the outset of this paper, how far any symptoms of the operation of the principle of hereditary succession are traceable in the principal ecclesiastical foundations of the three patron saints of Ireland; and we shall, accordingly, now direct our attention briefly to the cases of Iona, Derry, and Kildare, leaving that of Armagh for more special examination in a future paper. Durrow, another famous establishment of St. Columbkille's, in the north of the King's County, may also receive here a passing notice, in connection with his foundations in Derry and Iona.

14. St. Columbkille was of the royal family of Tirconnell or Donegal. Tirconnell (i.e. Conall's country) was so named from its being the seat of the descendants of Conall Gulban, son to Niall of the Nine Hostages, which Niall was one of the most famous of ancient Irish monarchs. Fergus, a son of the said Conall, was father to Felimy, the father of Columbkille; and the saint was, accordingly, great grandson to Conall, after whose family Tirconnell was named. The lineal descendants of the same Conall became afterwards possessed of the chief power in the Abbey of Derry, and it would seem in that of Iona also, as may be inferred from the following entries:—

A.D. 595. S. Baethan, son of Brennan, Abbot of I-colum-kille [or Iona], died on the 9th of June.

A.D. 601. S. Laisren, Abbot of I-colum-kille, died September 16.

A.D. 677. FALVEY, Abbot of I-colum-kille, died March 22.

A.D. 702. Adamnan, son of Ronan, Abbot of I-colum-kille, died September 23.

A.D. 708. Conawil [or Conan.—Annals of Ulster], son of Falvey, Abbot of I. [columkille] died.

A.D. 713. ST. DORBENY Foda [i.e., Dorbeny the Tall], Abbot of I. [columbkille] died October 28th.

A.D. 714. Faelhu, son of Dorbeny, was appointed to the Abbacy of I [columkille] on Saturday, August 29, in the 74th year of his age.

A.D. 762. Sleveny, son of Conghal, of the race of Conall Gulban, Abbot of I. [columkille] died.

A.D. 810. Kellach, son of Conghal, Abbot of I-colum-kille, died.

Baethan, the second Abbot of Iona (named in the first entry above) and Columbkille, were first and second cousins, Baethan being son to Brennan, son of Murray, Columkille's uncle. Lasrean, the third Abbot, was also a descendant of Conall Gulban, and stood to Columkille in the same relationship as Baethan did, he being son to Feradach, the son of Ninnedh, another uncle of the saint's. Adamnan, again, Dr. O'Donovan remarks, was seventh in descent from Conall Gulban. Sleveney, A.D. 762, is said by the Four Masters to have been of the same race. Two other Abbots above-named were the fathers, respectively, it will be seen, of abbots coming after in the list. Several others belonging to the same period are unnoticed here, the Four Masters affording us no means of tracing any relationship between them. But the evidence which is available from their Annals, for our present purpose, although less full in some respects than could have been wished, abundantly suffices to show this much, at least, that the method of family succession was in use at Iona, not only at a very early period, but even from the very first institution of the place, and with the sanction of its founder, by whose appointment his cousin, Baethan, became his own immediate successor.

15. Of the abbots who successively governed the institution founded at Derry by St. Columkille, for more than 250 years from its first origin, we know nothing; not even a name of any one of them previously to the latter half of the ninth century being found on record in our ancient annals. Of the notices to be met with of those who came after, the following are a few. (See the learned Ordnance Memoir of Derry, which is our authority for a few additions in the following entries to the information supplied by the annals of the Four Masters; pp. 26, &c.)

A.D. 844. Niall Caille, son of Hugh Ornee, having been sovereign of Ireland for 13 years, was drowned in the Callan [co. Kilkenny, probably].

A.D. 879. Murtogh, son of Niall, Abbot of Derry and other churches, died.

A.D. 906. Donnell, son of Hugh Finlia, Lord of Ailleach, took the [pilgrim's] staff. [N.B. Aileach was a royal residence, about five miles N.W. of Derry.]

A.D. 911. Donnell, son of Hugh Finlia, Lord of Aileach, died in religion, after a good life.

A.D. 919. Kinaedh, son of Donnell, Abbot of Derry and Drumhome [co. Donegal], head of the council of the descendants of Conall, died.

A.D. 925. St. Maelbride, son of Tornan, coarb [or, successor] of Patrick, Columkille, and Adamnan [i. e., Abbot of Armagh, Derry, and Raphoe], head of the piety of all Ireland, &c., died at a good old age. From Colgan's notice of this eminent man [in his Acta Sanctorum], it appears that he was of the same royal stock as Columkille himself, being the twelfth in descent from Conall Gulban, son of Niall of the Nine Hostages.

A.D. 927. Kencorach, son of Maelweer, Abbot and Bishop of Derry, &c., died. This abbot also was descended in the twelfth degree from Conall Gulban, as appears from the Genealogies of the Irish Saints.

A.D. 936. Dubhthach [or Duffy, son of Duan], coarb of Columkille and Adamnan in Ireland and Scotland [i. e., Abbot of Derry, Raphoe, and Iona], died. He was nephew to his predecessor, and thirteenth in descent from Conal Gulban.

A.D. 950. Aylan, son of Egneach, son of Dalach, coarb of Columkille [i. e. Abbot of Derry, &c.], died. He was of the royal family of Tireonnell, and thirteenth in descent from Conall Gulban. The Four M. give the death of Egneach, son of Dalach, Lord of Tyreonnell, at A.D. 901.

A.D. 952. Rovartach, coarb of Columkille and Adamnan, died.

A.D. 962. Duskila, son of Kinaedh, coarb of Columkille, died.

A.D. 967. Aenghus, grandson of Rovartach, anchorite of Derry, Columkille, died.

The first abbot brought under our notice in this list (before whom only one other is mentioned in the Annals)—viz., Murtogh, A.D. 879, appears plainly to have been the son of the Monarch Niall Caille mentioned in the previous entry. That monarch had come of a devout family, his paternal grandfather, Niall Frosach, having resigned his regal sceptre to spend the last years of his life in religious retirement at Iona (as mentioned by the Four Masters), at A.D. 765. Kinaedh, the next abbot named in the extracts above, was in like manner evidently the son of Prince Donnell, of the same family; Donnell being grandson to Niall Caille, by his son Hugh Finlia, father of the said Donnell. And this Donnell, after the example of his progenitor, Niall Frosach, had spent his latter days "in religion," most probably in the establishment of Derry, in which his son became abbot. The continued influence of the same royal race in other later entries above will be sufficiently observable on inspection.

16. The few entries connected with Durrow, in the Annals, are not wholly barren of matter illustrative of our present subject. Among them occur these:—

A.D. 788. Kinaedh, son of Cumusgach, Abbot of Durrow, died.

A.D. 835. Saerghus*, grandson of Kinaedh, Abbot of Durrow, died.

A.D. 848. Toole, son of Fearadhach, Abbot of Reachrainn and Durrow, died.

17. The Reachrainn here named is not the well-known island of that name off the coast of Antrim (called also Rathlin, and Raghery,) but the island near Howth (Co. Dublin), now called Lambay, on which Columkille erected a monastery. Fearadhach, father of Toole, named in the last entry, had been himself also abbot of Reachrainn, as appears from this notice of him in the same Annals:—

A.D. 791. Fearadhach, son of Seighenl, Abbot of Reachrainn, died.

18. As for Kildare, the Annals, although registering the obits of many of the abbesses who succeeded St. Brigid in that place, yet supply us with no materials enabling us to ascertain what relationships may have existed between the several successive occupants of the office. But with the abbots who held office in the same place, and the origin of whose succession dates from the same period, the case is different. The operation of the system of hereditary succession is observable plainly enough among them, as well as the fact, that the particular family in which the right of succession to this abbacy became vested, was the royal one of Leinster. A sufficient foundation for these remarks will be found in the extracts which follow:—

A.D. 638. Hugh Duv, Abbot and Bishop of Kildare, died. He had been at first King of Leinster.

A.D. 697. Forannan, Abbot of Kildare, died.

A.D. 747. Cahal, son of Forannan, Abbot of Kildare, died.

A.D. 771. Kellach, son of Donogh, King of Leinster, died.

A.D. 782. Murray, son of Cuhal, Abbot of Kildare, died.

A.D. 799. Faelan, son of Kellach, Abbot of Kildare, died.

A.D. 803. Finnachta, son of Kellach, King of Leinster, died at Kildare.

A.D. 821. Murray, son of Kellach, Abbot of Kildare, died.

A.D. 826. Hugh, son of Kellach, Abbot of Kildare, died.

A.D. 836. Regan, son of Finnachta, joint King of Leinster, died.

A.D. 850. Artry, son of Faelan, Erenach of Kildare, died.

A.D. 868. Coffey, son of Murray, Abbot of Kildare, a wise and well-learned doctor died. Of him was said, &c. [Then follows a quotation from an ode in his praise, in which he is styled a descendant of Kellach, &c.]

A.D. 878. Sweeny, grandson to Finnachta, Bishop of Kildare, died.

A.D. 882. Murray, son of Bran, Lord of Leinster, and Abbot of Kildare, [died]. Of him it was said, &c. [Then follows an elegy.]

A.D. 892. Bran, son of Murray, tanist of Leinster, was slain.

A.D. 920. Flannagan, grandson of Regan, Abbot of Kildare, and Royal Heir of Leinster, died.

A.D. 930. Flann, son of Murray, royal heir of Leinster, died.

A.D. 942. Flann, son of Finn, and Maelmora, two Royal Heirs of Leinster, died.

A.D. 965. Murray, son of Faelan, Abbot of Kildare, and Royal Heir of Leinster, was slain by Aulave, Lord of the Foreigners, &c.

A.D. 985. Murray, son of Flann, successor (coarb) of Conlath [i. e., Abbot of Kildare], died.

This Murray, son of Flann, is the last Abbot of Kildare whose name occurs in the Annals. The entries thus given in connection with Kildare, run, it will be seen, through a period of about three hundred and fifty years, commencing before the middle of the seventh century. And they serve to illustrate well, both the working of the principle to which this paper has been referring throughout, and also the close union existing between Church and State in those old times. It should be observed, moreover, that all the evidence thus far adduced concerning the mode of succession under consideration has been wholly of an incidental nature; the compilers of the Annals having had it in view, not to enlighten posterity concerning the genealogies of the Irish ecclesiastics, but only to identify them, so far as might seem necessary, for preserving the proper obits of some of them on record. What was thought of these Irish successions in other parts of the Church Catholic, when attention was drawn to them abroad, we shall see presently, if permitted, as we hope to be, to resume the subject, and examine the case of Armagh in particular, in a future paper.

THE MARLEYS.

CHAPTER II.

Since the discussion with Father Paul O'Reilly, on prayers to the saints, detailed in our last number, Edith and Adeline Marley had applied themselves more carefully to a diligent reading of the sacred Scriptures. They were still somewhat frightened at the denunciations which they had heard against the exercise of the right of private judgment, and the danger of anybody, but the Church or the priest, interpreting the Word of God; so they thought the best way to arrive at a correct knowledge of the real state of the case would be to listen to both sides of the argument, and, accordingly, they made up their minds to attend a course of controversial sermons on the subject, both at church and chapel, and thus, having heard both authorities giving their respective versions of the matter, to judge for themselves which had the warrant of God in their favour. They waited with some impatience the approach of Lent, which, by some strange arrangement of things, is made a season of religious controversy. In pursuance of their former purpose they attended a course of sermons, preached at the chapel of ——— street, in Dublin, and, at the same time, as we have hinted, thought it would be no harm to listen to another set of sermons on the Protestant side of the question, by the Rev. Mr. G———, an extremely faithful and zealous clergyman, who preached not very far from the aforesaid chapel.

It so happened that the priest appointed to preach at ———street chapel was a gentleman whom we shall call the Rev. Mr. Lawrenson, an intimate acquaintance of their father. Mr. Lawrenson was a man of distinguished literary and scientific attainments, of polished address, and gay and engaging manners, and, being still comparatively a young man, was, perhaps, as fitted to be a courtier as a priest. He had been, during the previous winter, a frequent guest at Hollywood, and had been subjected to many an inquiry on matters of religion, by our young friends, which he answered, or confessed himself unable to answer, with an extraordinary degree of frankness and nonchalance. He rather endeavoured to divert their attention from such topics, and lead them to subjects of literature and science, in which he was a proficient. His conversation was fascinating; his manner kind, courteous, and playful; and he laid himself out to win the confidence and friendship of the two sisters. In this he succeeded in no small degree, and Father Lawrenson was the universal favourite of everybody at Hollywood, and had become, as it were, the confessor of the family. With Edith and Adeline he was still more intimately associated. He became the preceptor of their studies, their counsellor in their little plans and arrangements, and their companion in many a walk. In these they took advantage of their intimacy and opportunity, to discuss the most prominent points of controversy between the Protestant and Roman Catholic Churches, and brought forward such passages of Scripture as they had found bearing upon the subject, and had become, from practice, and earnest and prayerful reading, expert reasoners on the matter, and thoroughly conversant with every text and argument that is habitually brought forward on either side, and with these they pressed Father Lawrenson, without mercy or reserve, really anxious to arrive at the truth, and to have the benefit of his learning and acknowledged great intellectual powers. Father Lawrenson entered into such discussions but feebly, and resisted the arguments brought to bear upon him more weakly every day; and indeed, before very long, he gave the sisters to perceive, though he never openly ventured to make the confession, that neither his heart nor his understanding were on the side of the Church of which he was an ordained and officiating priest, and a distinguished ornament. He so faintly deprecated their inquiries and doubts that he rather seemed to sanction them. Fancy then, reader, the astonishment of Edith and Adeline on going, on a Thursday to ——— street chapel, to find Father Lawrenson mount the pulpit to deliver a controversial sermon, on the subject of the Eucharist. They waited with breathless anxiety to hear what texts and arguments he would adduce before a large and attentive congregation, assembled to be instructed and confirmed in their faith by the reverend and learned preacher. They, on this vital point of Catholic doctrine, listened with amazement at the solemn mockery of passages of Scripture cited by the priest (unconscious, no doubt, of the presence of two individual members of his auditory), which he had an hundred times admitted to have no earthly application to the controversy, and some of them to prove directly the reverse of what he had admitted to be their obvious meaning. As soon as the sermon was over, they hurried out, so as to extricate themselves from the general congregation, with a sense of awe and terror, and almost with an inclination to address them in the language of the Prophet—"Come out from among them, O my people." Very soon afterwards they contrived to attend a controversial sermon preached by the Rev. Mr. G———, and could not fail to contrast the earnest and affectionate manner, the pure and plain Gospel truth, enforced in a spirit of charity and sound common sense, with the cold logic and laboured metaphysics of the sermon they had heard so recently. It is not our present purpose to enter into a detail of either discourse, or to enforce the relative merits or defects of either. The main object of our pages has been to assist our Roman Catholic readers to find the truth for themselves; and we trust we have not been found unfaithful, and that many of them have derived assistance in their inquiries from our paper. Mrs. Marley, some few years before the time of our narrative, had accidentally (or rather, should we not say, in the wise providence of God) met with a weekly newspaper, containing a report of the proceedings at a meeting of the Irish Society at the Rotundo. She read in this the speech of some good and faithful man, and it opened to her mind truths which she had never known before, and which made a deep impression on her mind, and set her on diligent examination of the subject. Being of a timid disposition and undecided character, she never ventured to speak of these matters, but treasured them up in her mind. Thus, strange it was that, in the same family, an attached mother and two sisters, who had in general every thought and feeling in common, for some time were each under the influence of a powerful change of mind without the knowledge of the other, and without venturing to disclose what was passing in her own mind. Such an instance as this cheers us with the hope that in many a quarter, where fear or persecution, or the many influences of the world, may prevent the open declaration of the truth, it may have taken root, and in due time bear its fruit.

---

* The extremely rare occurrence of this name in the Annals makes it highly probable that the person here intended was father to the Bishop of Armagh, thus noticed at A.D. 858:—

Kellach, son of Saerghus, anchorite, and Bishop of Armagh, died.

As time wore on, many at least of our readers will scarcely be surprised to learn that Edith and Adeline became more fixed in their convictions as to the errors of the Roman Catholic faith. Still they could not muster courage to avow their change of mind, not having the direct countenance of their mother, and dreading the fiery wrath and displeasure of their father, whose advanced age added a peculiar sanction to his parental displeasure. Indeed, to incur their father's displeasure was an event which they dared not contemplate for a moment; yet they had become satisfied that the wrath of God, their Almighty and Heavenly Father, was infinitely a more serious matter, and that it was involved in their attendance at the celebration of the mass, in which the one offering, by which God had perfected for ever them that were sanctified, was set at nought, and the perishable elements of bread and wine held forth for adoration and worship, in plain and palpable defiance of the denunciations against idolatry, or the worship of anything but the true and invisible God. They accordingly resolved that, come what might, they would never again be present at the offering up of the sacrifice of the mass; but in order to preserve appearances, and to avoid an open rupture, they regularly entered the chapel doors on the right hand side, and walked out at the left side, and passed over to hear the Gospel preached in all its glorious fulness and freedom by their friend, the Rev. Mr. G——. It would require a greater degree of casuistry than we desire to possess to determine whether, in this compromise to appearances there was involved a reprehensible compromise of principle, and we do not pretend to say whether the example of Naaman, the Syrian, who asked and obtained permission from the prophet Elisha to enter the temple of Rimmon and bow the knee to the false god, can be adduced to justify the entering a house in which a false worship is carried on, although it is not partaken in. However, the timidity of Edith and Adeline induced them to adopt a course that might save appearances, and save them from open disclosure of their change of feeling before the eyes of the Major. Circumstances seemed to favour this course. The Major, though formerly a regular attendant at chapel every Sunday, had latterly, from advanced age, been unable to go out as usual. Mrs. Marley, it may be guessed from what we have said, though she gave no express sanction to her daughters deserting their religious attendance at the mass, did not interfere with them, while Marcella regarded with unutterable anguish the defection of her sisters, whose early education had been chiefly intrusted to herself, and, with many a bitter pang of remorse, she reproached herself with not having been more diligent in imbuing their young minds with Catholic truth; yet she dreaded her father's violent temper too much, and loved her sisters too tenderly, to expose them to his displeasure by revealing their conduct to him. But many a time the sisters found themselves on the brink of a volcano. The Major would, Sunday after Sunday, at 11 o'clock, announce his intention of going to mass, and would make every preparation to be ready. Then impended a crisis, when they should either have abjured the truth of God or come to an open rupture with their father. On such an occasion, as argument or expostulation would have had a precisely opposite effect, and only determined him to go, Edith and Adeline having no resource in themselves, would betake themselves to their knees, and ask the great Disposer of all events, who taketh cognizance of the falling of a sparrow, and counteth the hairs of the heads of his people, to spare them such a trial, and keep their dear father from attending what they conceived to be the idolatry of the mass: and certain it was, that some passing cloud, some fancied ailment, some whim, as light as air, would turn the purpose of the Major, and, when the carriage had driven up to the door, he would unexpectedly say, "I don't think, my dear, I will go out to-day."

In this way Edith and Adeline were left, comparatively free to follow the dictates of their own consciences, and to pursue the path of truth, as they considered it to be, free and unmolested. But it was not long before their kind and gossipping friends perceived their mysterious disappearance from mass, and noticed that Mrs. Marley and Marcella, though always accompanied by the two younger girls when entering the chapel, were, some way or other, without them when leaving it. Others of their inquiring friends found out that, about two o'clock, the two young ladies were to be met in the direction of —— street church, and, as there is no philosopher so diligent in the pursuit of knowledge as the gossip in the pursuit of scandal, the sisters were watched, and traced, and actually discovered entering the precincts of the church. The parish priest and the bishop were very soon apprized of the scandalous proceeding; the alarm was sounded and spread, and the neighbourhood duly informed, and, though nobody ventured to be the direct medium of communicating such bad news to the Major, it was not long before he received a bundle of anonymous letters, written by sincere friends and devoted Roman Catholics, warning him "that he was nurturing a pair of vipers in his bosom, and they of his own household were about to disgrace and dishonour him." To do the old Major justice, whatever might have been his feelings of alarm or indignation at such intelligence as this, he had a manly and thorough contempt for all anonymous letter writers, he regarded them as cowards, and suspected them as being slanderers, and he would have considered himself demeaned if he were betrayed into any participation of their base purpose by acting upon their information. Accordingly he put a restraint upon himself, and never mentioned the intelligence he had received to anybody. Another circumstance happened shortly after this, which added something more to the Major's disquietude. The housemaid, Ellen, had brought him a Protestant Bible, which, she said, she had seen Miss Adeline continually reading; but, at the same time, she extracted from him a solemn promise not to mention her name in the matter, as (though she had been ordered at confession to give the Bible to the Major) "she would not, for all the world, bring dear Miss Adeline into any trouble." This further piece of intelligence, communicated under the seal of confidence, added fuel to the internal fire which was consuming the soul of the Major and had no vent.

Edith and Adeline had remarked for some time that their father, though still affectionate in manner as usual, was more reserved, and less familiar and playful with them than was his wont. Mrs. Marley, also, found his temper more excitable, and it was not long before the Major found occasion to speak. On a Monday morning, Father O'Reilly, the parish priest, and the Very Reverend Dr. ——, the Vicar-General of the diocess, drove up to Hollywood. Their arrival struck the young converts as being portentous of no good. After about half an hour's private conference with their father, the parlour bell was rung peremptorily, if not violently, and a summons forwarded, requesting the attendance of Miss Edith and Miss Adeline in the parlour. They entered the room with a slow and faltering step, in fear and trembling, and not without a prayer first offered up for strength and wisdom. The old Major was sitting at the table, with his writing desk open before him, excited and inflamed to a degree that alarmed the timid girls. Father O'Reilly sat at the window, looking as perplexed and uncomfortable as possible, while the Reverend Vicar-General had a cold, impassive, inquisitorial expression of countenance, that would have struck terror into the heart of an ordinary heretic, and might have caused the Maid of Orleans herself to quail. He received the girls with a smile, like the glare of a winter's sun upon the dark waters of a gloomy lake. His object seemed to be to reduce them to immediate submission, by a resolute attack upon their fears, and the scene was eminently calculated to produce such an effect. Their father motioned them to be seated, and said to Edith, in a tone of affected calmness and placidity—"Edith, may I take the liberty of asking you when were you last at confession?"

"Not for some time, papa," replied Edith, rather boldly.

"Then, may I expect that you will attend Mr. —— to confession, on Friday next?"

"Indeed, papa, I will do anything in the world to please you, consistently with my sense of what is due to God, and what he commands me to do."

The Major said—"Edith, I desire to have no equivocation or reservation; I wish to have a distinct answer to my request; will you go to confession on Friday next, according to my wish and desire, or will you not?"

To this Edith, after a moment's pause and reflection, replied—"Do not, dearest papa, press me on this subject, until I can explain to you what my reasons are, and, I am persuaded, I will satisfy you that I am acting rightly in pursuing the course dictated to me by my conscience."

"Am I, then, to understand you, Edith, to mean that you will not go?"

"Indeed, papa, it is not fair to press me now on the subject."

Upon this the Major turned round to Adeline, pale as death, and trembling with terror, and fiercely demanded of her—

"Well, madam, what is your answer to my most unreasonable request, that you shall attend confession on Friday next?"

Adeline, more dead than alive, appeared to be on the point of fainting; she looked up, slowly and fearfully, and met the scowling glance of the Vicar-General lowering upon her triumphantly, as if he beheld her conquered and at his feet. She aroused herself, and with an energy which, a moment before, appeared impossible, she advanced toward her father, and said—"Dearest papa, anything on the earth you desire me or wish me to do, however hard or disagreeable, I will cheerfully do; but to go to confession, or to make any such compliance with a system, which I believe to be one of rank error, I cannot, and most decidedly will not do."

At this unexpected announcement the Major was perfectly astounded. From their earliest childhood he had not only exacted but received the most implicit obedience, and never had heard before his slightest wish questioned, much less denied. When he recovered himself sufficiently his wrath knew no bounds, he stamped and strode about the room, and expressed himself in language neither measured nor orthodox. He imprecated in terrible words all heretics in general, and especially his disobedient and recreant daughters. He vowed all sorts of vengeance, and declared, in the most solemn and awful manner, that his roof should never for a night harbour any heretic who disgraced his family and his name, and that they should begone immediately from his presence for ever, and the old man in a paroxysm of uncontrollable passion and grief knelt down for the wicked purpose of pouring upon the children of his old age and affection, whom he most tenderly and devotedly loved, the direst, most terrific words that human tongue can utter—a father's curse.

Edith and Adeline sprang like the lightning to their father's side and literally closed his lips with their hands, and with wild and bitter tears they cried out almost in one voice—"Oh, papa! cast us out on the world if you please—kill us, but do not curse us."

This was no sudden impulse that had moved them. It had been for months their daily, almost hourly prayer, that their dear father, whose temper knew no restraints, might never be permitted to curse them. They felt they could encounter every trial and every persecution—fire—sword—the loss of friends—misconstruction—anything but a father's curse, and yet they foresaw that no danger was more imminent, and accordingly they made it the subject of their constant prayer that that calamity at least should be averted from them.

In this instance the Major was, for the time, absolutely silenced, and drawn with gentle violence to his chair, while his daughters hung upon his neck in tears. The Vicar-General, seeing that he was over-doing the business, and that, by driving matters to extremities, he might lose his game altogether, advanced to the Major, and, in the most conciliatory and soothing tones, reproached him for his violence, and said that "he had no doubt his daughters were very good girls, and if left to their own good sense, and if they would but explain to their spiritual preceptors what their difficulties were, they would soon find them removed, and the Major would have the satisfaction of seeing them act as he wished." The Vicar-General then blandly asked Edith and Adeline would they not consent to see the Bishop, and explain to him what their doubts and difficulties were, and see whether he could not remove them. They readily assented, and said "they had no objection whatever to hear from the Bishop anything he had to say on the subject which had influenced their conduct, as their only desire was to arrive at the truth."

The Major, whose fits of passion were as transient as they were violent, was half ashamed of himself by this time, and, affectionately kissing his daughters, said he had always found them good and dutiful children, and was happy to hear that they would act as Dr. —— had advised, and hoped he would hear no more of their new-fangled notions; and then he gave them permission to leave the room, of which they availed themselves with alacrity, and were soon found at the throne of grace, thanking their Almighty Father for his deliverance of them from this terrible ordeal, and, above all, from their Father's curse.

Their visit to the Bishop we must postpone to our next number.

THE TALK OF THE ROAD.—No. XV.

"Well, Pat, what were you doing since I saw you?" said Jem, when they met next.

"Well, then, I was hearing a sermon in Kilcommon," said Pat.

"And was it Father John that was in it?" said Jem.

"No, then," said Pat, "it was Doctor Martin, from England, that was a Protestant clergyman and that turned; and I saw it up in letters as big as my hand, so I thought I'd go and see if he came up to Father John."

"Well, and how did he do it?" said Jem.

"Well, he's a great preacher entirely," said Pat, "and no mistake, for you would hear him a mile off. But for what he said, it beat all that ever I heard from ourselves itself. Why, sure he spoke it out plain, that the Blessed Virgin was the wife of the Holy Ghost!* Now, is that in the Bible, I want to know?"

"Why, Pat," said Jem, "sure that beats ourselves all out; sure that's worse nor ever we were. Doesn't the Blessed Virgin call herself the handmaid of the Lord? and to go to make a woman the wife of God! sure that beats all. And didn't God say, that man and wife are one flesh? and how can she be one flesh with Him? Sure it's too bad entirely."

"And how comes it at all," said Pat, "that the great English clergy, that has learning and knowledge, should be turning to worse than the likes of us can stand?"

"Well, I heard Mr. Owens preach a sermon on that," said Jem, "and he made it plain enough, for he said our hearts was all turned away from the truth, by nature, and that the wise and learned was as bad this way as the poorest creatures; and he showed that it wasn't the wise and learned that was mostly called,† but that the Gospel was preached to the poor,‡ and that God had chosen the foolish to confound the wise;§ and if that was the way in St. Paul's own time, why wouldn't it be that way now? And he said, forehy that, the most learned of those clergy that turned in England didn't give any learned reason for it at all; but just no better nor ourselves would give, when the priest told us that his way was right;‖ and sure that's the poor proof, when it isn't in the Bible? And isn't it enough to make out Mr. Owens right, when Dr. Martin says the like of that? But what more did he say?"

"Well, of all that ever you heard, he said of the Protestant clergy. He said he knew them well, for he was one himself, and that they didn't believe in God, or in Jesus Christ, or in the Holy Ghost itself; but that they was all infidels and heathens."

* Pat is, probably, correct in this, shocking as it may appear, for we find a similar statement in a report of a sermon, preached at Navan, by Dr. Marshall, in 1852; published by T. Henderson, Kells.
† 1 Cor. i., 26. ‡ Matt. xi., 5; Luke iv., 18. § 1 Cor. i., 27.
‖ This was shown in our number for March, 1852, vol. i., p. 23.

"Well, it'll go hard with me before I take his word that Mr. Owens does not believe in God or in Jesus Christ," said Jem; "but what more, Pat?"

"Well, he said that they didn't care about the souls of the people at all, and that, with all the talk they made, they didn't want the people to turn Protestants at all, but only to pretend to do it; and that they give the people five pounds a piece only just to pretend it, and him getting five pounds for preaching that same sermon, as I heard tell."

"Well, stop there a bit, Pat," said Jem; "if the priest thought that the five pounds a piece was really going, would he give it out in the chapel that way? Doesn't he know there would be plenty to look for it, if it was to be got? and, if it was true, wouldn't he be more like to tell the people they wouldn't get the money at all, and they needn't go to look for it?"

"Well, signs by," said Pat, "I was up with Mr. Owens next day, and who should I see at the door but Molly Brady; and Mr. Owens comes out and asks her what she wants: 'your reverence,' says she, 'I'm a girl that wants to turn;' and so Mr. Owens began to talk to her about the reasons for turning; and Molly kept looking at him mighty hard; and at last, says she, 'but what are yees going to give me?' says she. 'So,' says Mr. Owens, 'we're going to give you the Word of God,' says he, 'that's able to save your soul.' 'And won't yees give me the five pounds?' says she: so when he told her that was all a lie, she went off in a huff; so I overtook her going back, 'and who told you that, Molly?' says I. 'Father John did,' says she. 'And will you believe Father John again?' says I. 'Why would I," says she, 'when he made that fool of me? and wasn't I the fool to believe him at all;' says she, 'sure I might have knowed,' says she, 'that he never told one word of truth in his life, barring he mistook it for a lie,' says she.

"Aye," said Jem, "and didn't I hear of old Judy Callaghan, a while back, when Father John gave it out in the chapel that Mr. Owens would give a leg of mutton and a blanket to every woman in the parish that would turn? And up goes Judy to Mr. Owens, next day, and 'your reverence,' says she, 'I'm come to give myself up to you, for the leg of mutton and the blanket.' 'And my poor woman,' says he, 'is it possible you would sell your soul and your religion for a leg of mutton?' 'Oh, no, your reverence,' says she, 'oh, no, dear, not without the blanket!!'"

"Well, Jem," says Pat, "I'm of your notion, that if the priests believed it themselves, they'd deny it in the chapel, in place of giving it out; but where's the use of talking, don't we know it's not true at all, and don't we know that what Mr. Owens wants is to get us to read the Bible, and to live by it?"

"Well, we know that anyway," said Jem; "but if it's all true what the Bible says of telling lies, what will be done with all the lies that's told in the chapel?"

"Well, it's hard to expect truth from them that tells lies," said Pat, "and I mind I read a speech in the newspaper, a while back, that said, the worst thing at all in the Irish was, that they mostly tell lies entirely, and won't tell a word of truth, if they can help it; and sure that's not far off the real thing."

"Aye," said Jem, "I thought that the other day, when I was at the fair of Ballybrack, and there was young Mr. Williams selling a horse, and he had old Peter M'Kenna with him, that sells for all the gentlemen, and there comes up a man and asks about the horse, and Mr. Williams just answers him fairly, and if you had seen how old Peter scoulded him afterwards; 'What made you go tell him the truth at all?' says he. 'Why; sure what I said did the horse no harm,' says Mr. Williams. 'And what do I care for harm or no harm?' says Peter; 'while you're a living man,' says he, 'never go for to tell one word of truth upon a street.' And, thinks I to myself, it's the rule of the street, sure enough, and it's liars we are entirely."

"And what else would we be," said Pat, "when we know nothing at all of what God says of the judgment on liars, and when we see the priest tell lies himself at the altar of God? Sure, is there a man in the chapel that knows that God says, that all liars shall have their part in the lake that burns with fire and brimstone? and is not that enough to show that the people ought to have the Bible, to know what God says, and what God will do?"

Who knows but that Pat and Jem, and many a poor man like them, may help to bring the Irish people to a knowledge of these things?

The Catholic Layman.

DUBLIN, AUGUST, 1853.

In our number for June, we gave a letter from our valued and able correspondent, Mr. M'Manus, in which he appeals to Pascal, among others, as a witness and instance of the power of the religion of the Church of Rome upon the hearts of men.

In our last number we pointed out the remarkable fact, that Mr. M'Manus should have taken as an instance a nominal member of the Church of Rome, who was almost, or entirely, such as we are in doctrine.

He is not singular in this: most Roman Catholic controversialists, when called on to show the fruits of their church's teaching, do appeal to Pascal, as one of their chief instances. We think it, therefore, a matter of interest to inquire into the doctrine and position of this celebrated man.

At the time of the Reformation, there were many dissatisfied with the corruptions of the Church of Rome beside those who actually joined the Reformation. Many, who could not make up their minds to leave her, did earnestly long to correct her doctrines and practices. Many, even of the bishops at the Council of Trent, did actually advocate very Protestant notions in the council.

To meet this state of things, THE ORDER OF JESUITS was created, and they have since proved the main support of modern Romanism. Their chief business was, to watch and hunt down every tendency to Protestant doctrine among the members of the Church of Rome.

In the year 1640, there was published, at Louvain, a book, called "Augustinus," written by Jansenius, Roman Catholic Bishop of Ypres, who had died about two years before. This book was a compilation of the doctrines of the great St. Augustine, respecting the grace of God in the salvation of man. It was eminently Protestant and spiritual in its character. The Jesuits immediately attacked it; they succeeded in having it condemned by the University of the Sorbonne in Paris, and by repeated Bulls of various Popes. But there were many whose hearts sighed for the religion of the grace of God, and those were resolute in adhering to the doctrine of this book, against all the power and persecution of Jesuits and Popes. They were, of course, denounced as heretics by the Church of Rome, and are still denounced by it as heretics, for they still exist; yet they themselves have always said, that they did not separate from the Church of Rome; that all they wanted was, to hold the doctrines of grace in her communion. But that Church has always denounced "the Jansenists" (as they are called, from Jansenius), as heretics; and yet, strange to say, has never been able to drive them out of her communion, for persons holding these opinions have often been, not only members, but priests, and bishops too, in the Church of Rome, which Roman Catholics ought to remember when they boast of the unity of doctrine in their Church.

Among those who embraced the doctrine of Jansenius was the famous abbey of Port Royal in France, with its Abbess and all its Nuns, the two brothers of the Abbess, Henri Arnauld, Bishop of Anger, and Antoine Arnauld, Doctor of the Sorbonne, St. Cyran, the spiritual director of the abbey, and many others renowned for their piety and learning, such as Le Maitre, De Sacy, Nicole, &c., &c., and among the rest Blaise Pascal.

Pascal was a Jansenist, and as such a heretic to the Church of Rome, though her controversialists are so fond of claiming credit to themselves for his progress in the grace of God.

He is chiefly known to us now by his famous "Provincial Letters," which were written to expose the Jesuits, and to maintain the cause of the Jansenists against them; and a fearful picture he gives of the institution, the policy, and the principles of the Jesuits in carrying out the objects for which their order was created.

It is not their object to destroy morality, but neither is it their object to preserve it; that would be bad policy. Their design is to have all consciences subject to themselves. Since evangelical and severe maxims are suited to govern some characters, they provide accordingly for them; since the majority of men demand a lax and easy religion, they provide that for them. So they need teachers of both kinds, to suit all sorts of men, and give every one what he wishes for. By this obliging and accommodating conduct they embrace all. If they meet a penitent resolved to restore what he has stolen, they praise and confirm his resolution; but if one come to them who wishes to have absolution without restoring what he has stolen, it will go hard but they will find some way to manage that for him. By this they preserve all their friends, and defend themselves against all their enemies. If one reproach them for laxity, they immediately produce some books of their stricter devotion, and the simple, who do not look deep into matters, are content with such proofs.

This is an abstract of Pascal's statement, of the object and means of the Jesuits, in his "Fifth Letter."

And hence, says Pascal, we may understand why the Jesuits have such low notions of the grace of God; "for their morality is WHOLLY PAGAN, and nature alone is sufficient to observe it."

He gives fearful and abundant proofs, out of the books of the chief men of the order, of the truth of this fearful charge.

First, he shows their "doctrine of probability," as they call it. Their greatest writers say, that they are all agreed that if what men do is probably right, if there be a probability that it is right or lawful, that is enough to justify the conscience against sin. And they say further, that the opinion of one grave and learned author in favour of an action, is proof enough that it is, probably, lawful, and may, therefore, be done without sin. And then he shows that there is not a crime that can be thought of that has not some great Jesuit writer at hand to say that it is lawful, and may be done without sin! Thus he shows (letter seven) that numbers of their greatest authors maintain that it is lawful for a gentleman to kill on the spot any one who strikes him a blow, in order to preserve his honour; that it is lawful to fight a duel to preserve his honour; that it is lawful for servants to steal, if they think their wages too small; that priests and monks may lawfully kill those who injure them or their order; that it is lawful to kill those who speak ill of us, if we cannot stop them in any other way; that it is lawful to circulate false slanders against those who we fear may hurt us; that it is not the duty of Christians to avoid the immediate occasion of sin, if their doing so should give a handle for people talking, or be inconvenient to them.

Of these, and many other such maxims that he produces from their books, Pascal occasionally says such things as these—"Are they priests who speak them? are they Christians? are they Turks? are they men? are they devils?"—Letter 14. And again, "It is to be wished that those horrid maxims had never come forth out of hell; and that the devil, who was their first author, had never found men sufficiently devoted to his orders to publish them among Christians."

He shows, also, that it is a rule of the Jesuits, that every confessor is bound, under mortal sin, to give absolution, even against his own conscience, to every one who can produce one of their authors to justify his crime!—Letter 5.

But it is upon the question of the necessity of loving God that Pascal is more indignant against the doctrine of the Jesuits than on any other. In his tenth letter, he reckons up all their opinions on the question—"At what time is a man obliged to have actual love to God?" One says, "before he dies;" another, "at the moment of death;" another, "when he is baptized;" another, "on festival days;" another says, "all these are wrong;" another says, "once a year;" another, "once every three or four years;" another, "every five years;" another says, "it is probable that he is not rigorously obliged to every five years;" another says, "the command is not so much to love God, as not to hate him!"

On this Pascal says, "They go to reverse the whole law of God. They violate the great commandment, which contains the law and the prophets; they attack piety at the heart; they take from it the spirit that gives it life; they say that the love of God is not necessary to salvation; . . they take off the anathema which St. Paul pronounces against those who love not the Lord Jesus Christ; they destroy what St. John says—that he who loves not the Lord Jesus Christ abides in death; . . . . thus they make worthy of enjoying God through eternity, those who never loved him all their lives! Behold the mystery of iniquity fulfilled."

We ask our readers to remember that we are here expressing no opinion of our own either for or against the Jesuits.

But we find Pascal appealed to by our correspondent as a proof that it is the Church of Rome that possesses the religion of the heart, and when we turn to his writings we find indeed that he did possess the true religion of the heart, the doctrine of the Gospel of the grace of God. But we find also the whole machinery of the Church of Rome—Popes, Cardinals, Colleges, Jesuits, all striving every nerve to crush this doctrine both in him and in those who taught him. We find him, in letters which for learning and proof, and wit and temper, have never been equalled in controversy, convicting them of destroying the very foundations of religion and morality. Yes, we find the Pope and the Church of Rome using all their power to the utmost to sustain these Jesuits against him, and to extinguish him and all other Jansenists. We find that the Jesuits are, day by day, getting more and more dominion over the Roman Church; and our chief desire is to revive among Roman Catholics that religion of the heart which Pascal so eminently possessed.

A COPY of a Tuam newspaper has been forwarded to us, containing a correspondence between the Rev. James Fowler, the curate of that town, and Mr. Lockhart, formerly of Oxford, and now a Roman Catholic clergyman. We cannot afford space to insert this correspondence in our columns, and content ourselves with giving a brief account of the substance of it. Mr. Lockhart, it seems, in arguing against the position that Scripture is our sole rule of faith, named certain doctrines which, he asserted, were essential parts of the Christian faith, and which were yet incapable of Scriptural proof. On the general line of argument here adopted by Mr. Lockhart we may observe that it is more calculated to make men unbelievers than to make them Roman Catholics; for if he could succeed in showing Protestants that doctrines which they had been accustomed to receive as essential parts of their faith did not in reality rest on Scriptural authority, most of them would be more disposed to reject the doctrines than to receive them without such proof. He is not the only Roman Catholic, however, who is fond of using this "kill or cure" remedy; too many of the advocates of the Roman Catholic Church, in this respect, resembling the woman whom Solomon discovered not to be the mother of the child she claimed, by her readiness to suffer it to be slain, if it were not to belong to her.

To this challenge, however, of Mr. Lockhart's Mr. Fowler replied, by referring to a number of Scripture texts, as containing the proofs required by Mr. Lockhart. The latter retorted, with an examination of Mr. Fowler's Scripture proofs, arriving at the result that not one of them was conclusive. Thereupon Mr. Fowler replied, by printing his previous letter, in parallel columns, with passages out of the Catechism of the Council of Trent, from which he had purposely borrowed the proofs in question. Mr. Lockhart still persisted in denying that the proofs were valid, and the (Roman Catholic) editor of the Tuam paper triumphed over Mr. Fowler as if he were unable to prove his doctrines on Protestant grounds, and were obliged to have recourse to Roman Catholic authorities.

It appears to us, however, that if a proof be good, it remains good, no matter who makes use of it. If what the Catechism of the Council of Trent puts forward as Scripture proofs be so in reality, they will be so still in the mouths of Protestants. And even if a Protestant were to borrow his Scriptural arguments from Roman Catholic authorities, he would still argue on Protestant grounds, as long as the arguments were founded on Scripture only.

But this correspondence of Mr. Lockhart's suggests to us an important reflection. We discover here that the Scripture proofs put forward by the Catechism of the Council of Trent, for doctrines which Protestants and Roman Catholics hold in common, are not regarded by Roman Catholics as proofs at all. They receive the doctrines on the authority of the Council, and not because they can be proved from Scripture, or, at least, they take it on the Council's authority that the texts in question are proofs. These proofs are like the pillars which architects sometimes place, for ornament, in front of their buildings, which, though they appear to be props for support, are, in reality, part of the structure to be supported.

Now, the reflection arises, may it not be the same with what Roman Catholics put forward as Scripture proofs of doctrines which Protestants do not hold? Are we not, perhaps, wasting our labour in showing that the texts brought forward in support of Purgatory or prayers to the saints do not, in reality, prove these doctrines? Probably, if we held these doctrines ourselves, and were to attempt to bring forward the same texts in support of them, Mr. Lockhart and his friends would then discover that the texts did not prove the doctrines at all, and that the authority of their Church is, in reality, the sole support which these doctrines have. We shall consider this matter hereafter.

ON THE INTERNAL EVIDENCES OF THE CATHOLIC RELIGION.

WE promised to consider, in this number, "whether the Church of Rome or the Church of England and Ireland professes the religion most suited to supply the real wants of fallen man."

We might have offered arguments from various sources to throw light upon this question; but we cannot now. Things that are seen with our eyes and felt with our hearts leave no place for argument; and the writer of this, within the last few days, and the last few hours, has witnessed scenes in which it has been given him to see with his eyes, that the Gospel which we preach "is the power of God unto salvation, to every one that believeth."—Rom. i. 16.

He has seen a man in the prime of life brought down in a brief period to the grave—one who filled a position of extensive influence, honoured and beloved by all around him, and adorning every relation in life; the head of a large and united family, who, under his ceaseless care and cheerful influence, afforded the brightest example of domestic happiness.

Oh, what a change, to see this strong man struck down, laid low by pain and weakness; to see that happy family all weeping now; to see his partner in a union whose happiness no shade had ever darkened, as she appeared to treasure up each failing breath that brought it to a close!

It was a time to try the religion of that man and family, and of the Church that taught them; it was a time to try if their's were the religion of the heart; if that religion had power to support him in that so sudden passage from this world's truest joys to that dark descent, that unknown journey, at which our nature shudders; it was a time to try if that religion could support them in that greatest of all earthly trials, that approaching desolation of that so happy home.

That face that so long had beamed, and made so many other faces beam with happiness—so sadly changed by suffering and pain—yet still more changed in this, that earthly happiness had given place to smiles of heavenly joy. All earthly thoughts were put away; no care of earthly things disturbed that breast; the objects of his earthly love were given up with cheerful confidence to the Heavenly Father's care and love, to Him whose everlasting love was felt and known.

One only thought and care for them remained—for wife, for children, servants, all whom he had cared for with such earnest care; and that thought was, to tell, to warn, to entreat them all, with all the fervour of a final parting—with all the calmness of an everlasting union—of that which gave him peace and joy in nature's final struggle, of that which he declared would never fail them, though all earthly joys should fail.

And then, to see those gushing sorrows all around him hushed into a calmness and tranquillity almost approaching to his own—to see grief itself compelled to rejoice, because he was happy then!

This was indeed to see and feel that the Gospel is indeed the power of God to them that believe.

And what did this? What caused this dawn of heavenly joy to shine out of that utter darkness of all human happiness? He told it himself to the writer of these lines. These were his words—"All that ever I did seems to me now no better than filthy rags in the sight of God. All my hope and confidence is in Christ my Saviour; and in Christ my Saviour I have hope, and peace, and joy."

And this faith was the source of light arising out of darkness—of joy striving against sorrow, alike in them that lived and in him that died.

Had Mr. M'Manus witnessed this striking scene, could he have said, in presence of such evidence of the grace and power of God, that the Church of which this man was a faithful member had only "set before his mind a dry and barren abstraction of a Deity—had held forth an empty vessel to the parched and thirsty wanderer in the desert—had stripped Christianity of all that can make it lovely and attractive?"

Had she not led him rather to an all-sufficient Saviour, who is able to keep that which is committed to him? (2 Tim. i. 12.) and to drink out of the river of the water of life, that proceedeth out of the throne of God and of the Lamb?—Rev. xxii. 1.

What else was wanting, then, to make faith a victory that overcometh the world?—1 John v. 4.

Was it masses for dead, to be offered over and over again, year by year continually, and thus proclaiming, by their own vain repetition, that they cannot satisfy? What sacrifice can then best satisfy the soul?—"Christ, who was offered ONCE, to exhaust the sins of many."—Hebrews ix. 28, Douay Bible. Who "by one oblation hath perfected for ever them that are sanctified."—Heb. x. 14. Or, "the self-same sacrifices, which they offer continually every year, (and which) can never make the comers thereunto perfect, for then they would have ceased to be offered."—Heb. x. 1, 2.

Or what was wanting then to complete the consolation that religion gave to that family under their greatest trial? Whether was it happier for them then to believe, with the Church of Rome, that those sharp but brief pains were but the entrance into ages, perhaps, of agonizing torture—ages which the Church of Rome gives no means to calculate, of which she never gives security that the torture is over, lest no more masses should be paid for—or to believe in the Word of God—the voice from heaven—"Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord. From henceforth now, saith the Spirit, that they may rest from their labours."—Apoc. or Rev. xiv. 13, Douay Bible.

Many such dying scenes it has been the writer's privilege to witness; and from his heart and from the evidence of his senses he can repel the assertion, that his is "a cold and lifeless system, unable to make any solid impression on the heart and affections."

If any should be moved to say in his heart, on reading this account—"May I die the death of the righteous, and may my last end be like his," let him seek for that righteousness which Paul, the chief of sinners, found; "not having mine own righteousness, which is of the law, but that which is through the faith of Christ, the righteousness which is of God by faith."—Philip. iii. 9.

If any would find the "peace at the last," which this man found, let him seek it through life, as this man sought it, by "believing in Jesus."

ON SAINTS' DAYS, PURGATORY, PRAYERS FOR THE DEAD, ETC.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

SIR—Since you have put yourself forward as the Inquisitor of Catholic doctrines, it might reasonably be expected that you would give conclusive evidence on all those points which you have undertaken to discuss; and particularly so with regard to the doctrine of purgatory. But waiving this consideration, let me admit, for the sake of argument, that my citations from Origen are heretical; then the absurd conclusion follows, that the Saints Basil, Cyril, Gregory of Nyssa, Ambrose, Jerome, Augustine, with many other lights of the fourth century, are alike involved in the same heresy; for many of these Fathers explain (1 Cor. iii. 12, 13, &c.) in same manner as Origen, and nearly in the same words, whilst all of them invariably adopt the principle which it enunciates.

These latter evidences, you object, are not within the proposed limitation; admitting so, I consider it perfectly within the limits of reason to maintain that these holy men, whose eulogy needs not a repetition, could not, nor did not, adopt, at second hand, the opinion of a heretic, and palm it on the Church of God as a portion of the religion of Jesus Christ, as they all unanimously declare the doctrine of purgatory to be.

You admit that the silence of Scripture is the most powerful argument with Protestants against the doctrine of purgatory; with respect to the doctrine of the Protestant Church in the practice of praying for the dead, and which you maintain is the same as that of the early church, the Scripture is as silent as the grave; upon what authority, then, does the Protestant Church hold this point of doctrine?

I next find in the Book of Common Prayer, that the Church of England has appointed holidays for a great number of particular saints, with a distinct service for each day; a holiday also, for St. Michael and all the angels, and another for all the saints. What warrant of Scripture have you for all these? Did the synagogue order holidays in honour of Moses, the Patriarchs, or any of the Prophets? Did St. John the Evangelist, the survivor of all his fellow Apostles and Evangelists, order a day to be celebrated with holy solemnity in honour of any of them? On all these points the Scripture is equally silent as on the doctrine of purgatory, and hence you see the necessity to expunge from the calendar all these holidays, and not allow them to remain any longer in the very threshold of the Liturgy, at variance with the essential principles of rigid Protestant theology; also, to abolish the practice of praying for the dead, or at once admit that the Church of England retains doctrines for which she has no Scripture authority.

I have already stated that prayers were offered by the early Church in plain and direct words, for all who died in the Catholic communion, but I contend, on the authority of St. Epiphanius, that the intention of the Church in these prayers varied according to the relative character of the parties for whom they were offered, and until the two words thanksgivings and propitiations can merge into one common acceptation, the passage which I cited from St. Epiphanius will bear out this distinction. St. Cyprian declares (in fine Lib. de Mortalitate) that the saints in heaven pray most anxiously for our salvation. I ask would this holy Father pray for these saints indiscriminately with the other dead? The Bishop of Oxford, in his edition of St. Cyprian, page 271, has these remarkable words—"We doubt not but the saints in heaven pray earnestly to God, that he may have mercy on those struggling on earth." Our Saviour says to his disciples (John xiv. 2, 3,) "I go to prepare a place for you—that where I am, there you may be also;" the primitive Church knew this Scripture, and therefore can hardly be contemplated as praying to God to have mercy on the Apostles, the Blessed Virgin, &c., to grant them pardon of their sins—to grant them mercy, relief, comfort, &c., in common with the other dead.

I now respectfully submit that the passages in St. Epiphanius, connected with the heresy of Aerius, besides the practice of praying for the dead, establish two other very important facts elucidatory of the object of these prayers. First, that the Church in the time of St. Epiphanius believed that some sins were forgiven in the world to come; secondly, that the prayers which the Church offered for the dead, and the alms given to the poor, were believed, to some extent, efficacious in obtaining this forgiveness. The words of Aerius afford the most satisfactory evidence, that these three points are conjointly the object of his attack, which could not be the case if they were not then the doctrine and practice of the Church.

This dogmatizer asks, "why are the dead prayed for?" (Epiph. Hor. 75, sec. 3. Tom 1. page 908,) and had he stopped here, and made no allusion, as he subsequently does, to the object of these prayers, there might be some reason to deny that these prayers were then offered in the same sense in which the Catholic Church now prays for the dead; but again he asks (not inquiringly, but ridiculing the doctrine which he attempts to impugn)—"If the living pray for the dead, and give alms to the poor, what helps can arise to the dead from these things?" (ibidem) thus cavilling at the belief of the Church, that some sins were remitted after death, and that prayers, alms, &c., helped to obtain this remission. That this is obviously his meaning, is, moreover, fully confirmed by the frivolous objection which he next makes; for had he not understood the doctrine of the Church on this point to be what I stated above, regarding the object of prayers for the dead, he could not have opposed to it the following objection:—"for," says he, "if the prayers of the living can obtain pardon of sins for those who are departed out of this life, no one will live piously here, nor do any good action, but he will engage some friends, either by entreaties, or by bestowing large sums of money on them, who may pray for him after death, that his wicked deeds might not be punished in the next world" (Ibid).

Here, then, we have attested and confirmed by the arguments of Aerius, that the Catholic Church in his day believed that some sins were forgiven after death, and that the prayers of the living and alms were powerful auxiliaries in effecting this forgiveness; or, we have here established the essential doctrine of Purgatory; and this being an indisputable fact, I shall readily forego all controversy respecting the name. The reply of St. Epiphanius is equally explicit in proof of this doctrine. He says, "We mention in our prayers the names of sinners who are dead, that we may supplicate God for mercy of them" (Epiph. Hor. 75. Sec. 3. T. 1. page 911.); no mercy extends to the damned (Mark ix. 44); no sin enters heaven (Rev. xxi. 27). And, again, he says, "These prayers which are offered for the dead afford them help, though they may not blot out all their sins" (Ibid, Sec. 7. page 911.) Let sophistry show, if possible, that the saint does not teach here, that some sins may be cancelled by these prayers. Lastly, he tells Aerius that the Church has this doctrine traditionally from Christ (Sec. 8. page 912); not "from ghost stories," as you insinuate, and thus he intimates to him that this doctrine which maintains that the prayers of the living can obtain pardon of sins for the dead, and which he attempts to deny, forms a part of that supernatural system propounded by our Saviour to his Apostles, and that it is presumptuous in him, a blind beetle, so he calls him, to find fault with it. Hence, it appears, that whilst discussing prayers for the dead, we are virtually discussing the doctrine of Purgatory. And the Translators of Du Pin. (Cent. 7.-page 3.) assures us "that prayers were offered in the Church for the relief of the souls of the faithful departed, about two hundred years after Christ; and that these prayers of the first Christians were very warrantable and pious." They might have assigned these prayers a much earlier existence, for the authorities whom they cite all refer the origin of this practice either to Christ or to the Apostles; and I have shown that, in the fourth century, the doctrine of the Church respecting the object of these prayers was identically the same as the doctrine of Purgatory in the Catholic Church of the present day.

I have, again, to apologize for the length to which these observations have extended, and presuming on your usual courtesy,

I remain, Sir, yours, &c. &c. &c.

EDMOND POWER.

We must object to our correspondents filling our columns with mere assertions, without proofs. In future, our rule must be to decline inserting anything for which some proof is not offered.

Mr. Power here asserts that a long list of Fathers, whom he names, agreed with Origen about Purgatory. He gives no proof, but his own assertion, and we explicitly deny the fact. Origen believed that all who are turned into hell, men and devils alike, will finally be saved by the Purgatorial efficacy of hell fire. This was Origen's notion of Purgatory; every proof brought from him for Purgatory means this and nothing else, and this is the only Purgatory that Mr. Power can show from the Fathers of the first three hundred years.

It is wholly untrue and unwarrantable to say that the Fathers whom Mr. Power mentions, gave any countenance to this heretical doctrine.

Mr. Power also asserts of the Fathers he mentions, that "they all unanimously declare the doctrine of Purgatory to be 'a portion of the religion of Jesus Christ.'" This is mere assertion, of which Mr. Power gives no proof whatever. We call on him to give the passages from each of the Fathers he has named, in which they make this declaration. Until he do this, we are at liberty to deny his assertion.

Some of them spoke of it as a mere matter of speculation—as a thing that might be, or might not be. Is this the way they spoke of the religion of Jesus Christ?

Mr. Power is entirely mistaken in supposing that services on particular days, in commemoration of the apostles of Christ, are "at variance with the essential principles of rigid Protestant theology." He confounds things that are totally different in their own nature. We will explain this once for all. The sixth article of the Church of England and Ireland, says—"Holy Scripture containeth all things necessary to salvation, so that whatsoever is not read therein, nor may be proved thereby, is not to be required of any man, that it should be believed as an article of faith." Article 20 says—"The Church hath power to decree rites and ceremonies." Article 34—"Whosoever through his private judgment, willingly and purposely, doth openly break the traditions and ceremonies of the Church, which be not repugnant to the Word of God, and be ordained and approved by common authority, ought to be rebuked openly.....Every particular or national Church hath authority to ordain, change, and abolish ceremonies or rites of the Church, ordained only by man's authority, so that all things be done to edifying." Is it not clear that according to this "essential principle of Protestant theology," direct authority and proof from Scripture is required only for "articles of the faith," and not for rites and ceremonies? and how, then, is it inconsistent with this theology, to follow it exactly as we do? And yet we have direct authority to commemorate the apostles, in Heb. xiii. 7.

Prayers for the dead we have never countenanced nor vindicated farther than as they may rely on the promise and the Word of God; and as long as we do not go beyond this, how can we be taunted with admitting prayers for the dead not warranted by Scripture? God has promised to keep the souls of the faithful departed; he has promised to raise their bodies hereafter, and to make both soul and body glorious with himself. When we pray, "thy kingdom come," we pray not for ourselves alone, but for the consummation of bliss to all that shall inherit that kingdom. We hold to this principle, that acceptable prayer must be founded on the promises of God; that it is a calling upon God to perform his word; and this can never lead to prayer not warranted by Scripture. We believe that the most ancient prayers for the dead did not go beyond this, and that modern prayers for the dead do violate it grossly. That the early Church prayed for all alike who departed in the faith—apostles, martyrs, prophets—is conclusive that it was not intended as prayer to deliver out of Purgatory, but as calling upon God to perform what is yet to be fulfilled of his word. Mr. Power asks would St. Cyprian and the primitive Church pray for those Saints in heaven who now pray for us, "indiscriminately with the other dead?" We answer, "certainly not, if these prayers were prayers for getting souls out of Purgatory." But the fact is, that the early Church did pray for the saints in Heaven, in the same prayers and in the same words in which she prayed for all those departed in the faith; and, hence, we conclude that they were not prayers for getting souls out of Purgatory, but, simply, prayers to God, to fulfil his word and promises to them. Is there any promise from God to take souls out of Purgatory? Let Mr Power only show us such a promise, and then we will join in such prayers.

Mr. Power's argument from Aerius and Epiphanius is more deserving of attention, as being accompanied with proofs and references. We have not space to enter on it in this number, but will give due attention to it in our next. But this belongs to the fourth century: no proof has yet been produced for Purgatory from the first 300 years of the Church. That at least may now be considered as settled.

ADORING IMAGES—THE MOTHER OF GOD.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

SIR—Stauracius, Bishop of Chalcedon, is reported to have said, "εικονας ως αρραβωνα της σωτηριας μου ουσας," i.e., the images which I hold to be pledges of my salvation: and Gregory of Sinope, "σεβομενος και προσκυνων," i.e., venerating and worshipping: can you name the writings in which the expressions may be found? It is remarkable that "venerating and worshipping" were the words used for that worship of the Emperor's statue, which the first Christians died rather than offer.

Not being a Greek scholar, I shall be obliged if you will inform me if the title of Theotokos, bestowed on the mother of Jesus, admits of any other meaning besides the generally understood one of Mother of God.

Yours, &c.,

WILLIAM BLOOD.

Wicklow, August 2, 1853.

Stauracius, Bishop of Chalcedon, was present at the Second Council of Nice, held in the year 787, which Council first sanctioned the adoring of images. Stauracius adopts the words from a letter which he says was written by Pope Adrian to Tarasius.—Labbe and Cossart, Concilia Generalia, vol. vii., p. 705.

Gregory of Synope was present in the same Council, and also used the words attributed to him.—Labbe and Coss., vol. vii., p. 709.

We are happy to answer the questions of correspondents when we can; but, when a correspondent gives us no reference nor clue whatever, it is very like looking for a needle in a bundle of straw. By the way, there is a great deal of straw in that Council, and chaff too—near a thousand folio columns. For several hundred years it was rejected by the Western Church as erroneous, and other Councils were held to condemn it, though now it is counted a General Council and infallible, by the Church of Rome. We shall probably have occasion to discuss the merits of this Council on some other occasion.

Θεοτοκος (Theotokos) is not the word that would have been used by persons who spoke the Greek language to express what the Church of Rome now means by "Mother of God." The origin and intention of the term Θεοτοκος is well known. Nestorius taught that the Son of God and the son of Mary were two different persons. This was a heresy that struck at the root of our redemption by Christ; because, according to this notion, it was the son of Mary only, a mere man, who died upon the cross; and, therefore, the infinite value of the atonement was destroyed. This was the error that the General Council of Ephesus had to guard against; they had to maintain that the very person who was born of Mary was also the Son of God, and, therefore, God. They did this by calling her θεοτοκος, the exact meaning of which is—"she who brought forth him who was God." This was then the whole meaning and intention of the term; and in this sense it is held and approved by all orthodox Protestants. The sense which later Romish writers have sought to put on the term is this—that Christ in his divine nature and office is subject to Mary as his mother; and, sometimes, even attributing deity to herself as his mother—thus Bernardinus de Busti, "she understands herself in her son, to be as his other self, INVESTED WITH DEITY."—Mariale, part xii., sermon 2. It is clear that the Council of Ephesus never had any idea of using the term in any such sense as this; and it was such awful abuses and perversions of the term in later times, that led to the term itself being dropped by Protestants, although they hold firmly all that the term was at first intended to express and defend—namely, that he who was born of Mary was truly God. The church does well to invent terms to exclude from her ministry those who introduce heresies; and she does well, too, to drop those terms when they are perverted to countenance other heresies, all the while holding and preserving one and the same faith herself.

If any one wish for further proof of the real object of calling Mary "the Mother of God," we quote from another source. "From the time wherein the Virgin Mother did conceive in her womb the Word of God, she hath obtained such a kind of jurisdiction, so to speak, or authority, in all the temporal procession of the Holy Ghost, that no creature hath obtained any grace or virtue from God, but according to the dispensation of his holy mother" (Bernardin. Senens., Serm. 61, art. 1, cap. 8). Again; "Because she is the mother of the Son of God, who doth produce the Holy Ghost; therefore, all the gifts, virtues, and graces of the Holy Ghost are by her hands administered to whom she pleaseth, when she pleaseth, how she pleaseth, and as much as she pleaseth" (In the same Sermon).

Do not wonder at this, reader, that all power should really belong to her, and not to God (that is, if you can believe in these men), for the other Bernardine (de Busti), will tell you (if you can believe him), that "howsoever she be subject to God, inasmuch as she is a creature; yet she is said to be superior and preferred before him, inasmuch as she was his mother!"—Mariale, part xii., ser. 2.

This man was the most famous preacher of the Church of Rome in his day; and similar doctrine about "the mother of God" is now countenanced and circulated by the Church of Rome, in "the Glories of Mary;" the writer of which has lately been made a saint by the Pope.

Was it not time to drop the term "Mother of God," when it led to such teaching as this?

THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN AND THE INDEX EXPURGATORIUS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

YOUR HONOUR—Will you tell us, is it true, does bad books go to Purgatory, all as one as bad men? For there's some of the neighbours gathers into my house on an evening to read the CATHOLIC LAYMAN, and while we was reading last night, in comes Peter Connelly, that's clerk and school-master in the chapel, and mighty mad he was to see what we was reading. "And don't you know," says he, "the CATHOLIC LAYMAN is put in the Index Expurgatorius, by his Holiness the Pope?" And with that we all began axing him what that was at all. Well, with that, he seemed very bothered for a minute, how to tell us; but he gathered himself up, and says he, "its ignorant creatures you are that doesn't know Latin" (for he is a mighty conceited little fellow about his learning); and when we kept on axing him he began to tell us: "sure its Latin," says he; "and, sure, index is the Latin for what's in a book," says he; "and expurgatorius," says he, "of course, that's in regard of Purgatory, and so it means the list of them that's in Purgatory." And one of the boys said, "he never heard tell before of books going to Purgatory, and how would the Pope send them there at all." "And isn't it just the place for the like of the heretic CATHOLIC LAYMAN," says Peter, "where it would be burnt all out, the first blaze?" And with that Ned Gallagher says, "and was it just the one paper the Pope sent to Purgatory, or was it all the papers in a bundle?" "Why, all of them, to be sure," says Peter." "And do they be burned there?" says Ned. "To be sure," says he; "the first look of Purgatory puts them all in a blaze, and there isn't so much as a bit of tinder left you could light your pipe at." "Well, now, its clear to me," says Ned, holding up the paper, "that this one isn't burnt yet, anyway." "Well done Ned," says all the boys. "that's it anyway."

Well, there was one Mike Slattery with us, that knows the Latin, for he was at school when he was a boy with Bob Slattery, of Tralee, and it's he that was the scholar, and says Mike, "don't you see it's not purgatorius, but expurgatorius, that's in it; and what's the meaning of ex," says he, "isn't it Latin for out of, and so, if it means anything about it," says he, "it means the list of them that's out of purgatory. Is it forgetting your Latin you are, entirely, with all your learning?" says he. And your honour never seen a man so knocked of a heap as Peter: and he cut off as hard as he could; and, I'm thinking, it's to tell the priest on us he went. But never fear, your honour, the boys will read the CATHOLIC LAYMAN if it's at the back side of a ditch, or the bottom of a bog-hole, now we're cutting the turf. But, when he was gone, we agreed we would write to your honour, and ask if it's true that the Pope has took all the CATHOLIC LAYMAN out of the post-office, and sent them all in a big bag to Purgatory. But why would we bother your honour about it at all, when we know well enough that our paper is not gone to Purgatory at all, but just safe in the top of my hat this minute. But, your honour, will we get any more of them at all by the post-office?

Your honour's servant,

TEDDY BRIAN, of Kerry.

As far as we know, Peter Connelly is under a mistake, and more mistakes than one. It is not true that the Pope has put the CATHOLIC LAYMAN into the Index Expurgatorius; and if he did it in the way that Peter thinks, it would be a heavy job, for so many copies of the LAYMAN are published, that we send it to the Post-office in a dozen large sacks—each on the back of a man—as large as potato bags in a market.

But, it is an opportunity for us to explain to Roman Catholics things about their religion, that they know (as it seems) very little about.

There is a meeting of the Cardinals at Rome, called "the congregation of the Index." It is their business to read the books that are published. They keep two lists of books, one called the Index Prohibitus; and when the Cardinals write down a book in that list, the meaning is, that no Roman Catholic may read that book at all. They keep another list called the Index Expurgatorius, and when a book is put down in that list, the meaning is—that no one is allowed to read that book until it is purged out. And, then, some one is appointed to go over that book, and scratch out or change whatever the Church of Rome thinks contrary to faith or morals.

Some time or other we may have room to show to Roman Catholics what kind of books those Cardinals condemn, and what sort of changes they make in them; and also what kind of books they approve of without any change being made in them; with all which they will probably be not a little surprised. We can only say, at present, that the Pope and the Cardinals have lately taken the trouble to put into the prohibited index some of the school-books of the National Schools—such as the Lessons on the Truth of Christianity, the Lessons on Logic, or the Art of Reasoning, and we believe also the Scripture Extracts; all which books were approved of, as fit to be learned by Roman Catholic children, by the late Dr. Murray, Roman Catholic Archbishop of Dublin. But the Pope and the Cardinals, in their great care for faith and morals, have never condemned or purged out such books as those of Bernardine de Senis, or Bernardine de Busti, of which we have given extracts in our answer to Mr. Blood's letter, in this number, nor the books of the Jesuits, mentioned in our present number. If the Cardinals meet a book that may lead men to read the Bible—like the Scripture Extracts, they condemn that at once; but if they meet a book that teaches that the Blessed Virgin is superior to God himself, they never purge out that.

The subject is most important, because it shows that the Church of Rome is responsible for all the teaching of her priests and members that she does not condemn, and that she must be considered as approving of it. We invite communications on the subject from those who have made it their study. That Peter Connelly should take Expurgatorius "in regard of Purgatory" is, no doubt, very absurd; but it is very like many other arguments in which words that sound like Purgatory are taken as proofs of it, though, in fact, they have nothing to do with it.

NUNNERIES.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

SIR—I read your remarks on nunneries with interest, and as the subject is one of great importance, I desire to call the attention of yourself and your readers to some statements relating to them in St. Alphonso Liguori's Moral Theology. St. Alphonso is, as you are aware, one of the last of Rome's saints—a Bishop; lauded by Cardinals, beatified and canonized, severally, by Pope Pius VII. and Pope Gregory XVI. His Moral Theology is the authoritative moral theology of Rome, and in his writings we shall look for nothing adverse to the monastic life. Now, in his "Homo Apostolicus," Tract vii., c. 4, s. 61, he is urging on bishops to be very careful in examining into the willingness of girls professing themselves nuns; and this is the reason which he gives—"For the greater part of them enter the religious state, not by God's vocation, but impelled by their parents, and hence it afterwards follows that they had a restless life there, and introduce laxities into the community to the common detriment." And is this, indeed, so? The greater part of nuns, says St. Alphonso, are not called by God, and have entered upon their state of life without his vocation, and, therefore, without his blessing—not by their own will, but impelled by others; and the consequence is individual restlessness and general laxity. What an awful picture does the saint bring before us of the inside of Roman Catholic nunneries—a picture drawn by no Protestant hand, but by the great supporter of the Papacy and the Papal system in all its branches—St. Alphonso Liguori, founder of the Redemptorists! But should not the relatives of these poor restless ones arouse themselves? It may be thought that the Tridentine Excommunication is a sufficient safeguard to prevent any persons being driven into nunneries. But what denunciation is there that the subtlety of modern casuists will not escape from? Suarez, Bonacina, Filliuccius, and Liguori all agree that girls may be compelled to enter a monastery, in punishment for any fault, or for fear they may fall into any immodesty, or if by their presence at home they may give or receive offence.—(Hom. Ap. vii., c. 2, s. 5.) A rule, the heart of which is eaten out by exceptions, is not worth much. Relatives may have better cause to complain than they are themselves aware of; for while, on the one side, "parents who, without good and definite cause, turn away their children from the religious state in any manner, either by guile, nr by simply asking, or by promises, cannot be excused from mortal sin" (H. A. xiii, c 1, s. 25); and "incur excommunication if they hinder girls from professing, or taking the habit, without good reason" (H. A. vii., c. 2, s. 5)—on the other side, "although it may be becoming for children not to go away without their father's blessing, yet this is understood when there is no danger of the father averting them from their holy purpose; but since this danger almost always exists, St. Thomas, without exception, exhorts children not to use their relatives' advice in the question of religious vocation. Relations, says the saint, must be removed from consultations on this point; for in this matter, relations are not friends but enemies."—H. A. xiii., c. 1, sec. 24. Parent against child—mother-in-law against daughter-in-law—not peace, but a sword. At any rate, these are not the main precepts of the Gospel of Jesus, and if applicable at all after the first spread of Christianity, certainly applicable only as accidental consequences, not as things to be aimed at. But, however that may be, is there not cause for fathers and brothers to examine for themselves and see if Liguori's statement be true—if laxity and restlessness do reside within convent walls, owing to the inmates having, for the most part, entered upon their life without a calling from God, and by the impulse of others?

THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN IN KILPATRICK.

No. II.

IN our June number, we gave an account of a conversation which took place, in Mr. Gasteen's house, at Kilpatrick, between Mr. Townsend, and Brian Kennedy, and Tim Donovan, and how their talk was put a stop to by the priest, Mr. Sheehy, coming up. When they heard he was coming, the two men were down the hill in no time, and a hard run they had of it, until they came at last to the stile; and when they had got over into the road again, they stopped, all out of breath and laughing at each other, and Brien said—"Well, Tim, we had a great escape of it." "I don't know," said Tim; "it was seeing you run made me run, too; but I don't like making off as if I had shot at a man, when I was doing no wrong at all. I'd have liked to have heard what arguments Father Sheehy would have had to give. Sure it would only have been fair, after our listening to Gasteen's clergyman, to make him listen to ours."

"Arguments!" said Brien, "it's little arguments you'd hear from Father Pat. Sure, he often told us that arguing with Protestants was the worst thing we could do. He says we ought to turn a deaf ear to them all, and not listen to anything they have to say. Do you remember his saying, 'when any go astray from the Catholic faith, the first moment of their fall is when they begin to question, or to ask a reason for any part of the church's teaching? From that moment they are not in danger of losing the faith, but they have lost it already!' And didn't he tell us that it wasn't our part to enter into controversy with Protestants, as if we wern't sure that we're in the right? All we have to do is to tell them to submit themselves to the church, and, if they refuse, they must take the consequences."

"Well," said Tim, "that may be a very good way for keeping ourselves right, but I don't think it would be a very good way of bringing any of the other side round to us. There's Gasteen, as good a neighbour and as honest a man as ever lived. Would it not be a pity to think of his being damned for ever, if our speaking to him in the right way could prevent it? And yet, how could we expect him to listen to us if we only told him to think as we do, and wouldn't listen ourselves to any reason? Isn't it natural for him to say, as he did the other day, that Father Sheehy talks like a man who knew he was an impostor, and who hoped, by bullying and talking big, to prevent his claims being examined into?"

"Tim, Tim," said Brien, "it will be well if your pride does not lead you astray; I know you think you're a great controversialist. But maybe it would be better if you were to take the priests' advice, and leave controversy to them, and be satisfied yourself to believe as your fathers believed. That's what Jerry Sullivan told me when I asked him to come up and hear the CATHOLIC LAYMAN read, that he would live and die in the church his father lived in, and would never hear anything to the contrary."

"I hope," says Tim, "to live and die in the church my father lived in, too; but I am glad to say I can give a better reason than that for it. I would take the priest's advice, if they all gave the same advice; but though Father Sheehy is against controversy, Father Molony, that was before him, was very fond of it, and it was he advised me to buy Milner's End of Controversy, and a very fine book it is. But, if I was only a Catholic because my father was one, Gasteen has as good a reason as that for being a Protestant, since so was his father."

"But, they weren't always so," said Brian; "you know there were no Protestants before Martin Luther's time: so that Gasteen's fathers before then must have been good Catholics."

"But, then," said Tim, "there were no Christians here at all before St. Patrick's time, so that his fathers before that again must have been idolaters; and, if Jerry Sullivan's were a good way of talking, they ought always to have remained so. That's a notion I got out of a book my Pat was taught at the National School, which gave me better reasons for being a Christian than ever I knew before."

"Oh!" said Brian, "that's the book that's condemned by our bishops, and they don't read it there now. Sure, they say, it was a Protestant Bishop wrote it, and, it stands to reason, it can't be fit for us to read."

"Well," said Tim, "as for that book my conscience is clear; for the time I read it was when it was approved by Archbishop Murray, whose soul's in glory now, and it was a good book in those days. But, I must say that when our priests and bishops give us one advice one year, and another the next, they oughtn't to wonder if some of us made it an excuse for doing as we like ourselves."

"Then," said Brian, "you're the man I'd think would like an excuse for that; for though you're a good Catholic in your doctrines, you're as fond of your private judgment as any Protestant."

"Nonsense," said Tim, "I only use my private judgment because I can't help it. There's sense in what Gasteen told us, that we all use our private judgment one way or another. If he uses his private judgment in rejecting the church's authority, we use our judgment (better, I hope) in submitting to it. If I am using my private judgment when I go up to have an argument with Gasteen, Jerry Sullivan is using his private judgment when he makes up his mind to listen to no argument at all. So, in spite of Father Pat's advice, I'll go up to Gasteen's the next CATHOLIC LAYMAN he gets, and I hope, with Dr. Milner's help, to give him as good as he brings."

"Well, if you do, Tim," said Brian, "I'll go, too, to hear you, though I don't quite know whether we wouldn't do better to let them alone."

And so it happened that when the next number did come Donovan and Kennedy went both up as usual to hear it read. "Let's have the 'Talk of the Road,' Denis," said they; and this number it happened to be all about the scapular, but the part that set them off talking was where Jem read "how the scapular book said that it was a grand thing for the people to be joined together in societies, because then every one in the society gets a share in all the prayers, and sacrifices, and fastings, and alms, and mortifications, and all the good works of the rest; and then how Pat scratched his head and said 'And who's the gainer by that, I wonder, or who's the loser? Why there won't be more good works among them after all, and how will they divide? If every man gets his own, and that's the fairest, I don't see the gain at all; and, if they get share and share alike, why them that does the most is the losers, and them that does nothing is the gainers'" (see p. 65).

So at this Gasteen and Bill Rogers, another Protestant that was there, began to laugh, and to attack Tim Donovan, who they knew was a member of a confraternity, and very proud of it, too; and Tim Donovan was a little taken aback and could not explain at the moment what was the gain in his sharing his good works with the rest. "But," says he, "at any rate we all share in the good works of our patron saint, and he can afford to share with us since he has more than he wants for himself." "Are you so sure of that?" said Gasteen. "I don't know," said Donovan, "what you Protestants may believe, but if you were to read the life of one of our saints, such as Saint Francis, you would acknowledge that he had done far more than enough to get him into heaven." "And do you expect," said Gasteen, "if you get to heaven, to have as high a place there as Saint Francis?" "No," said Donovan, "I am not so presumptuous as to equal myself to a blessed saint like him, that did more good works in one year than I expect to do in all my life." "Then," said Gasteen, "if his good works do more than barely get him into heaven, and if they all help to get him higher dignities hereafter than those who haven't done so much, maybe even Saint Francis wouldn't wish you to get the credit of his good works, but would rather be rewarded for them himself; for it wouldn't be fair, if they were of use to him in getting him a higher place, to let them count over again for you. I remember, when I was young, the first time my father trusted me to Loughmanagh fair to sell a flock of sheep for him, and I did it very well, as I thought, and sold them for a good price to one that I thought was a very grand gentleman, and he gave me his cheque on the National Bank for them; but afterwards, when I came to the bank for the money, they would not pay; either my gentleman had no money there or he had spent it all on himself. Well, I was greatly ashamed then of my bargain; my father managed to get the best part of the money paid, though he had a long time to wait for it, but it has made me know ever since that an order to pay money is not worth much if the man who signs his name to it has not authority to do it, and I thought of the story when I heard of your confraternity drawing on Saint Francis's good works for the use of your members. I'd like to know if you have Saint Francis's authority to do it, or if maybe he hasn't spent them all on himself; if he has, perhaps you will look as foolish as I did when the clerks at the bank gave me 'no effects' for my answer instead of the money I was to take back to my father."

At this story Bill Rogers began to laugh, but Jim Donovan became rather cross, and said—"I wish you wouldn't bring in your nonsensical stories when we're talking on a serious subject, and at any rate you can't deny that a saint may give us his intercession and be none the worse for it himself. You said before now that you pray for me and my neighbours here, and, with all respect to you, I don't see why Saint Francis's prayers shouldn't be as good as yours, or where would be the harm of my asking for them." So upon this there began a long discussion about the intercession of the saints, too long to be repeated here. A great part of the arguments made use of have appeared in the CATHOLIC LAYMAN already, and any one may find in "Milner's End of Controversy" the substance of all that Tim Donovan said. Gasteen attempted to take advantage of something that Donovan said out of Milner, viz.:—"That he might be a good Catholic without ever praying to the saints, and that there was no precept of the Church commanding them to pray to the saints," and he wanted to know as Christ was ready to intercede for him what more he wanted—why it would not be better to direct our prayers to him to whom we are commanded to pray, and who has promised to hear our prayers, rather than to those to whom we have no command to pray, and with regard to whom it is very doubtful whether they can hear our prayers or not (CATHOLIC LAYMAN, vol. i., p. 64).

"I don't neglect praying to Christ," said Tim Donovan; "and suppose even my praying to the saints was no good, where's the harm of it? there's a little time lost, and there's the end of it."

"It would be well if we were sure of that," said Gasteen, "and yet we know that there is such a thing as idolatry; the Lord is a jealous God, and does not like his glory to be given to another."

"There's no teaching you our doctrines," said Donovan. "I am not guilty of idolatry, nor any Catholic that's been rightly taught; I honour the saints, but I don't honour them with the honour that belongs to God only."

"That's just the point I'd like to argue," said Gasteen. "I suppose you'll allow that a man may be guilty of idolatry even though he does not give the name God to the thing he worships; many of the heathen never supposed the beings whom they worshipped to be the supreme God who created heaven and earth. God has commanded us to love Him with all our heart and soul and strength, and we are not keeping this command, if another has a higher place in our hearts; and if when we are in any trouble, it's not He that we think at once of applying to. Now, this is a sin which I think those that make it a habit to pray to the saints can hardly help falling into. I find myself, that my farm, and my wife and children, take up a great part of my thoughts, and I find it hard enough, as I dare say you do, too, to give much of my thoughts to the things I can't see; still, by reading the Bible, and by meditating on what the Saviour has done for me, I thank God I have learned to love Him; and whenever I am in trouble or temptation, it's His name that comes first to my lips; but now if I had accustomed myself to look to the intercession of the Virgin, or any other saint, it's very true I might know that any blessing she gave me was not altogether from herself, but obtained by her intercession from God; still, if I thought she could obtain anything she asked, I needn't look beyond her; it's no matter how she gets it if she is sure of being able to get it for me, and so it would come to pass, that, in time of trouble, it's her name and not the Lord's that would fill my mouth. I am not speaking of things I don't know. I know many Roman Catholics (there's Jerry Sullivan for one), and they are always ready with their prayers to the blessed Virgin. Now, as I don't find that they think less of their wife, or their farm, or their children than I do, I fear they must think less of God. In fact, I believe that it is only a certain portion of men's thoughts that they can in general give to the unseen world, and when the saints got more of this, God gets less."

We cannot exactly report what followed this, because, at the idea of being charged with idolatry, Tim Donovan rather lost temper, and the discussion became noisy, and soon after the party broke up, not quite in such good humour as usual.

FARMING OPERATIONS FOR AUGUST.

(From the Irish Farmers' Gazette.)

Being now on the eve of harvest, it will be necessary that the farmer lose no time in putting the haggard and barns in a proper state for its reception, and getting all minor routine matter out of hands, in order that his undivided attention be given to the important matter of harvesting his crops properly. Over the large tract of the centre and south of Ireland this usually is the principal harvest month, though, from the very inclement weather which prevailed during the end of last autumn, and the winter and spring months, which prevented the timely sowing of wheat and other corn crops, we by no means expect it to come in so early as usual, though in favourable localities we have seen very promising breadths of winter-sown wheat and dun oats.

Wheat should be cut before it is thoroughly ripe—it is usual to recommend cutting about a week previous to that period—but the better guide will be to cut, as soon as the grain, when bruised between the fingers, gives out no juice, but kneads up in a glutinous mass; when cut at this period, a finer coloured sample is secured, the flour is whiter, and, as compared with its gross weight, a greater weight of flour and less bran is obtained than when allowed to get fully matured. The grain ripens sufficiently in the stook, and the loss by shedding, inseparable from handling too ripe corn, is prevented. As soon as the grain assumes the above appearance, it will be advisable to put on all the hands possible to cut it down expeditiously, if the weather be dry; but avoid cutting in wet weather; bind in small sheaves, and stack; but do not cap or hood, unless rain threatens, when that operation should be performed without loss of time.

Barley, which, in order that it may sprout equally and at the same time in malting, must, therefore, be equally ripe, should be allowed to get thoroughly matured before cutting, which is indicated by the ear bending down, and the joints of the straw becoming dry and juiceless; as it is more liable to injury from wet than any other grain, it should be cut expeditiously, immediately bound, and stooked; but avoid stacking till properly cured, and any herbage in the sheaves thoroughly dead and dry; if not, fermentation will set in, and injure or destroy the sample.

Oats, like the wheat, must be cut before fully ripe, and while the straw still retains a little of the green colour at the joints. If allowed to get ripe, much loss and injury will be sustained by the grain shedding; for, it must be remembered, that it is the primary and heaviest grains that will fall, so that the second sample only remains in most instances.

Rye ripens generally before wheat, and is very liable to shed. When the straw, from a bright yellow, assumes a paler colour, and the bottom knots lose the green colour, it is fit for cutting. It should get as little handling as possible, being particularly liable to shed. As it melts quickly it requires immediate protection from wet and damp, and should, therefore, be bound and stacked without delay.

Peas and Beans will require close attention this month. For details, see the Operations for last month.

Mangels, Carrots, Parsnips, and Turnips will require particular attention this month, in hoeing, weeding, and trimming, and the thorough and frequent pulverization of the spaces between the rows, with the horse drill-grubber on the large scale, or the digging-forks on the small one. When these crops are cultivated extensively, a properly commanded gang should be appointed to this work, totally independent of harvest men. For if they are now neglected, and weeds get ahead, or not properly thinned, and in due time, and the intervals stirred up deeply, and thoroughly pulverized, these valuable crops, that previously have cost so much in money, time, and labour, will suffer to an incalculable degree, and the object of a clean fallow lost, to the great detriment of the succeeding crops.

Stone Turnips, or Rape, when intended to be taken as stolen crops, should be sown on the stubble lands as soon after the severance of the corn crops as possible; working the land, if not foul with weeds, with a good heavy harrow, or a light grubbing, to render the surface soft and fine, will suffice. A little guano or superphosphate, if it can be spared, will be well bestowed on these crops; but foul land will not be suitable for them till thoroughly cleansed.

Transplanting Rape.—As soon after the corn is saved, the planting out of the rape, sown for that purpose in June, should be proceeded with, the earlier this work can be completed the heavier the crop. A liberal dressing of manure should be supplied; the land may be previously prepared as if for turnips, if time and help permit, and the plants dibbled in the crown of the drill, or the land may be planted as it is ploughed; having previously put out the manure in rows, the plants are laid down, by some active boys, in every third furrow, about a foot apart, the manure is then placed on the roots of the plants, and the next furrow covers it up, and completes the process.

Manure Meadows with rich composts, before the aftergrass makes growth; a light top-dressing to new meadows now will be worth double the quantity given in spring.

Sowing Clover and Rye-grass.—This is the last month in the year for laying down land to grass or clover, whether permanently or for soiling crops. In laying down to permanent grass, sowing 4 or 5 lbs. of rape to the Irish acre will be of the utmost advantage, giving an early and nutritious bite to ewes and lambs.

Stacking.—Before bringing the grain into the haggard the premises should be put in order, and well cleared of vermin, and no facilities afforded them to get into the stacks. Whether the stacks be large or small, they should be well ventilated, by carrying one or more flues from the bottoms upwards, which should discharge into one or more horizontal ones, open to the exterior at both ends. This will effectually prevent corn from heating in close haggards, and is applicable to hay-ricks; as each stack is finished it should be at once thatched, lest rain come on.

> "I have taken the responsibility of recommending to the enterprising publishers, whose names appear on the title page, to republish this little work, in its present form, and thus to place it within reach of American Christians, for the following reasons:—First, because I have met with no examination of the connection between 'Geology and Genesis,' so able as this. Other eminent writers, such as Dr. Chalmers, J. Pye Smith, Harris, Buckland, Silliman, Sedgewick and Whewell, have shown great skill in the examination of the Biblical questions connected with geology, but none of them have gone so fully into the argument as Mr. Crofton. Second, because he has opened a track which may be followed further by Biblical students. I mean in the examination of parallel passages of inspiration. Finally, because his course of argument is eminently adapted to satisfy the authorized expounders of God's Word—I mean the Ministers of the Gospel—that there is no collision between 'Genesis and Geology.' Mr. Crofton has made one or two favourable allusions to an earlier production of mine on this same subject, but I cannot suppose that any one will consider so slight a reference to be a reason why I should have formed a high opinion of his work, or why I should not express it.

THE GOLDEN LEGEND.

ABOUT ST. PETER AND THE SAMARITAN IMPOSTOR AT ROME.

THE Church of Rome, as most of our readers are aware, claims spiritual authority and supremacy over the rest of the Christian world. The argument by which the most eminent divines of that church endeavour to support this claim, is briefly as follows:—St. Peter was Bishop of Rome. Our Lord Jesus Christ conferred upon St. Peter a primacy and authority over the Apostles and other Christians. St. Peter continued Bishop of Rome to his decease, and left this authority as a legacy to his successors in that see. Hence it is inferred, that the Bishops of Rome, according to God's institution, are entitled to universal supremacy over the Christian Church—that this supremacy is indefectible and unalterable—and it is asserted, that, in fact, the Roman Bishops continually, from St. Peter's time, have enjoyed and exercised this sovereign power.

It will be seen from the above statement, (which we have endeavoured to compress into as brief a compass as possible) that the advocates of the Church of Rome are bound to establish a great many facts, before they can expect Protestants to acknowledge the supremacy of the Pope. Let us take, for example, the first proposition stated above—namely, "St. Peter was Bishop of Rome." Cardinal Bellarmine, in his discussion of this matter, says *—"We have four questions here to consider, 1. Was St. Peter at Rome at all? 2. Did he die there? 3. Was he bishop there? 4. Was he never translated from that see to any other?" Similar questions arise upon each of the other propositions; and ALL of these points must be clearly proved and established, before the claim of Papal supremacy can be justified.

If it can be shown that St. Peter had no primacy of power over the other apostles—if the privilege conferred on him by our Lord was a personal privilege, incapable of transmission to others—if antiquity is absolutely silent on St. Peter's supposed primacy—if the Church of Antioch can be proved to have a prior claim to the title of "the see of St. Peter" than the Church of Rome—if, according to some eminent writers, it is a very doubtful matter whether St. Peter was ever at Rome at all—if these or similar propositions can be maintained upon probable grounds, the whole theory of Papal supremacy is shaken to its base. For it must be carefully borne in mind, that, in the modern system of the Church of Rome, everything is decided by authority, not by evidence. She will not allow her people to examine for themselves into the truth of any doctrine of their religion; she prohibits all investigation of this kind as an unlawful exercise of private judgment; the only answer which she gives to such inquiries is—The Church has so decided it, therefore it must be true. When, therefore, the whole weight of the truth of Christianity is made to depend on the authority of the church—or of the Pope—(for the two are now, in fact, identical)—that authority ought itself to rest on a sure and solid foundation. It is the corner stone of the whole building. And if it can be shown that this foundation is but a loose heap of sand, without strength, solidity, or cohesion—drifted together by the winds and eddies of bygone ages—what reliance can be placed on such a basis? what becomes of the faith which is built on it? Can we be surprised when we behold this faith abandoned by Roman Catholics on the Continent, as well as at home, for secret or avowed infidelity?

It is not our intention at present to discuss at any length the question, whether St. Peter was ever at Rome. Many learned men have asserted that there is no satisfactory evidence for this fact in ancient writers, such as would bring even probable conviction to an impartial mind—much less such a clear and incontrovertible proof, as alone can serve for the basis of the all-important doctrine of Papal supremacy. If we confine ourselves to the New Testament, which is the only contemporaneous authority, and the only one on whose statements we can implicitly rely, it nowhere gives us the least reason for supposing that St. Peter was ever at Rome; nay, more, it furnishes us with many strong arguments for concluding that he could not have been there, at least for the greater portion of his life. Cardinal Baronius asserts that St. Peter was Bishop of Rome for twenty-five years—namely, from A.D. 43 to A.D. 68; now we have distinct evidence that St. Peter was not at Rome, during the greater part of this time. St. Paul says (Gal. i. 18), that three years after his conversion, he went to see St. Peter at Jerusalem, where he found him; fourteen years after, he again went to Jerusalem, and again found St. Peter there. During the interval, between A.D. 43 and 68, when St. Peter is said to have been at Rome, we have eight instances in which St. Paul was in communication with Rome; once by writing to that church, six times when writing from Rome, and once, during an abode of two years in that city, and on no one of these occasions is there the least hint given, that St. Peter was there during any portion of this time.

St. Peter was not at Rome, when St. Paul, mentioning Tychicus, Onesimus, Aristarchus, Marcus, and Justus, adds, "these alone are my fellow-workers unto the kingdom of God, who have been a comfort unto me" (Col. iv. 11.) St. Peter could not have been at Rome when St. Paul said, "at my first defence no man stood with me, but all men forsook me" (2 Tim. iv. 16.) He was not there immediately before St. Paul's death, when the "time of his departure was at hand," when he tells Timothy that "all the brethren did salute him" (2 Tim. iv. 6, 21.) The names of several are given, but St. Peter's name is nowhere to be found.

As we said before, we do not now undertake to discuss this question, which would carry us much beyond our present limits. Our object, in the foregoing remarks, was to prepare our readers for the following extracts from a document which is sometimes brought forward, even in our own day* as affording the clearest evidence that St. Peter was at Rome. The original author of the "Legenda Aurea" or "Golden Legends" is generally admitted to have been Jacobus de Voragine, Archbishop of Genoa, who died A.D. 1296. Cardinal Barrieres attaches importance to Nicephorus Callistus, Cedrenus, and other writers, who lived in the fourteenth century, as corroborative authorities upon some parts of the story. The "Golden Legends" obtained a very wide circulation in their day. The celebrity of this work was such, that it was one of the works most frequently printed in the fifteenth century, shortly after the art of printing became known.† It is not too much to say, therefore, that it must have exercised a very important influence on the popular mind, at a period when books were much more scarce and difficult of access than they are at present. Let us now see the kind of religious instruction, which an Archbishop of the Church of Rome thought fit to provide for his flock in the 13th century, and which a Roman Catholic controversialist in our day brings forward as a trustworthy authority for the decision of an important question. Our extracts must necessarily be very brief, but we will endeavour to put our readers faithfully in possession of the chief parts of the legend, so far as St. Peter is concerned.

A Samaritan impostor, named Simon Magus, is said to have lived at Rome during the reigns of the Emperors Claudius and Nero, and to have acquired an immense reputation by his witchcrafts. Among these, it may be mentioned, as we are assured by Nicephorus, Cedrenus, Cardinal Baronius, and other writers approved by the Roman Church, that "he was in the constant habit of making statues walk, of changing everything into gold, of assuming the appearance of a dragon, a sheep, or anything else he chose, and of transforming other people into all kinds of animals" (Nicephorus ii. 297). Towards the close of Nero's reign, the Samaritan was one day sitting in his study with some visitors, when he was surprised to see rush furiously into the room his immense dog, which was usually kept chained in the porch of his house, to keep off the crowds of people that were constantly flocking to his doors. What was the consternation of Simon's visitors when the dog stopped short in the middle of the room, and began to speak with the human voice, announcing the arrival of the Apostle Peter from Babylon! In their terror they exclaimed, "who is this Peter, and what mighty power does he possess?" In order to allay their apprehensions, Simon replied, "do not think this occurrence is so strange, for I can do exactly the same. Go, tell Peter to walk in," said he to the dog, "and be sure to speak to him like a man, as you have done to me." Whereupon the dog went out, and almost immediately afterwards, the great Apostle of the Jews, then nearly in his eightieth year (as Baronius tells us) entered the room, leaning on his staff, and with his gray hair falling over his shoulders.

Simon Magus now proceeded to those "diabolical artifices" as Father M'Corry calls them, which were the great business of his life. He sent for an immense bull, which was immediately brought to his hall door, and St. Peter was challenged by the wizard to a contest of miracles, in the presence of a great crowd of people. The impostor whispered something into the bull's ear, and the huge animal instantly dropped dead upon the pavement. The apostle said something, and the animal instantly resumed its legs. The people when they beheld the miracle, wondered, and exclaimed "to bring to life is a greater miracle than to kill." The historian Cedrenus adds, "many other miracles (πολλα αλλα σημεια) were performed by them not only in Rome but also in Syria." He forgets to inform us, however, of any particulars of those many miracles; or of the journey which the rival miracle-workers must have taken together, in order to pass from Rome to Syria. This was an unpardonable omission of our veracious historian.

We next find them again together at Rome, in the palace of the Emperor Nero. A young nobleman, a relative of the Emperor's, had just died, and Simon Magus was sent for to recall him to life. On entering the room, he found St. Peter there before him, who challenged the wizard to a contest of their miraculous powers, which the other promptly accepted, on the condition that if either succeeded, his rival should be put to death. The Samaritan then advanced to the bed, and stooped over the corpse. After repeating some awful incantations into its ear, the head began to move, no one perceiving the impostor's hand behind it. "See," cried every one, "he lives—they are talking to one another." "Take the Samaritan from the bed," said St. Peter, "and you will see that he deceives you." They did so, and the head dropped back inanimate. The mother of the deceased was in despair. The impostor was arrested in his endeavour to run down stairs, and the whole room was in confusion. Amidst it all, the calm tones of the Apostle were heard, uttering a few words, and immediately the deceased nobleman rushed into his mother's arms. Every one was eager to stone the impostor, but they were prevented by St. Peter. "Let him go," said he, "the exposure, the disgrace, is sufficient punishment." These occurrences are detailed, with many further particulars, by Jacobus de Voragine, and copied from him by other writers. They are also fully recorded by Father Xavier, and are mentioned, as well as the rest of this legend, by Cardinal Baronius, as incontestible facts.

As soon as the Samaritan escaped from the scene of the morning's tumult, he ran as fast as he could to the palace, demanded an audience of Nero, and implored him to send

† According to Dupin, it was printed at Nuremberg, in 1478, and 1493; at Deventer in 1479, and 1483; at Venice, in 1486; at Basil, in 1489; and at Strasburg in 1496. Our readers will remember that the art of printing came into use about 1457.

at once for that insolent Galilean. "I cannot tolerate this treatment any longer, Cæsar," said Simon Magus, in much excitement, as Peter entered; "I wonder very much that you can imagine this lying fisherman (hunc piscatorem mendacissimum) to be possessed of any power. Let me order my angels to come at once and deliver me from him." "I do not fear your angels" was Peter's reply. "What!" said Nero to the Apostle, "do you not fear one who proves true by his actions that he is one of our gods?" "If there is anything divine about him," said Peter, "let him tell what I am thinking of, or what I am going to do, and I shall first whisper to you, most excellent Cæsar, what it is." "Come close to me, then" said the Emperor, "and tell me what your thought is." "Tell them to bring me some barley bread," said Peter, in a very low whisper to the Emperor's ear, "and to give it to me without his seeing it." When the bread was brought, Peter put it in his pocket, except a little that he hid in his two hands. "Now, then," said he to the Samaritan, "tell me what I have here, and what I have been doing and saying." Our story here leaves us a good deal in the dark; but the end of the matter was, that Simon Magus, forgetting the respect which was due to the Emperor, roared out at last in a voice like thunder, "let my big dogs come and eat him up." Whereupon, two enormous dogs suddenly tumbled down the chimney and rushed at the Apostle. Peter stretched out his hands open towards them, showing them the barley bread which he had concealed. The effect of this upon the animals was to make them rush off again by the same way they came, to the great disappointment of their wicked master. Nero does not seem to have thought much of this performance. He called the Apostle and the Samaritan a pair of jugglers, and ordered them both to quit his presence (ὡς τερατολογους και αμφοτερους εκ προσωπου αυτου θαττον εξηλασεν. Cedrenus, Hist. Comp.)

We have only space for one extract more, out of this marvellous "Golden Legend." After an absence from Rome of about a year, Simon Magus again presented himself before Nero. "I know," said he, "most excellent Cæsar, how much right you have to question my supernatural powers, but I have not come to you this time without my proofs. Order them to cut off my head." Nero took him at his word, and the chief executioner was ordered to behead the Samaritan in the court-yard of the palace. Baronius and other writers inform us, as has been already mentioned, that the impostor was constantly in the habit of transforming himself into various kinds of animals. The executioner, when all was prepared, turned round for an instant to whet his scimitar; and, on again looking round, he saw a great ram with its head held down by the attendants. "Where is the Samaritan?" said he, fiercely. "Behold him, Sir," said the attendants, "we have never let this head go." The head was instantly severed from the body. The executioner wiped his scimitar, and said, "It is to be hoped that we shall hear no more of this juggling Samaritan." Within four or five days, however, the inexhaustible Simon Magus entered the presence chamber of the Emperor. "What is the cause of this neglect, Nero?" said he, "I have just been looking at the place where they cut off my head, and it is quite disgusting to see the blood. Do give them orders to wipe it up." The Emperor, in amazement, held out his hand, and assured him that he should never doubt him any more; but it was too late; the Samaritan was deeply offended. "Adieu," said he to Nero, as he turned to depart, "I shall leave Rome to-morrow in my fiery chariot, and you shall never see me more."

The morrow came. A fiery chariot and four (quadrigæ igneæ) awaited the Samaritan at a tower on the top of the Capitoline Hill. The people flocked in crowds from all parts of Rome to see the wondrous sight. The Emperor's carriage was conspicuous in the assembly; and, at an humble distance behind it, might be seen the Apostle Peter, and with him St. Paul, who, according to some accounts, had returned a day or two before from Spain. At length, the Samaritan impostor appeared upon the tower, with a crown of laurel on his head. "Farewell, Romans," said he, "I am sorry you make such fools of yourselves about those contemptible Galileans." He then mounted the chariot, and, like an enormous bird, soared aloft to the skies (ab illâ turri excelsâ avolans, in modo volucrium, sublime abiit). The Apostles looked at each other. "What shall we do?" said Paul, "he will soon be out of sight, if you do not make haste." Nicephorus relates that Peter became nervous and agitated (εν αγωνιᾳ μαλλον ην); but other writers suggest that his hesitation was probably intentional, in order that the Samaritan's fall might be the greater. At length the Emperor and the crowd heard the Apostle's well-known voice—"Angels of Satan," he exclaimed, "the flight has lasted long enough; let him fall, but let him live." The chariot and horses forthwith vanished into the air, and were never seen again. The impostor dropped from the clouds like a stone; and though he was not killed by the fall, yet he did not long survive it. When Nero heard of it, he ordered St. Peter to be arrested and put in prison. He considered that he had been robbed of his best friend: and thus, even after death, the Samaritan impostor persecuted the Apostle, for the emperor was terribly vindictive, and St. Peter was put to death upon an inverted cross.

Such is the "Golden Legend," regarding St. Peter's actions at Rome; and we will not weary the patience of our readers by pointing out the monstrous absurdities with which it abounds. It might, in our opinion, be more properly called, the "Brazen," than the "Golden" Legend; for it required no ordinary amount of brazen assurance in any writer, to invent such a story, and then pawn it off upon the world as a true record, intended to confirm and propagate the Christian faith. From what we know of the character of Jacobus de Voragine, Archbishop of Genoa, (who, as we before remarked, is the author of this legend), we need not wonder at the amount of barefaced, incredible lies, which it contains. He is described by Melchior Canus, an eminent Roman Catholic canonist, in no very flattering terms. "That legend" saith he, "was written by a man that had a mouth of iron, and had a heart of lead, and who had neither justice nor prudence in him. The miracles that we read there, are rather monsters of miracles than true ones."* Yet this is the narrative which Cardinal Baronius and other Roman Catholic writers consider to be a true record, which Father M'Corry asserts that a great many Roman Catholics, in England and Scotland, as well as Ireland, believe to be a real history, and, on the authority of which, he would seek to persuade us, that St. Peter lived and died at Rome! There can be but little doubt, that in the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries, when almost every lie could be propagated with success, the "Golden Legend" did contribute to spread very widely among all classes a firm conviction, that St. Peter really died at Rome; but Father M'Corry and his supporters are greatly mistaken, when they suppose that any class in the community, Protestant or anti-Protestant, in these islands, will, in the nineteenth century, accept such a frivolous guarantee as the story of the dogs and the fiery chariot, for the Apostolic authenticity of their claim of Papal supremacy; or that they will consent to rest any part of their belief, for time or for eternity, upon such a barefaced imposture.

* Vide Dupin. Hist., Eccl. vol. ii., p. 439. Dublin, 1721.

IS THE CHURCH OF ROME IMMUTABLE?

It is well known that persons who constantly make untrue or doubtful statements, end frequently by believing them, and often impose upon others as well as on themselves.

Love of truth is the best security against these evils, since it will always dispose us not to speak without consideration, and not to believe without reason. Where it is wanting, mere assertion will most commonly be accepted instead of proof, and credulity substituted for well-founded assent.

A continual boast of Roman Catholics is "the unchangeable character of their Church." We hear incessantly that "Rome is always one and immutable." Some Protestants are to be found so foolish as to believe this, and more foolish still in bearing witness to their own ignorance of very plain facts, by repeating it.

However, if questioned, they would probably answer thus:—

We mean only to express our conviction, that the Church of Rome is immutable in her persevering aggression upon the rightful liberty of mind; and consistent only in her unceasing efforts to discountenance or suppress exercise of judgment, and deference to conscience, in order to establish upon their extinction her peculiar doctrines which are inconsistent with them.

This may, indeed, be the case. But it is more candid, and less dangerous to avoid statements which require explanations.

If, by "immutability," people would have us to believe, that the Church of Rome has neither altered her practice nor her principles, it is easy to show that she has already done, and may yet do, both.

Take, as an instance, her public service. It is now conducted in an unknown tongue; formerly it was not so. Here, at all events, is a change in practice, and a most important one likewise. Now, by this change in practice, she has violated her principles. For when we ask why has she translated the Bible into Latin from the Hebrew and Greek originals, the only answer which can be given is, because the former language, and not the latter, was that commonly spoken and best understood by the people. For this same reason, her public offices were drawn up in Latin.

But, if the principle on which she formerly acted, when translating the Bible, and constructing her public services, was, that the members of her communion might thereby be enabled to understand and profit by what they read or heard, has she not, when her last Council fiated, as the only authentic version, a Latin translation of the Bible, and in continuing to conduct those services in a language utterly unintelligible to the vast majority of her members, departed from the principle which once guided her decisions?

Here, then, is an instance where practice has been altered and principle violated. The Church of Rome cannot, therefore, be "immutable."

Let us now see whether it be not possible that she may yet change still more.

The doctrine of the immaculate conception of the Virgin Mary is at present believed by most Roman Catholics as religiously as any doctrine of the Bible, and by many, it is to be feared, regarded as equally important.

It is, however, undeniably certain, that this same doctrine was not only not believed formerly by some of her most eminent writers, but that it was one of the subjects (for there were others) which occasioned long and bitter disputes between her two great orders of Dominicans and Franciscans.

This doctrine has not yet been pronounced an article of faith by the authority commonly considered (for even on this most vital matter there is neither unity of mind, nor likelihood, nor materials for it) as empowered to make, or, as it is sometimes said, declare, articles of faith.

So that, as the matter stands at present, we have in the statistics of a Church asserting its infallibility as the ground of its belief, this destructive fact—a doctrine universally believed, though unsanctioned, both for its truth and importance, by the only tribunal which can establish either. We can, indeed, safely ask our Roman Catholic countrymen, if they really do believe that any declaration of Pontiff or Council can add a single particle to their belief, either in the truth or importance of this doctrine?

If they do not, we must then ask them to consider how inconsistent it is on their part to quarrel with Protestants for doing as they themselves now do, and that is—believe without human infallibility; which is, by this instance, shown to be useless for establishing a truth, explaining its meaning, or adding to its importance.

Let us now suppose that, at some future time, the doctrine of the Immaculate Conception shall be made, or declared an article of faith.

Whether this may occur soon, as multitudes expect, or be deferred to a more convenient season, as wise folk shrewdly conjecture, we can confidently ask—where is now the boasted immutability of your Church?

The faith of a Church means the aggregate of the separate articles of belief. Increase the items and you alter the amount. We should not consider as very sane, though perhaps as very harmless, the man who, when he had added two or three stories to his cottage, should amuse himself by persisting in saying that the large house was still the little cottage. But what would we think if this same man, though warned that the former foundation was incapable of bearing the additional weight, and that, in consequence thereof, the walls were actually giving way, should peril his own and his family's life by a residence in this dangerous building, and endeavour to disprove a fact plain to all eyesight, by continuing to assert that the heavy house was but the cottage after all?

The Church of Rome has added, and may yet add many stories to the little cottage. She has altered, and may alter still farther the simplicity of "the faith which was once delivered to the saints." In doing so she has changed, and will change to the extent of these additions. But, in still claiming immutability, she confounds the house with the cottage, and when attempting to act on it, brings death to her consistency for the sake of a delusion.

When persons have been for some time working in certain mines, their constitutions are said to become so impregnated with mercury, that if a copper coin be placed in their mouths for a short time, it may be taken out apparently coated with silver.

The mercury, which gives this fine appearance to the coin is, however, killing the workman.

The Church of Rome has thus coated her coins. They come from her mouth, silvered over with the gloss of immutability. But this claim is to her, as the mercury to the miner, the cause of death. She has changed. This fact destroys the claim.

We are, indeed, sometimes asked—"Point out if you can, when any change has taken place." It would be easy to do so, but we may try the value of the argument by a retort. Will you deny that there are any old people in the world, because no one can tell you when a man ceases to be young and becomes old?

After all, what can thousands of poor and uneducated Roman Catholics know about councils and their decrees? Their criterion of knowledge is their reliance upon the nearest bishop or parish priest. Infallibility is for them just their testimony, and nothing more.

But these poor people think a great deal more highly of their Popes and bishops than these last do for each other's most deliberate judgments. Councils cared as little for Popes as Popes cared for Councils. For instance—The Council of Constance passed the famous decree, that the laity should be deprived of the cup, or chalice, in the sacrament of the Lord's Supper. Its members seemed to have cared but little that one of their Pontiffs had written long before in terms of the deepest indignation against the idea of such a thing, and said it was sacrilege.

Cardinal Wiseman seems not to consider as of any authority either the notes of the Douay Bible, or the judgment of the late Archbishop Murray, who, in common with most Roman Catholic bishops of these countries, sanctioned them.

The note to which we allude is that which relates to the words of the Lord—"The flesh profiteth nothing." (St. John vi. 64), and is as follows:—

"Dead flesh separated from the spirit, in the gross manner they supposed they were to eat his flesh, would profit nothing."

Here it stated that the Jews understood Christ in a gross manner, and, of course, in doing so, put a wrong sensoon his words. Now, Cardinal Wiseman asserts that they took the right meaning, and thereon builds an argument for what he chooses (with most Roman Catholic writers) to call a real presence, which is, however, quite a distinct thing from his own doctrine of a corporal one.

"While the Jews understood our Saviour to speak of really intending to give them his flesh to eat, if they were wrong, can we suppose him to answer them by saying, that his flesh was really meant? Or can we, under these circumstances, imagine him to use the word at all, and that twice and emphatically? for the repetition of it in the two members of the sentence forms a true emphasis, unless he wished to be taken literally. If so, there is no other conclusion to be drawn from the sentence, than that he was speaking of a real eating of his flesh and drinking his blood."—Lectures on the Real Presence, p. 121.

It is clear now, that if the note of the Douay Bible be right, Cardinal Wiseman is wrong, both in his argument and in the fact on which it rests. This note, and the Roman Catholic bishops who sanctioned it, are at direct issue with him on the fact of the interpretation put, and intended by our Lord (according to the Cardinal) to be put upon His words.

It seems barely possible that Dr. Wiseman has never read this note, or, having read, forgot its existence. Otherwise the inference must be, that in this estimate of the superior value of his own judgment, he overlooked the evidence which this contradiction would furnish, of the slight respect which he attached to the judgment of his brother prelates, or the notes of a Bible used by the members of his communion, when they stood in the way of his arguments.

We can furnish our Roman Catholic brethren with another, and a very recent instance of disagreement among their prelates.

By a minute of the proceedings of the Board of National Education, held 8th July, 1853, "it is ordered that—The lessons on the truth of Christianity be withdrawn from the list of books published by direction of the Commissioners."

His Grace the Archbishop of Dublin, in a pamphlet just published upon the occasion of this present breach of faith with the public, makes the following statement with respect to this work, excluded by the votes (among others) of Roman Catholic bishops:—It was "not at all less the work of Archbishop Murray than ours; for he, as well as the rest of the Commissioners, deliberately recommended it. He perused it with scrupulous care, and he sent over a copy to the late Pope, who had it read to him in Italian, and found it unexceptionable." Again, with respect to "the Scripture Lessons," Mr. Carlile, in a letter recently addressed to the editor of the Times, thus speaks—"With regard to the two Archbishops, no half sheet was ever sent to press without their express authority."

"These Scripture Lessons were prepared, not only with the assent, but at the express wish of Dr. Murray and the other Roman Catholic members of the board, for the very purpose of being used in the common instruction, and every half sheet was signed by Dr. Murray with that view, except a few when he was from home, which were signed by a clergyman authorized by him to do so."

This book, thus deliberately sanctioned by the Roman Catholic Archbishop, met (as well as Dr. Murray himself) "with violent attacks," to use Mr. Carlile's words, from Dr. M'Hale, and was at last placed in the Index Expurgatorius.

We do earnestly press upon our Roman Catholic countrymen to consider these evidences of the respect which the prelates of their church pay to the deliberate judgments of their episcopal brethren. We put the matter in this way, because it is certain that infallibility is, and cannot, for uneducated people, be anything else ultimately, than the judgments of their bishop or priest. The decrees of councils, &c., are to them just what they are told of them. Upon the personal judgments of their own bishop or priest, they must ultimately rest. But if they do so, in defiance of the evidences which these same persons (and not Protestants) give of the slight respect which they pay to each other, we must ask them to consider whether they are acting more wisely than the poor Irishman, who, having been told something about a sun-dial, went out at night with a candle to see the hour, and came back complaining that he could make nothing at all out of it, for the shadow moved whatever way he looked at it.

Now, the infallibility of the Church is to our thousands of uneducated Roman Catholic countrymen, just what the shadow of the sun-dial was to the poor Irishman, with the priest or bishop for the candle, as fluctuating as the time shown by the perpetually shifting shadow.

IS THE PROTESTANT BIBLE A CORRUPT AND MUTILATED TRANSLATION OF THE HOLY SCRIPTURES?

We have to consider now the other chief difference between the Douay and Protestant Bible—viz., the use of the word "priest."

Dr. Ward, in his "Errata," pages 46 and 46, brings forward six passages,* all relating to the Christian ministry, in all which places, in the Douay Bible, they are called priests, whereas in the Protestant Bible they are called elders. Of course Dr. Ward counts this a wilful corruption in the Protestant Bible. We give Dr. Ward's objection in his own words (p. 45):—"The English Protestants, on purpose to abolish the holy Sacrifice of the Mass, did not only take away the word altar out of the Scripture, but they also suppressed the name priest in all their translations, turning it into elder; well knowing that these three—priest, sacrifice, and altar—are dependents and consequents one of another, so that they cannot be separated. If there be an external sacrifice, there must be an external priesthood to offer it, and an altar to offer the same upon." And, again—"But our new pretended reformers have made the Scriptures quite dumb as to the name of any such priest or priesthood as we now speak of; never so much as once naming priest, unless where mention is made either of the priests of the Jews or the priests of the Gentiles."

Dr. Ward has here very accurately stated the importance of this difference. There cannot be a sacrifice without a priest. If the ministers of the Gospel are not priests, they cannot offer any sacrifice, and, therefore, there can be no Sacrifice in the Mass; but if they be priests, then they must offer sacrifice, which, of course, is to be looked for in the Mass. We think Dr. Ward quite right in this view of the importance of the difference in question between the two Bibles. The thing we have to consider is simply, whether it be a true or a false translation to put in priests in the passages in question. We ask our readers to consider the evidence, and to remember how much depends on it.

The Jewish religion, that which Moses gave to the people of Israel, consisted chiefly in offering animals in sacrifice to God. By God's direction, Moses set apart a class of men to offer these sacrifices. The name given to this class of men in the Greek Old Testament is ἱερεὺς (hiereus). By this name they are invariably called. There was also another class of men among the Jews, to whom the name of πρεσβύτερος (presbyteros) was given: these were they who had any office or authority among them, but who had not power to offer sacrifice. These men were never called hiereus—that name was confined to those who offered sacrifice, and the name presbyteros was never applied to those who offered sacrifice.

In the Greek New Testament those who offered sacrifice among the Jews are ALWAYS called hiereus, NEVER presbyteros; and the ministers of the Christian religion are ALWAYS called presbyteros, NEVER hiereus. This is the fact. The Apostles and Evangelists who were inspired by God to write the New Testament, NEVER called the ministers of the Gospel hiereus, which meant one who offered sacrifice; but ALWAYS called them presbyteros, which meant one who did NOT offer sacrifice. They had their choice of the two names; both names were in common use among the Jews—one meaning a person who offered sacrifice, the other meaning a public officer who did NOT offer sacrifice; and they ALWAYS called the ministers of the Gospel by that name which did not mean sacrificers. Wherever the writers of the New Testament speak of the Jewish priests, they always used the word hiereus; wherever they spoke of the ministers of Christ, they always used the word presbyteros. And they did this by direction of the Holy Ghost, the spirit by which they wrote. That Holy Spirit taught them always carefully to distinguish those two orders of men by two different names, having quite different meanings.

Now, what is the difference between the two Bibles, the Douay and the Protestant?

The Douay Bible insists that the two different classes which the Holy Ghost directed the Apostles to distinguish so carefully, by two different names, shall always be called by the same name, in the same meaning. The Protestant Bible is careful to distinguish them by words of different meaning. Which is right? We think this a question which any plain man may answer.

The Douay Bible is the more inexcusable in this, because the Latin translation of the New Testament, which the Douay translators professed to follow, set them the example of carefully following the distinction made in the Greek. Wherever the Greek has hiereus, the Latin always puts sacerdos; and wherever the Greek has presbyteros, the Latin has presbyterus. So here is the marked distinction kept up in the Latin as well as in the Greek; and yet, the Douay Bible insists, that no distinction at all shall be observed in the English; while the Protestant Bible preserves the distinction exactly. And it is simply for following the Greek, and the Latin too, that Dr. Ward attacks it, and calls it corrupt! In all the six passages which Dr. Ward has produced, the Greek has presbyteros, and the Latin, presbyterus; and yet, the Douay Bible translates it as if the Greek had hiereus, and the Latin, sacerdos.

It is wholly false to speak of the Protestant Bible (as Dr. Ward does in the passage above quoted) as "never so much as once naming priest, unless when mention is made either of the priests of the Jews, or the priests of the Gentiles." In eight different places of the 5th, 7th, 8th, and 10th chapters of Hebrews, the word "priest" is applied in the Protestant Bible to Christ Himself.

This leads us to observe another marked distinction in the Greek and Latin Bibles, which the Douay Bible wilfully abolishes. Christ himself is called hiereus in the Greek, and sacerdos in the Latin, and never presbyteros. His ministers are called presbyteros, and never sacerdos, or hiereus.

Thus both the Greek and the Latin Bibles carefully distinguish the office of Christ and the office of his ministers by different names, having quite different meanings; and yet the Douay Bible insists on confounding those separate offices, under the same name, in the same meaning! and because the Protestant Bible does not follow their example, in opposition both to the Greek, and to that Latin Bible which the Council of Trent pronounces "authentic," they accuse it of corrupting the Word of God!

The Protestant Bible has also the word "priest" or "priesthood" in five places, where it is evidently applied to all Christ's people—viz., 1 Peter ii. 5 and 9; Revelation, or Apocalypse, i. 6; v. 10; xx. 6. In all instances, following the same rule, translating hiereus by priest, wherever they meet with it, and presbyteros by elder; so as always to make the same distinction between the offices, which they find marked so strongly in the Greek and Latin Bibles: whereas, the Douay Bible confounds and abolishes that distinction altogether.

We wish to point out carefully that it is not about the sound of words that we would contend, but about the distinction of offices. If it were kept in view in a translation of the Bible, that the Jewish ministers and Christian ministers are distinguished in the Greek Scriptures by different names, which have different meanings, one expressing the offering of sacrifices, and the other excluding that notion—if this were marked in the translation, as it is in the original—then we would not object to the word "priest" being put as the translation of presbyteros, provided it were understood that it was used as the translation of a Greek word that does not mean one who offers sacrifice, and provided some other word were used for the Jewish priests, who did offer sacrifice. What we maintain is this, that where the two offices are clearly distinguished in the original by two names, having clearly different meanings, that distinction should be made plain in the translation too. To put that distinction altogether out of the translation, as the Douay Bible does, by always giving the same name, in the same meaning, to the two different offices, is a wilful corrupting and confounding of the Word of God.

And why does the Douay Bible thus wilfully confound what God's Word has distinguished?

Dr. Ward has told us, in the passage above quoted, without a priest there can be no Sacrifice of the Mass. Let it once be known among Christians now, (as it was clearly known in the Apostles' days) that the Apostles were careful always to call Christ's ministers by a title which meant one who did not offer sacrifice, and that they never called them by the title of the Jewish priests who did offer sacrifice; let this striking distinction made by the Apostles once be known, and then the Sacrifice of the Mass falls of itself. And therefore to establish her own sacrifice, the Church of Rome has no resource but to abolish and hide that distinction which the Apostles made between the Jewish and Christian ministers. Is not this enough in itself to disprove their sacrifice?

We do not deny that the Eucharist is a sacrifice in any sense at all. There are sacrifices of praise and thanksgiving (Hebrews, xiii. 15); and all Christians are priests to offer such sacrifices as these—(1 Pet. ii. 5, 9).* In this sense the Holy Eucharist is a sacrifice, and the highest sacrifice that Christians can offer. But this is not the Sacrifice of the Mass, for it is not a sacrifice of propitiation for sin. It is not the same kind of sacrifice as the Jewish sacrifices for sin, or the sacrifice of Christ upon the cross. Neither does it require any other kind of sacrificing power in the priest, than what all Christ's people possess.

We trust we have shown that the Protestant Bible does right in distinguishing between hiereus and presbyteros; and that the Douay Bible does wrong in confounding them. We trust the time may come when the Douay Bible will be corrected in this matter too by the Protestant Bible.

In our next number we will conclude this subject, by considering whether the books called Apocrypha are really part of the Bible given by inspiration of God.

CAN THE INFALLIBILITY OF THE CHURCH OF ROME BE PROVED FROM ECCLESIASTICAL HISTORY AND THE WRITINGS OF THE EARLIER FATHERS?

NO. II.

In our last number we made some general observations on the uncertainty which attaches to the dogma of infallibility, and the novelty of the modern Roman Catholic doctrine of the infallibility of the Church of Rome. We proceed now to establish the latter position more in detail, and our proofs shall be derived, as we proposed, from the history of the Church and the writings of the Fathers.

Now, in order to avoid confounding things which are in themselves distinct, it must be carefully borne in mind that the infallibility of the Church of Rome does not necessarily follow from its supremacy, supposing the latter to be admitted. A spiritual supremacy over all other Churches may have been accorded to one Church, without, in the remotest degree, inferring as a consequence the attribute of infallibility. Romish theologians, however, often seem to think that they have only to establish the former prerogative in favour of their Church, and that the latter must follow as a necessary result.

* Acts xv. 2. Titus i. 5. 1 Tim. v. 17. 1 Tim. v. 19. James v. 14; and Acts xiv. 22.

* The literal meaning of the word πρεσβύτερος is "one advanced in years." It came to be applied to persons in any public office, because men of years and experience were generally chosen for such situations. Hence it appears how correct and appropriate is the English translation, "elder."

* Of course we do not mean that laymen can celebrate the Eucharist. Consecration is confined to Presbyters.

But whilst it is true that the concession of supremacy does not necessarily imply the recognition of infallibility, it is equally true that the recognition of the latter must necessarily lead to the concession of the former. Had the Church of Rome, or any other Church, been supposed to be endowed with the Divine attribute of infallibility, it must necessarily follow that every other Church would acknowledge the spiritual supremacy of that one in which so pre-eminent a gift was lodged. It becomes, therefore, a matter of importance for us to show that the spiritual supremacy of the Church of Rome was not generally acknowledged in any such sense as the admitted claim to infallibility would imply. Now, this has been unanswerably shown by many Protestant writers, especially by Barrow, in his "Treatise of the Pope's Supremacy." Whence we conclude that the claim to infallibility was either not made or not allowed, so long, at least, as the claim to supremacy was disputed. Our argument, in short, is the following—If infallibility were supposed to reside in the Church of Rome in ancient times, the supremacy of that Church would also have been recognised. But its supremacy was not recognised. Therefore, infallibility was not supposed to reside in it.

We have said that the fact of the non-recognition of the spiritual supremacy of Rome for many ages has been amply proved by Barrow and other writers. To their works, therefore, we, for the present, refer those who wish for a full discussion of the whole subject. We shall content ourselves with noticing a few of the more prominent points connected with it.

Among the arguments adduced by Roman Catholic writers in proof of the acknowledged supremacy of the Church of Rome in early times, none is urged with greater frequency or more confidence than that which they derive from a well-known passage of Irenæus, the famous Bishop of Lyons at the close of the second century. We shall show that this passage of Irenæus, when properly understood, lends no countenance to the conclusion which is so confidently drawn from it.

In his work on Heresy (Book iii., ch. 3), Irenæus, after describing the Church of Rome as "founded by the two most glorious apostles, St. Peter and St. Paul," then adds —"Ad hanc Ecclesiam, propter potentiorem principalitatem, necesse est omnem convenire Ecclesiam—hoc est eos qui sunt undique fideles—in qua semper ab his qui sunt undique conservata est ea quæ est ab Apostolis traditio." Here, it is insisted by Roman Catholic divines, is a plain acknowledgment, on the part of one of the most eminent bishops of the primitive Church, of the supremacy of the Church of Rome—an unequivocal declaration that every Church "must conform to the Church of Rome, on account of its more powerful principality."* To see whether this inference be sustainable, let us examine for a moment the scope and context of Irenæus' words. He is disputing against heretics. Having first refuted them by reference to Scripture, he then proceeds to the testimony against them furnished by the Catholic Church. But how was this testimony to be procured? "It would," as he says himself, "be very tedious to enumerate the episcopal successions of all the Churches of Christendom." He prefers to select some one Church as a specimen and type of all the rest. As he was writing in the West, it was most natural that he should select a western Church; a Church generally acknowledged to have been founded by Apostles; a Church founded by the two most illustrious of the Apostles, Peter and Paul; a Church the succession of whose bishops was well authenticated and generally known; in short, the Church of Rome. He then introduces the passage which we have quoted above—"Ad hanc Ecclesiam, &c." Unfortunately, this passage is preserved to us only through the medium of an old Latin version of Irenæus' work. The original Greek words are not extant.

The divines of the Church of Rome, as we have already said, interpret these words to signify that "it is necessary for every Church to conform to this Church"—i.e., to the Church of Rome; and they accordingly insist that a moral obligation rests upon all men to submit to her authority.

That this interpretation is not correct appears from the following considerations:—First, it is at variance with the drift of Irenæus' argument. His object is to refute heresies by appealing to the testimony of the universal Church. As an exponent of that testimony he selects one Church—the Church of Rome. That this selection was a fair one, and might be regarded as virtually collecting the evidence of all the Churches, he shows by reminding his readers that the Church of Rome had been founded by the two most glorious Apostles, St. Peter and St. Paul, from whom the succession of bishops might be certainly traced, and whose names he himself enumerates.

This being so, the words, "ad hanc Ecclesiam necesse est omnem convenire Ecclesiam," cannot mean that every Church, then and for ever after, must submit to the Church of Rome. Were that so, Irenæus would never have said that, "because it would be tedious to appeal to all churches," he would, therefore, appeal to one Church—the Church of Rome. Such a statement would have had no meaning, if Rome had been admittedly supreme over all churches, so that all churches were bound to agree with her. It would be manifestly absurd of anybody to say—It would be a tedious process to ascertain the opinions of all the peers of the realm: we will, therefore, appeal to the crown.

This sense of the original words of Irenæus being, therefore, excluded, we have next to inquire what they did mean. Most clearly this:—That on account of the more august antiquity of Rome—for such is the signification of the words "potentior principalitas"*—it must follow of course (necesse est) that every Church—that is, all believers who exist in all places (undique)—will agree with her, and be represented by her; or, in other words, every Church (Irenæus says) in which (in quâ) the tradition from the Apostles has been preserved by those who exist everywhere (i.e., by Catholics, as opposed to heretics, who existed only in particular places), must naturally agree with the apostolic Church of Rome. Thus he shows that his reference to Rome is justifiable; and that by appealing to that Church he has virtually appealed to all orthodox churches, whose testimony may be supposed to be embodied and involved in hers.

But not only does Irenæus in this passage not countenance the doctrine of Papal supremacy, as taught by the Romish divines, but he, in fact, by implication, overthrows the foundation on which they make it and the kindred doctrine of infallibility to rest.

These doctrines they base on the words of our Lord to St. Peter (Matt. xvi. 18) "On this rock I will build my Church," maintaining that the Bishop of Rome is the successor of St. Peter as the rock of the church; but Irenæus refers to the Church of Rome, as founded by the two most glorious apostles, St. Peter and St. Paul; and he, moreover, enumerates the Bishops of Rome who succeeded Linus, who, he says, was first placed in that See by the same two apostles. This is a striking and most convincing proof that he knew nothing of the Romish theory which claims infallibility and supremacy for St. Peter alone, as head of the Church, and also claims the same prerogatives for the Bishops of Rome, as successors of St. Peter.

We do not (as we before observed) possess the original Greek of Irenæus in the passage first considered. We have only an old, and evidently a very literal, Latin version of it. From this version we have endeavoured, faithfully and honestly, to elicit the true meaning of the original; and we have concluded that Irenæus was totally ignorant of the lofty claims now set up for the Church of Rome. A recently discovered work of Hippolytus, a scholar of Irenæus, who had the original Greek before him, and had the advantage of personal intercourse with the writer, enables us to ascertain how he understood the passage. To this very remarkable work of Hippolytus we accordingly propose to direct attention in our next number. Meanwhile, we will conclude the present article with a notice of a passage of Tertullian, who flourished in the early part of the third century—a passage which, although cited by Roman Catholic writers in support of the claims of their Church to supremacy and infallibility, directly militates against such claims.

In his work De Præscriptione Hæreticorum, Tertullian refutes heretics by a line of argument similar to that of Irenæus, above described—namely, appealing to the doctrine preserved in the apostolic churches of highest character and most unquestioned succession of bishops. "Run over" (he says, ch. 36) "the Apostolic Churches in which the very chairs of the apostles still preside in their own places, in which their (i.e., the apostles') authentic letters are still read, uttering the words and representing the face of each. Is Achaia," he adds, "next to thee? Thou hast Corinth. If thou canst go into Asia, thou hast Ephesus. But if thou art adjacent to Rome, thou hast Rome, where authority is at hand to us (i.e., the African Church) also."†

Now, it is very remarkable that, in quoting this passage, Roman Catholic writers (e.g., Messrs. Berington and Kirk) take care to omit altogether the words relating to Corinth and Ephesus, retaining only those which refer to Rome. The reason is obvious. The unmutilated words of Tertullian not only prove nothing in support of the supremacy and infallibility of Rome, but are actually inconsistent with such claims, as they speak of Ephesus and Corinth in exactly the same way as they do of Rome itself. The Church of Corinth, which enjoyed the teaching of the Apostle Paul, was to be appealed to by those who happened to be near Achaia. The Church of Ephesus, over which the Apostle John had presided, was to be appealed to by those who could visit Asia Minor. And by those who were adjacent to Italy—as were, for example, the African Christians, to whom Tertullian himself belonged—Rome was to be appealed to, as having been founded by at least one Apostle, and, perhaps, by two, and, moreover, being the only apostolical Church in Western Christendom.

It will be observed further that one of the grounds, on which Tertullian rests this appeal to the Apostolic Churches, is nearness of time to the apostolic age (apud quos ipsæ adhuc cathedræ Apostolorum suis locis præsident.) So that the force of this appeal would be gradually diminished in the course of time, and would ultimately be altogether lost.

THE MARLEYS.

CHAPTER III.

AFTER the scene which we detailed in our last, and the promise of Edith and Adeline to attend before the bishop, they awaited with fear and trembling the approach of the following Saturday, which was fixed for the interview. It was an encounter from which they would have shrunk in circumstances less cogent than those under which their consent had been extorted. The interval they spent between prayer and preparation—prayer for wisdom and strength, and preparation to answer a wise and learned bishop of the Church of Rome—to answer him concerning the faith which they held dearer than life itself. While conning over the plain simple texts of Scripture, which were the only weapons of their warfare, and treasuring them up in their memories, they felt like David with his pebbles and his sling going forth to meet the giant of the Philistines. They knew their own feebleness and puny strength, but their comfort was that the Angel of the Lord (Jesus Christ himself) encampeth round about those that fear him.

Early on Saturday morning, Edith and Adeline drove in, in company with their sister Marcella, to the bishop's house. They were shown in directly to his study, and a venerable, mild, and kindly old man came forward and greeted them in an affectionate and cordial manner. The bishop opened the conversation about some indifferent matters, which he discussed with a good-natured playfulness, so graceful and condescending in advanced age, when addressing itself to early youth. From these subjects he gradually approached that of some church commemoration for the following day, and then said—

"My dear children, I believe you wished to consult me about some matters which you find difficult to understand, and desired to have an explanation of, and nothing can give me greater pleasure than to remove any doubts from your minds, and enable you to enjoy the blessedness of a full and free communion with the Holy Catholic Church."

To this Edith and Adeline scarcely knew what answer to give, they were reluctant to open an attack, and to commence hostilities, and were rather waiting to act on the defensive when assailed, and they remained silent. The bishop again asked them—

"What matter was it that occasioned their difficulty in the Catholic Faith."

Edith felt she could no longer remain silent, and said—"Indeed, my lord, there are a great many subjects which have caused us both uneasiness, and have compelled us to take a part we were most reluctant to take, and which, I fear, is likely to bring us into great trouble; but, if it be the Lord's will, we cannot help or avoid it."

"My dear," said the bishop, "there is no reason why you should fall into trouble if you will only listen to instruction and advice in a teachable spirit, and not set up your own private fallible judgment against the voice of the Church."

"But, how," my lord, "can I abjure my reason, and the common sense which God has given me to be my guide to regulate my path in life, and yet believe what I know to be an impossibility, and a contradiction to plain language and to common sense, and the direct testimony of Scripture, because the Church says it is so?"

"Miss Marley, you forget that the last words of our departing Saviour's commission to his apostles were, that they should go forth teaching all things, whatsoever he had commanded them; 'and, behold,' he says, 'I am with you all days, even to the consummation of the world.' This is the warrant under which the bishops and pastors of Christ's Church, as the successors of the Apostles, now act. How, then, can the Catholic Church go astray?"

"No, my lord, certainly not so long as they teach those things which Christ commanded; but, if any particular body of Christian teachers have departed from the things commanded by Christ, and teach other things, it is plain we must look for the Church of which Christ speaks elsewhere, and that they are not the successors of the apostles on whom the commission has devolved."

"My dear, you seem to assume that the Holy Catholic

* The word "convenire" is now, by most Romish theologians, taken in the sense of "to agree," or "conform." The meaning "to resort," which some contend for, seems hardly reconcileable with fact or probability.

* Principalitas, in the old Latin translation of Irenæus, is used for priority of time, and is opposed to posterioritas. The words used by Irenæus were probably ἱκανωτέραν ἀρχαιότητα. In this same chapter the translator has rendered ἱκανωτάτη by potentissima. The Church of Rome was the only Western Church that was known to have been founded by Apostles. It had, accordingly, a "potentior principalitas," a mere "powerful or august primitiveness."

Again, as the old Latin version is a literal one (as appears from the comparison of it with the Greek in those passages in which the Greek has been preserved), it is almost certain that when the translator uses "necesse est," Irenæus wrote ἀνάγκη. Now, this word ἀνάγκη, as is well known, frequently implies a reasonable or necessary inference, and not a moral obligation. Thus, for instance, when the ecclesiastical historian Theodoret says (iv. 5) ἀνθρώπους ἀνάγκη προσπταίειν ὕντας, he certainly does not intend to assert that it is a moral duty for a man to transgress; but his meaning is that it is a natural consequence of his fallen condition—"humanum est errare."

† Percurre Ecclesias Apostolicas apud quas ipsæ adhuc cathedræ Apostolorum suis locis præsident, apud quas authenticæ literæ eorum recitantur, sonantes vocem et repræsentes faciem uniuscujusque. Proxima est tibi Achaia? Habes Corinthum. Si potes in Asiam tendere, habes Ephesum. Si autem Italiæ, adjaces Romam, unde nobis quoque auctoritas præsto est.

Church has fallen into error, and I speak now, supposing for a moment that it were possible (which God forbid) for the Church ever to err. But pray, in what particular do you conceive, if it has erred, its error consists?"

"Then, my lord, as you ask me to state my difficulties, the chief in my mind is, in respect to the Sacrifice of the Mass. Both St. Peter and St. Paul tell us that Christ died once for our sins," and St. Paul in the Hebrews,† tells us, 'that Christ should not offer himself often as the High Priest entereth into the Holy of Holies every year;' whereas, on the contrary, Christ was offered once to exhaust the sins of the whole world; therefore we find it impossible to believe that what is called the Sacrifice of the Mass, is a real and proper sacrifice or propitiation for the sins of the living or the dead."

"But, Miss Marley, St. Paul also tells us, that we have an altar still, and if there be an altar, there must be a sacrifice and an offering. The continuance of the daily sacrifice to the end of the world is prophesied in the prophet Malachias, and after some search through a Douay Bible, the bishop had recourse to a text book, and cited the passage—"For from the rising of the sun even to the going down, my name is great among the Gentiles, and in every place there is Sacrifice."—Malach. i., 11.

To this Adeline interposed and said, "that it appeared very far from plain that this can mean any other sacrifice than that so continually spoken of in the Book of Psalms," "The sacrifice of praise, an afflicted spirit and contrite heart,"‡ and that it certainly was not so plain as to contradict the express declaration that Christ "by one oblation, hath perfected for ever them that are sanctified,"§ and again, "where there is remission of sins, there is no more an oblation for sin."‖

The bishop then took up the History of Melchisedech, who brought bread and wine, and was priest of the most High God.¶

"Yes," said Adeline smartly, "but it was to Abraham he brought it forth, and not to God, and surely he made no oblation or sacrifice for sins to Abraham."

The bishop finding he was making no impression on his young pupils, and that they were better prepared at argument than he expected, nevertheless betrayed no evidence of displeasure or disappointment, on the contrary, he said, "Well, my dears, as I find your minds are not yet prepared for the due consideration of such holy things as these, I will not press them on you now, but must ask you to be more careful in reading proper books on the subject, and especially a little book which I will lend you, (so saying, he handed them Milner's End of Controversy) and I have no doubt all will be plain to your mind. Go now, and like good children, read this diligently, and all will be well. It is only some foolish notion which sometimes young people will take into their heads, that is disturbing you, and I expect to see you both settled in the faith and happy." After some more conversation like this the venerable old man gave them his blessing, and took leave of them as affectionately as he had at first received them.

Edith and Adeline rose and left the room, slowly followed by Marcella, who, when half way down the stairs, returned suddenly to the bishop and said, "Well, my lord, what do you really think of them?"

"Well, my dear, I tell you plainly, I think nothing can be worse, and that there is scarcely a hope of them for the present, as they have their minds made up, and have been furnished with arguments and books which I fear have misled them. But go home and do not break with them. Take them gently, lest you drive them to extremes, and so make bad worse. I will write to your father and counsel him to act so."

Edith and Adeline then parted from Marcella, and returned homewards. As they walked along they discussed their interview with the bishop, thus happily over, and were congratulating themselves on having passed through the ordeal without an open breach of the peace, or compromise of principle. As they went along they met the Rev. M——, who said—"So girls you have been before the bishop." "Who toldyou that?" "Oh," said he, "I know it quite well; it was discussed at our meeting on yesterday. I suppose you had an angry discussion." "No, indeed," said Edith, "on the contrary, everything went on as smooth and amicable as if we were discussing the weather."

"Miss Marley, I tell you, never you mind the outward appearances. Depend upon it, it is not all over yet; but I give you one piece of advice, and that is, be firm, and you will have it all your own way. This I tell you in confidence as a friend; but again, I say, be firm and calm, and they will never drive you to extremities."

"Indeed," said Adeline, "I think from the way the bishop treated us, that he intends to advise Papa not to interfere with us."

The girls returned home, and the Major never made the slightest inquiry as to the result of their interview with the bishop—in fact, he most scrupulously abstained from all allusion to the subject of religion. The following day, however, brought a letter from the bishop, in which he apprised the Major of some of the results of his conference with his daughters, and that he regretted to find they had been deeply, if not irrecoverably infected with the poison of heresy, which he could only attribute to unsuitable companions, or defective education in religious matters. He implored of him to lose no opportunity of keeping them out of the society of Protestants, and throwing them into the way of devout and well-informed Catholics, and providing them with certain religious books on controversy, which he recommended to him. He concluded, by strongly recommending him to be careful how he appeared to act with severity or coercion towards them, and rather to adopt gentle and unseen agencies, than direct and forcible means for their restoration to the faith.

This intelligence had a stunning effect upon the Major notwithstanding all his former misgivings. He tenderly loved his two youngest daughters, who were the children of his old age, and yet the thought of their apostasy was absolutely worse than their death to his mind. Every feeling of his mind revolted from the idea, and he could not let it near him. At first he regarded it as some erratic fancy, a conceit which young girls sometimes take into their heads, just to show their independence of mind; but he never doubted they would have yielded at once to the persuasion and authority of the bishop. To think that his daughters should not merely resist his own parental authority, but should absolutely confront his bishop, and set themselves up against him upon doctrines of religion, appeared the acme of superlative audacity and rebellion. His first impulse was to order them to depart from his house for ever, and go seek their fortunes elsewhere; but, he had no sooner resolved on this course, than he saw insuperable difficulties in its execution, and the yearning of natural affection, and the circumstance of their extreme youth made him pause in respect of such a step. But, as his passion cooled down, a settled, steady resolve took possession of his mind, to which every hour's reflection added strength, and to which a sense of duty to himself, and to his religion, and to the other members of his family, gave a stability, which mere passion and anger would have failed to do.

His family could not but remark that some intelligence of an unpleasant nature had reached him; all had their misgivings as to its probable cause, but nobody ventured to make an inquiry, and the Major himself was, contrary to all precedent, reserved and silent, with a solemn, settled demeanour, of melancholy and resolve.

This mood had continued for two or three days, during which the Major was confined to the house by the gout, but on the fourth day, finding himself somewhat better, he ordered the carriage at ten o'clock in the morning, stating that he had peremptory business to transact in town, and that he wished to go alone.

He took his leave of his daughters with formal precision, and not without affection in his manner. He seemed, indeed to have more of sorrow than of anger in his mind, and left the house in a hurry, as if fearful of the possibility of inquiry or interruption. When he had left, every one was on the qui vive to guess the purpose of his sudden and mysterious errand, and they all concluded that he had gone in to see the bishop, and have personal confirmation of the exact result of the interview of the preceding Saturday.

However, in this they were all mistaken. The Major, as soon as he was well away from Hollywood, desired to be driven to Mr. Maher, his solicitor, in —— street. Arrived there, and seated in his private parlour, in the utmost confidence, the Major announced to him that he desired to make some alteration in the disposition of his property, which he had made some few years before in a will which Mr. Maher had prepared for him.

"I suppose, Major," said Mr. Maher, "some of the young ladies are going to be married, and you are going to convert the will into a settlement."

"Yes, Mr. Maher, I am going to turn my will into a settlement, but not a settlement which will be very much for the advantage of two of my daughters."

"How do you mean, Major?"

"In fact, Mr. Maher, my two youngest daughters have disobliged me, and acted in such a manner that I can no longer treat them as objects of my affection or bounty, and I mean to cut them both out with a shilling; that's what I mean."

Mr. Maher was well aware of the Major's infirmity of temper, and had often felt the force of it on his own devoted head, when his law business was not conducted just as expeditiously or successfully as the Major's impetuous disposition demanded, and he had no doubt that this was all an ebullition of passion, which would be over on the morrow. He, however, knew that he should humour the bent of the moment, and appear to acquiesce in his wishes, or bring down on himself the wrath he was desirous to avert from another.

"Well, indeed, Major," he said, "I am sorry to hear that any member of your family should have acted in a manner to displease you, but"——

Here the Major rather impatiently stopped his deprecations, by saying, "Sir, my daughters have not only displeased me, but disgraced and degraded me before all the world."

"Disgraced you (ejaculated Mr. Maher, rather horrified at the state of matters), you do not mean that they have run away, or made unbecoming alliances."

"No, sir, not in that sense exactly, but they have thought proper to ally themselves with heretics and infidels, and to turn Protestants—the first renegades that ever disgraced my family, and they will be the last, by ——."

This was a state of things for which Mr. Maher was not at all prepared, and could furnish no plausible palliative. He was, himself, a thorough bigot, and thought no offence, in all the dark catalogue of crime, could be greater than apostasy from the Roman Catholic Church. He ventured, charitably, to suggest doubts as to the reality of the offence, and the danger of arriving at hasty conclusions as to the opinions of mere girls so young as the Major's daughters, who really, he said, did not know their own minds for five minutes together. To this the Major, with many a bitter and painful denunciation, answered, by declaring the scene which had taken place, in his own presence, with the vicar-general, and their subsequent outrageous contumacy before the bishop himself, and declared that he had firmly made up his mind that their names should be erased from his will, adding—"I will let them beg or earn their bread among their Protestant associates; but it shall never be said that I reared a Protestant an hour longer than I could help it."

"Well, Major, of course I cannot know whether you are acting on sufficient grounds or not, in disinheriting your daughters, but I trust you will reflect on the consequences of the step you propose to take in respect of females whom you cannot throw upon their resources as if they were boys."

"Sir," said the Major, "I have reflected on the consequences before I came here, and I am resolved that not one shilling of my property shall either of them ever possess; and I further beg to say that I have come here not to discuss the propriety of my resolutions, but to have them carried into effect."

To this Mr. Maher at once said—"Of course Major, I will follow out whatever instructions you give me. It is, no doubt, for you to satisfy yourself as to their prudence."

"Well, Mr. Maher, that I fancy is my business, and not yours."

Mr. Maher then inquired what the nature of the changes were which the Major had in contemplation. Whereupon the Major took out from a large pocket-book a memorandum, written out most carefully in his own handwriting, and which was to the effect that, "inasmuch as his two youngest daughters, Edith and Adeline, had departed from the faith of the Catholic Church in which he had brought them up, and had obstinately, and in contempt of his parental authority, espoused the errors of Protestantism, that he, notwithstanding his natural love and affection for his said daughters, felt bound, in conscience and duty to the said Church, and in honour to himself and his family, to revoke all bequests made in his will in favour of the said Edith and Adeline, and he declared it to be his will and pleasure that the provisions therein contained, and intended for the said Edith and Adeline should go to his grandchild, Maria Waring, only daughter of Edward Waring, Esq., on condition that she did not become a Protestant."

The Major read the memorandum in a slow and solemn voice, which faltered at times, and scarcely found utterance, when he came to the words "notwithstanding my natural love and affection for my said daughters," which showed they were no idle words of form, or empty sound, but the genuine expression of the deep sentiment of his heart.

When he had concluded, he handed the paper over to his attorney with a sorrowful gravity, like what Queen Elizabeth might have felt when she handed the death warrant of her favourite Essex to her minister of justice. The poor Major appeared overcome and exhausted at the exertion, as if his whole strength had been given forth in the effort, and when the attorney, with professional sang-froid, calmly rose and proceeded to lock up in his escritoire the paper which was to consign two young unprotected girls, without maintenance or provision, to the tender mercies of a cruel world—the old man felt an icy coldness pass around his heart, and the tears trickled silently down his aged face and almost melted his resolution; but shame, pride, and propriety instantly checked the generous impulse, and, rising from his seat with difficulty, he said—"Mr. Maher, I beg you will have this most disagreeable business arranged as speedily as possible, for I find I am not as strong as I used to be; and as I can seldom come into town I wish you to fix an early day for the completion."

"Well, Sir," said Mr. Maher, "everything will be ready for your execution to-morrow, if you can come in."

With this the old Major left the attorney, and with less love for him than ever he had before. Strange waywardness of human nature, that the passive instruments of our perverse humours are the first to encounter our displeasure. The charitable cloak we throw over ourselves is not wide enough to cover them.

The Major returned home, and was received with the usual affectionate greetings and marks of attention by Edith and Adeline. The arm-chair was wheeled round beside the fire, and his slippers and dressing-gown ready. He repaid these little civilities with the accustomed—"Thank you my dear;" but there was a moody cloud upon his brow which betokened that all was not right within. The Major could not play a part, or pretend to what he did not feel, and to the most casual observer it was evident that he was constraining himself under a sense of some duty, not to let out the natural feelings of his heart. However, he acted on a determined plan, and retired to his room as early as he could, announcing that he should go into town again on the following morning early, on certain business.

The next day all was in readiness for the Major's departure, and he was at the hall-door, buttoning on his cloak, when a servant rode up the avenue in haste, and brought a note from his son-in-law, Mr. Waring. The hurried manner of the servant, and the illegible style of the direction of the note rather alarmed the Major. After some seconds lost in searching for his spectacles, he inquired of the servant what was the matter.

"Miss Maria, sir, has been very ill all the night, and is not expected."

The Major's blood ran cold to his heart. "Is this," said he to himself, "a judgment on me for going in to ruin my good and innocent children yesterday?" Aloud he said nothing, but desiring the servant to bring in the letter to Mrs. Marley, he drove off as speedily as he could into town. His first direction was to Mr. Waring's house, where he learned that scarcely a hope remained of his only grandchild. That she had taken ill the previous evening, and had grown hourly worse, and could scarcely hold out much longer.

The Major left the house in great affliction, and returned home without calling on Mr. Maher, sending him a message that he was unable to fulfil his engagement with him that day, but would call on the following morning. For three succeeding days the Major went into town, each day intending to fulfil his engagement with Mr. Maher, and to complete his plan of disinheriting and discarding his daughters. But, as each day arrived, his first visit was to the Warings. The child was worse and worse, and his heart failed him to go further. On the fifth day, when he called, he was informed that no hope whatever remained of the child's life. The Major returned home and found everybody in the deepest affliction at the tidings of little Maria, who was the pet of the house, and had engaged the warm affections of every individual in it. Their grief but aggravated the intense feelings of the old man's own mind, and he retired to his room. The story of David's child, which was smitten for the sin of its father, haunted his imagination, and recalled to his mind the beautiful story recorded in the Bible (which the Major very often read) when Nathan said, "Because thou hast given occasion to the enemies of the Lord to blaspheme, for this thing the child that is born to thee shall surely die. And Nathan returned to his house. The Lord also struck the child which the wife of Urias had borne to David, and his life was despaired of. And David besought the Lord for the child, and David kept a fast, and going in by himself, lay upon the ground."* In this frame, the Major felt himself convicted of sin, and thought that his crime had found him out, and judgment was awarded him for the wicked purpose of his heart to ruin his beloved children, because they had dared to worship God after the dictates of their own conscience. He earnestly prayed the Lord that the child might be spared, and his sin forgiven, and vowed upon his knees that he would no longer persecute or coerce his children, but leave them and their conversion in the hands of the Lord.

It was late in the evening, but yet the Major was not content to repair to rest without despatching a letter to his solicitor, Mr. Maher, the purport of which was, that further reflection had led him to doubt the propriety of the step he had proposed to take, and begging that Mr. Maher would destroy any draft of a will or codicil which might have been prepared pursuant to his instructions, and that nothing further should be done until he again communicated with him. A special messenger was sent into town with the epistle, and the Major felt no relief until he saw that he had fairly gone on his mission. The messenger was desired likewise to call at Mr. Warings and bring the latest intelligence respecting the child.

The return of the servant was anxiously awaited by every member of the family, but by none more impatiently than the Major, who delayed going to rest until he was informed how matters were, and after a considerable period of deep uneasiness, the messenger arrived with the first good tidings that had yet been had, and announcing that the child was slightly better and apparently rallying. After this the Major retired to sleep, taking an unusually tender leave of his family, and with a mind more free from anxiety than he enjoyed for many a day.

The morning brought better news of a more decided amendment, and every hour afterwards the child improved, until, in the course of a week, she was declared to be entirely out of danger, and soon after was playing on the Major's knees, out at Hollywood, prattling to her grandpapa as busily as ever.

From this time forth the position of Edith and Adeline underwent an entire change at home. The subject of religion was never mentioned; but all coldness and reserve on their father's part were removed, and he saluted and addressed them as warmly and affectionately as ever: a sort of tacit truce appeared to have been determined on, and each party conceded to the other, the right of acting on their own territories as they saw best; but outside their friendly circle of home Edith and Adeline had many a sneer and sarcasm to encounter, many a coldness and suspicion to feel, and many an ill-natured observation to bear. They perceived that among all their Roman Catholic friends they were regarded as aliens or deserters, and, as if tainted with some moral leprosy, their former associates, though they observed the outward courtesies of life, yet evinced a reserve that caused them to feel they were the objects of fear and suspicion, their presence a restraint, and their conversation and conduct a rebuke to the whole tenor of the sentiment and conduct of their party.

Reader, if you are advanced in years, you may have observed, that as the spring-tide of youth and prosperity recedes, it leaves many an object on the bleak shore deserted and alone. This is painful; but the rough contact with the world blunts the edge of our feelings, and we come to regard those desertions with calmness, if not with indifference. But in the earlier years of life, when our feelings are fresh, and our knowledge of the world derived, if not from the false medium of romance and fiction, from the scarcely less delusive source of our own imaginations, the disappointment of trusted friends grown cold, and loved associates turning their heads aside, is a trial that needs more philosophy to sustain than youth usually has acquired. Our national poet has beautifully expressed the sentiment we mean to convey, when he wrote—

> "Oh, colder than the wind that freezes
> Founts, that but now in sunshine played,
> Is the congealing pang that seizes
> The trusting bosom when betrayed."

This unreserved and entire trust is only reposed in early youth, and when it meets a repulse or betrayal, it is felt with a pang of bitterness which the substantial misfortunes of after life fail to inflict.

Edith and Adeline felt this with an intensity in exact proportion to their friendship and affection. Their pride sustained them in the first instance, and their deep conviction of the vital truth at issue, and their hourly increasing terror of its being compromised in the errors of Romanism, steeled their hearts to every feeling, to every coldness and withdrawal of friendship and confidence and cordiality with which they met.

But our story has, we fear, already exceeded its due limits, and therefore we hasten to its close. At home Edith and Adeline no longer experienced any difficulty or opposition, and they soon regarded with comparative indifference the coldness of those without. Their great and paramount anxiety now was on behalf of their beloved father, who had latterly betrayed unmistakeable symptoms of a speedy break up in a constitution which had endured for eighty winters. He had lived the life of a careless man—he was a perfect free-thinker in religion, though formally attached to the communion of the Roman Catholic Church. Their daily and hourly prayers were not so much that he should become a Protestant, as that he should become a Christian, and have a saving interest in the atonement of his Redeemer by a faith to lay hold on and appropriate to himself the declarations of mercy so graciously vouchsafed in the Scriptures to every one who will embrace them. The Major held up to the last, and with the characteristic vigour of his constitution and disposition never lay down until the last enemy, death, sternly seized him in his iron grasp and dragged him to his first and last bed of sickness. Still, the instinct of life, and the impulse of the natural heart of man prompted him to disbelieve that his latter end was at hand; and when Marcella, who knew too well what was approaching, suggested that the priest should be sent for, the Major rather tartly exclaimed—"What, ma'am, do you want to send me out of the world all at once?"

But, as day after day brought no relief, the Major's strength began to fail—the prospects of a near eternity began to dawn upon his mind—his heart became softened—his accents mild and gentle—and he seemed gladdened and refreshed when Edith and Adeline, improving every moment of opportunity, told him of the stupendous plan of salvation developed in the Gospel invitations of free and sovereign grace, and of the gracious invitations of mercy to the most ungodly and abandoned of sinners, and of the preciousness and priceless merits of the sacrifice of the Son of God. He listened with greedy avidity to glad tidings, which for upwards of eighty years had never reached his ears, though the sum and substance of the Gospel. He never expressed himself wearied of listening, and always welcomed their approach to his bedside, and wished their assistance in every little office of alleviation and consolation which his painful disease demanded.

Meanwhile we must not forget or disregard the feelings of Marcella, who was also devotedly attached to her father, and deeply affected by his severe illness. But, she had another sorrow far more bitter than the loss of her dearest parent; and it was this, that, although yielding to her importunities, he had about a fortnight before his death, consented to see the priest and undergo the ceremony of Extreme Unction, yet ever after, and as he grew worse, he steadily and determinedly refused to see him any more, or to admit him into his presence. Every effort of hers (and they were most assiduous and unremitting) to extract a consent had failed, although she applied herself every hour, and every moment she could spare, from the sick room, in prayer that her beloved father might not depart hence at variance with the Catholic Church. She constantly read, by his bedside, the prayers of her Church; but though he never repelled her affectionate attention he evidently regarded them not. His mind seemed absorbed in other matters, and poor Marcella could not but perceive with unutterable alarm and regret that the intercourse of Edith and Adeline was more acceptable to the Major than her own.

This went on for several days, and the Major's disease (which was an organic one) gained head every day, and all hope of his recovery had ceased, so that his death was hourly expected. His mind was still as clear and vigorous as ever, and fully conscious of his near approach to the dark valley of the shadow of death. His weakness had so far increased as to render him scarcely equal to the exertion of speaking. But on Friday evening he seemed to take a turn for the better (the sure presage of immediate dissolution), and gathering all his energies he felt sensible that this impartation of strength was the last effort and rally of expiring nature, and that the closing scene was at hand. His mind was at rest in the bosom of Jesus, and his bold heart nothing daunted by the king of terrors, he desired every member of his family to be summoned to his bedside.

A solemn and mournful scene is such an assembling, when the head of a family summons its members to bid adieu ere he sets out upon that long journey from whence no traveller returns.

When all were seated round him, the Major said in a strong and steady voice, "I have called you all together, feeling certain that my time is come, God's will be done! and I am satisfied to resign my spirit into the hands of my Creator and Redeemer. But, before I go, I wish to make such reparation as I can to you all. I feel I have been a tyrant, and did not indeed know what a blessing I enjoyed in the family I had, and I abused my authority over you all. I would only ask you now to forgive me, and you my dearest Edith and Adeline, to whom I have acted so harshly, I can make you no other amends now, but to give you my blessing, I pray God to watch over you, and I give you my free and full consent to follow your religion according to your conscience, and may God bless you all, here and hereafter."

These words were followed by a scene it would be impossible, and if it were possible, be painful to describe. The effort to the Major had perhaps exceeded his strength, and he fell into a faint. Marcella conceiving he was dying, and dying, as his last words seemed to convey, an apostate from the Catholic Church, was in terror and grief. She fell upon her knees, by his bedside, and prayed loudly in the cold formularies of her Church in the offices for the sick. The Major soon recovering, moved his hand with impatience and said faintly, "No, no, Adeline will read for me, Adeline." Marcella overwhelmed with dismay, ran wildly to her room and fell down in an agony of prayer that her father might not be taken in such a frame of mind, and the words of prayer never ceased from her lips until his last breath had departed.

Adeline offered no prayer, and resorted to no formularies, but whispered into the dying Major's ear, the consolatory text, "There is now no condemnation to them that are in Christ Jesus,"* "in whom we have redemption through his blood, the redemption of sins according to the riches of his grace," and while yet repeating this last text, her hand in his, the Major gave a strong responsive pressure and all was over.

TALK OF THE ROAD.—No. XVI.

"WELL, Pat, what have you got to talk of this time?" said Jem.

"The STATION, Jem," said Pat.

"And is it at a station you were, Pat?" said Jem.

"Deed is it, Jem," said Pat, "without meaning a bit of it."

"And how did you get there at all without meaning it, Pat?" said Jem.

"Why, I was going by Pat Devine's public-house," said Pat, "and there was a deal of people about it, but I didn't know what was going on, and I just went in for a pen'orth of baccy, and there I was in it, afore I knew where it was; and then, sure enough, I seen it was Father John holding a station in the inner room; and when I got the baccy, I was making my lucky, when I heard Molly Devine, and Mary Gormly, and Sal Gougerty, and some more of the devotest women, that's always at their duties, bragging again each other what was the best thing in the Church of Rome to trust in for our salvation, and then I just stopped a bit, to hear what they would say."

"Well, I suppose they were all of the one mind any way," said Jem.

"Not a bit of it, Jem," said Pat; "there was no two of them of the one way of thinking; just one thing better than another, taking their pick and choice like; and, deed, there seemed to be a something for every one, no matter how many."

"Well, the more hope some one hit right," said Jem.

"I'm afeard not, Jem," said Pat, "for there was one thing nobody took hold to."

"And what did they take hold on, Pat?" said Jem.

"Why, Molly Devine allowed it was the Mass, 'for sure,' says she, 'that's best of all; isn't it offering the body and blood, and soul and divinity, for the living and the dead?' says she. And then Mary Gormley allowed it was the holy water; 'for sure when I have plenty of that by me,' says she, 'I don't care for charms, nor fairies nor the devil himself,' says she; 'and what need I want anything else,' says she, 'when I don't care for the devil itself, with the holy water on me?' And then Sal Gougerty allowed it was the scapular, 'for sure that'll get me to heaven the next Saturday after I die,' says she, 'and what need I want of anything else?' says she. And old Peggy Donohue says, 'sure its confession,' says she, 'for when the priest says the Latin over me won't I be as clean of sin as the child unborn,' says she, 'and what more do I want than that,' says she, 'and what are yees all here for with your shillings, if that's not the thing?' says she. And then old Nancy Smith just riz on them all, 'and sure,' says she, 'it's astray yees are entirely; sure isn't one drop of the holy oil worth them all?' says she, 'if I get one drop of that on me before the breath is out of me, what need I care for anything else?' says she. And now do you see, Jem, what none of them thought of to trust in?"

"Aye do I," said Jem. "Sure none of them knows that it's in their own Bible that the blood of Jesus Christ his Son cleanseth from all sin. And isn't it the poor thing that none of them thinks of trusting in that, the creatures? and isn't it the quare thing, if the're all Catholics, that they don't all trust in the same thing, but one taking one thing and another another thing? but sure that's the way with them. But, Pat, now did you tell them of the blood of Christ, and you at a station?"

"Well, deed then I did, Jem," says Pat. "Says I, girls, isn't the blood of Christ the best thing at all, for sure that cleanses from all sin?"

"And how did they take that at all, Pat?" said Jem.

"Well, Jem," said Pat, "they just darned their eyes in me, as if they never heard the like of that before; but I hadn't time to hear more of it, for Pat Daly was just coming out of the room where Father John was hearing confessions, and he just got hearing what I said, so he turned round on me, and, 'Is it a Souper you are, to bring the like of that to a station with you?' says he. 'Not a bit of it,' says I; 'I takes no soup, thank God,' says I. And that's true, anyway, for not a drop of soup crossed my carcase since the Relief Committee gave it out in the famine. And I just turned round again on him, and, says I—'Are you going to tell us that the Soupers will have the blood of Christ all to themselves, and the Catholics get none of it?' says I; and with that he just quit it. Well, who do you think I seen go in next, Jem?"

"I don't know, Pat," said Jem

"Well, if it wasn't Tim Tevlin," said Pat.

"Is it him," said Jem, "the poacher and sheep stealer, that never did an honest day's work in his life, and a Ribbon-man into the bargain? What does the likes of him want of absolution?"

"Well, now," said Pat, "if Father John can wipe out a man's sins with a turn of his hand, isn't that just the man for him to try on?"

"Well, sure enough," said Jem; "but did he get absolution?"

"Well, I'll tell you about that," said Pat, "for the door stood open a minute, and I just seen it. There was the wee table, you know, with the plate on to drop the shilling in, just forenint the door, and Tim was giving it the go by. 'Where's the shilling?' says Father John. 'Havn't got it, your reverence,' says Tim. 'Go off with you and get it,' says Father John. 'And where will I get it, your reverence?' says Tim. 'What's that to me?' says Father John: 'off with you and get it.' And so Tim stood there quite easy. 'What are you waiting for there?' says Father John. 'Won't your reverence give me absolution?' says Tim. 'You'll get none without the shilling; be off out of that for it,' says Father John. So Tim stood there as easy as you please. 'What are you standing there for?' says Father John. 'Will I steal it, your reverence?' says Tim. 'Be off for the shilling, and don't bother me,' says Father John, with a screech. Well, Tim see'n Father John was minding nothing, he was that mad, and Tim had got just forenenst the table, and as he was turning round, he just drops his hand in the plate, and lifts the shilling, and walks out, and away out of the house. And, a while after, in comes Tim; and, when the next man comes out, in goes Tim. 'And have you the shilling, now?' says Father John. 'Yes, your reverence,' says Tim, dropping the shilling in the plate; 'but sure I had to steal it, your reverence,' says he. Well, you never seen a man so deaf as Father John. He never heard a word, but just says—'Down on your knees,' says he. And then the door shut to, and I seen no more till Tim comes out, looking as pleased as if he had stole the best sheep in a flock."

"Well, now, I wonder," said Jem, "would the absolution do for stealing the shilling?"

"And why wouldn't it?" said Pat, "did'nt he confess it, and get absolution?"

"Well, maybe it was as good for that as for all the rest," said Jem, "but did you go in yourself, Pat?"

"No, indeed, then, I didn't," said Pat, "but I was mighty 'feard Father John would have caught me, and lugged me in, maybe; for, a while after, out comes Father John in a hurry, and, 'Boys,' says he, 'is that Pat Doyle going down the street?' 'It is, your reverence,' says severals. 'Out with you, boys, and fetch him in to me,' says Father John. So off the boys went. Well, you know, Jem, Pat Doyle is taken up with the readers, and has quit the Mass altogether, and goes to Church; so, in he comes with the boys; and deed it's the dark corner I got into then; and then Father John says to Pat Doyle, 'Are you come to confession?' says he. 'No, your reverence,' says Pat Doyle, 'I confessed my sins to God this morning.' 'Much good that'll do you,' says Father John; 'what were you promised for turning?' says he. So Pat Doyle didn't say a word. 'Was it money?' says Father John; 'was it five pounds?' 'No, your reverence,' says Pat Doyle. 'Was it meal?' says Father John. 'No, your reverence,' says Pat Doyle. 'Was it soup?' says Father John. 'No, your reverence,' says Pat Doyle. 'And what was it you were promised?' says Father John; 'tell it out, man, before the people,' says he. 'Salvation, your reverence,' says Pat Doyle. Well, Father John looked done for a minute, anyway; and then, says he, 'Are you coming back to Mass?' says he. 'No, your reverence,' says Pat Doyle. 'And what will you and your children live on if you don't, when you were promised nothing?' says Father John. 'Please your reverence,' says Pat Doyle, 'we'll live on the blossoms of the bushes afore we go back.' Well, if I was'nt thinking what would come on Pat Doyle, or myself too, if I was caught, when who should come in but the Rev. Mr. Owens himself; for he was coming up the street, and he seen Pat Doyle fetched in to the station, and just followed him in, and he just comes right up to Father John, and says to him, 'Sir, it was I that took this man, Pat Doyle, away from your Mass, for I showed him that the sacrifice of Christ was finished on the cross, never more to be repeated; and that no Christian man should bow down in worship to a wafer. And I am ready now, sir, to show you, before the people, why no Christian man should do so, if you will undertake to show them why they should.' 'Pat Devine, where's Pat Devine?' says Father John. 'Here, sir,' says Pat. 'Is it getting my horse you are? Will he never be ready?' says Father John. 'Yes, sir, coming, sir,' says Pat Devine, and out he comes with the horse in a hurry. 'Oh, your reverence,' says Peggy Donoghue; 'sure you won't go without hearing my confession.' 'Oh! your reverence,' says Sal Gougerty, and all of them, 'won't you stop a bit for us?' 'Out of the way, women,' says Father John; 'is it all day I'll be kept here?' And up he gets on his horse, with Pat Devine holding the bridle and the stirrup, and flattering him all he could, and I peeping out of the open window: and I seen, as he rode off, that Pat Devine just turned the wrong side of his hand after him; and says he, 'The back of my hand to you, that would'nt stand up for your Church and your religion.'"

"Well, Pat," said Jem, "sure Paddy Doyle puts us all to shame, that wasn't afeard to stand up like a man."

"Well, maybe so," said Pat; "but sure why can't a man keep it all to himself, when it sets the country against him? Sure I trust in nothing but Christ and His blood, that cleanseth from all sin: but why would I go to say that out, and bring trouble on myself?"

Who knows but the time is coming, when Pat himself will say it before men? Pat does not know it, nor mean it now. But the time comes to every one that truly trusts in Christ, when something in their breasts within will make them confess Christ before men; for otherwise Christ would have to deny them before His Father in heaven.*

The Catholic Layman.

DUBLIN, SEPTEMBER, 1853.

THERE are but two ways of ruling the world. The one, that of reducing men to passive obedience, by practising on their fears of evil, and making them slaves; the other, by winning the affections and satisfying the convictions of rational free agents, and thus securing their voluntary obedience to well-ordered rule. These systems may be briefly called slavery and freedom. The one seeks to keep men narrow-minded, grovelling, ignorant, and superstitious; the other, to make them intellectual, spiritual, wise, and happy.

To which system does true Christianity belong? If to the former, she would do wisely, no doubt, to shut up the portals of knowledge, and to limit the field of vision, lest men, having once enjoyed a glimpse of the glorious canopy of heaven, should struggle to emancipate themselves from that tyranny which would doom them to grope in darkness and ignorance for ever, rather than peril its own selfish sway over their minds and liberties.

If, however, Christianity be a system whose power consists in its suitableness to enlighten, to elevate, to purify our race, and exacts nothing more than the voluntary obedience of reasoning free agents, the defensive armour of a shrinking or timid policy does not suit her. Let the priests of another faith ply their prudential expedients to keep the world from enlarging its knowledge, lest to the same extent they should diminish their own power. True Christianity stands in a higher and firmer attitude. She has, thanks be to God, come down to us with all the majesty of truth, and with all the grandeur of age, unsenthed by the pigmy philosophy which would, by undermining man's faith in an unseen world, reduce him to the level of the beasts that perish. The solemn march of eighteen centuries has but demonstrated more clearly that religious truth is seated on a rocky pinnacle, whose summit may, indeed, have sometimes been obscured by the clouds of error or doubt, but which has survived, and will still survive the storms of time, and remain unaltered through eternity. With such a religion as this there is nothing to hide. A half-learned and superficial public may associate with the very notion of a priesthood, the blindness and bigotry of a sinking cause, but they must be taught that Christianity is not a bigotted or a sinking cause, and that those who are able to estimate its grand simplicity, are fearless of the most thorough sifting of its pretensions, and neither require mankind slavishly to take it for granted, nor are disposed to shun a single question that can be started on the subject of Christian evidences. Again, we say, with such a religion as this there is nothing to hide. All should be above board. The broadest light of day should be made fully and freely to circulate throughout all her mysteries. Secrets she has none. Her office has been to reveal mysteries—to bring life and immortality to light—to make known what was before kept secret from the foundation of the world. With the frankness and simplicity of conscious greatness, she invites free inquiry, and challenges scrutiny; and whether she has to contend with the pride of philosophy, falsely so called, or to oppose herself to the prejudices of the unenlightened multitude, she is not afraid to do so on her own strength, and spurns the props and auxiliaries of superstition, of which the votaries of a weaker or doubtful faith are so anxious to take advantage. Essentially a religion of light, she is ever ready to come to the light, that her deeds may be made manifest that they are wrought in God.

We have been led into these considerations by reflecting on what appears to us to have been the cause and the probable consequences of the late modification of the system of National Education in this country, to which we have made allusion in another part of our paper—we mean the exclusion of the work on the Evidences of Christianity, which (after a twenty years' approbation) has at length been effected by the influence of those who would rather trust to the system of implicit faith in authority, aided by the props and aids of superstition, than attempt, by teaching mankind to think and reason rightly, to place their faith on the more solid basis of reason and knowledge. We have, perhaps, been also influenced by the reflection, that our own exertions to promote the cause of enlightened religion and Christian unity, have been everywhere met by the priests of Rome with a determination, as far as in them lies, to stifle thought and put down inquiry, and in some cases, at least, by misrepresentations and calumnies so gross, that none but the most ignorant can be deluded by them.

Most assuredly the time is not far off, when men who live in a free country, and know that they are no longer ignorant and superstitious, but able to use their reason, will assume courage, and venture to inquire fearlessly (we hope it may not be rashly or in an improper spirit), not merely into conflicting forms of Christian belief, but even into the truth of the pretensions of Christianity itself. We are strongly persuaded that an antidote to infidelity must be found in enlarged reason and increased knowledge, and not in the inculcation of blind faith. It is not by keeping men from investigating the evidences of religion, that they can be preserved from the dangers of scepticism and doubt; it is not by limiting education, but by extending it. The priests of a foreign system may, indeed, find it their interest to postpone the evil day of thought, and scrutiny, and free examination, by every means in their power. We warn them, however, that they may strain the cords too far, by which they would hope to restrain the multitude from pressing too curiously into their mysterious precincts. The man who has once got a glimpse of freedom, and discovered that his neighbours have acquired the same, will not be slow in allying himself with kindred spirits for their mutual benefit; men will thus strengthen one another in their common struggle for light and knowledge; and the more eagerly the priesthood of any religious system struggles for dominion over their minds and consciences, the more earnestly will laymen fortify themselves for the great struggle to be free. If the priests of Rome would maintain their supremacy, we tell them they must do so by a fair and manly attempt to prove their opponents wrong and themselves right; not by proclaiming all inquiry to be sinful, and denouncing those who would hear both sides, as infidels or apostates. If they would have the world to be what they call Catholic, they must allow their own claims to be discussed in a candid and Christian temper. They must cease from a warfare of curses, and denunciations, and instigation of popular violence, against those who (whether they be right or wrong in their opinions) are sincerely anxious to discover and propagate truth. They must, if they can, meet argument by argument, not by violence and abuse. If the press is made an instrument of disseminating error, why do they not use it to disseminate truth? If such pages as our own can be counteracted by a publication more learned, more accurate, more deeply thinking than ours, why do they not establish such a publication? We can assure them it would be read by both parties, and, if they have truth on their side, would produce them a golden harvest, both of money and fame. There is one reason—we think there can be but one—why they have not ventured, and we are bold enough to foretell why they never will venture on such a step, and it is simply this—that their wisest men know that their main strength consists in the ignorance and timid credulity of the multitude, and that the atmosphere of free discussion is not favourable to the growth of what they call piety, and we call superstition. We are sure there are many sincere and excellent, though, perhaps, shortsighted men in the Church of Rome, who would readily try, if permitted by their longer-headed superiors, to measure lances with us, as we rejoice to see some of our able and intelligent brother laymen have done, honourably and spiritedly, though, in a more limited way than we would desire in our pages; but such leaders as Cardinal Wiseman, and Dr. Cullen, and Mr. Newman are, we opine, too wise to hazard such a commission of inquiry into the truth of a Christianity, moulded after the fashion of the middle ages, and would rather leave the Bible without any other basis than the voluntary credulity of those who may be willing to accept both its authenticity and its alleged doctrines, on the assumed authority of their exclusive Church, than run the risk of teaching men to think for themselves. To men of that stamp, no doubt, any work on the evidences of Christianity, however able and unexceptionable in other respects, is objectionable in this, that it leads its readers into those regions of reason and inquiry, where proofs are looked for and must be provided, and out of the domains of that implicit faith in which all things are to be taken for granted, and nothing proved; forgetting the injunction of the Apostle—"Prove all things; hold fast that which is good."—1 Thessalonians v. 21 (Douay Bible). Will any of the Bishops or Priests of the Church of Rome now come forward, in or out of our pages, to grapple with and discuss the question of the boasted infallibility of their Church? or will they trust to the old policy still, and calculate on mankind for ever continuing to take it for granted, without proof? We shall see.

ON THE VISIBLE CHURCH.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

SIR—The visibility of the Church being a subject in which every class of Christians should feel a deep interest, and which I am anxious thoroughly to investigate, without any admixture of bad feeling, and as you have repeatedly signified your willingness to have it discussed in your journal, I beg to trespass on your usual kindness in resuming the matter, and to state, most distinctly, that any apparently strong expressions I may have used were not by any means designed to irritate or to give offence, but merely to elicit from you the most powerful reply that the advocates of your system are capable of putting forward, and which, from your talents and resources, you would appear so pre-eminently qualified to give.

The "arguments to prove that Christ might have no visible Church on earth" are the best that I have invariably heard used by Protestants, lay and clerical, with whom I have been acquainted; so, for their edification as well my own, I am amply compensated for my trouble in finding such arguments rejected by you, and thrown overboard altogether.

Now, sir, as you are an avowed advocate of the perpetuity and visibility of your Church, I maintain I have a perfect right to challenge any epoch in your Church history, as naturally involving a question of the visibility. I could with equal advantage select other periods—that of Berengarius, upon which I happened to light, will answer the purpose.

You indignantly repudiate the idea of the Roman Church, and the others in communion with her, being at that time the Church of Christ; you say I have misunderstood your words on this head. If I have, you are to blame. In my first letter (CATHOLIC LAYMAN, 1853, page 9), I have put the same construction upon these words, and you then quietly acquiesced in this interpretation. You say I have mistaken the meaning of the 19th Article, which, in your sense, is "the sublimest definition of the visible Church." Is it, I ask, a definition of an nonentity, or of something that has a real being? If it be a reality, why not point out the locus of its existence, as I said before? or is it a definition of something that exists only in your own imagination? "Oh," you say, "it was all over the world, wherever there were bishops, clergy, and people," &c. (C. L., July, 1853, p. 81). Surely, sensible men of your own communion will not be satisfied with so vague and indefinite an answer, much less persons of a different religious persuasion. Then you say—"It is time to look at the great fact, that the Greek and Eastern Churches really exist, though not in communion with Rome, superior to her in having preserved the Catholic creeds without mixture or addition" (C. L., July, 1853, p. 82).

Sir, I am aware of the existence of these Churches. Am I to understand that they constituted the true Church of Christ? If I take your words in this sense, I dread a castigation for making "a part equal to the whole;" and if they are not so taken, it is to no purpose to mention the existence of these Churches—"Quo teneam vultus mutantem protea nodo."

Now, sir, as this is a new feature in our controversy, I shall propose to you this dilemma:—If these Churches were not the true Church of Christ, you have failed to point out any true visible Church of Christ at all; and if these were the true Church, I call upon you to reconcile this with the 19th Article itself, which says that these Eastern Churches had erred as well as Rome "in their discipline, ceremonies, and faith." Mind that.

But you will exclaim, "Our correspondent mistakes the meaning of the Article," which only says that the Eastern Churches had erred too, but not so grievously as Rome, and the Greek Church is not at all censured by the Article: so, according to our principles, "they would not cease to be a visible Church"

That the Greeks believe Transubstantiation and the Sacrifice of the Mass is a fact so well authenticated, that candid Protestants do not attempt to dispute its certainty. That learned traveller, William Forbes, Bishop of Edinburgh, in a treatise, entitled "Moderate and Pacific Reflections on Controversy," acknowledges that the "Greeks and Latins agree in this belief." He quotes the testimony of Greek writers. Nicetas, in his "Orthodox Treasure;" Euthymius, in his "Panoply;" Nicholas, Bishop of Methone; Simonas, Bishop of Gaza; Nicholas Cabasilas; Mark of Ephesus; and Bessarion—all these openly profess this dogma in their works. Add to these the celebrated historian and physician, Gaspar Peucrus, and the English traveller, Sandius, in his "Mirror of Europe," page 233, says—"The Greeks agree with the Romans on Transubstantiation, the Sacrifice and principal parts of the Mass."

Professor Brerewood, of London, in his "History of all the Religions throughout the World," does not venture to assert that on Transubstantiation the Greeks differ in any respect from the Latin Church. Speaking of the Assyrians, the Copts or Egyptians, the Abyssinians, he does not assert that they differ in this point from the Roman Church.

The Lutheran Olearius, in his "Travels from Muscovy," says:—"The Muscovites believe Transubstantiation; that is, that the bread and wine are truly changed into the body and blood of Jesus Christ."

Cerularius, Bishop of Constantinople, who wrote with great virulence against the Latin Church, soon after the condemnation of Berengarius, and, amongst other matters, for using unleavened bread in the sacrament, does not charge her with any error on the Eucharist.

At the Council of Florence, when the Greek and Latin Churches were reconciled and united, they had no disagreement about Transubstantiation, though all other grounds of dissension were examined. The Eastern Churches also, and particularly the Greek Church, deny the procession of the Holy Ghost from the Father and Son.—See Acts of the Council of Trosly, held A.D. 909, by Herve, Archbishop of Rheims, and his suffragans. This dogma is inserted into the Nicene Creed, and professed in the Fifth Article of the Church of England.

If you persist, after this, to maintain that these Churches had preserved the Catholic creeds inviolate, and that they were the true, visible Church of Christ, yours must be latitudinarian principles, indeed.

In fine, I call upon you, unequivocally, to say why Berengarius did not put himself under the patronage of these Churches. If they were the true Church, and he persecuted for truth, they would at once extend to him sympathy and protection. The distance to either place (as you will see by the map) was comparatively short, and he could thus have avoided the disagreeable alternative of being either a "weathercock or a martyr."

Sir, I hope you will give this matter of the Eastern Churches "a candid consideration." I do not see how you can reconcile my objections, without coming to the conclusion that these Churches, equally with Rome, had reprobated the new-fangled opinions of Berengarius; and that this man, at that time the only representative of Protestant principles, had not one place in this wide world, to look to for sympathy or protection, "destruction before him and sorrow behind."

Φιλαληθης.

The question between us and "Philalethes," as to the sense in which we have spoken of the Church, appears to us to be this:—We had spoken of the "Christian Church," and "the Church of Christ;" and in his last letter (CATHOLIC LAYMAN, July, 1853, p. 81), "Philalethes" put this construction on what we said—"You mean, of course, the Roman Church, and the other Churches in communion with her, which you here seemingly admit to be the true Church of Christ."

Of this we said—"We spoke plainly and evidently of the whole Church, and our correspondent says—'Of course, you mean a part only'" (July, p. 2, col. 1). Our correspondent now replies again to this; and his reply seems to be to this effect—"I beg your pardon for having mistaken you; I thought, when you spoke of 'the Christian Church,' you meant a part of it only—that is, the Roman part: but now I see plainly that you meant the other part only—that is, the Greek part." We really must tell our correspondent that he has mistaken us again. When we speak of the Christian Church, or the Church of Christ, we do not mean either part, or any part by itself, but we mean the whole. We have already explained our meaning in a way which we thought prevented the possibility of mistake. We mean "by the visible Church of Christ on earth," the sum total of all bishops, priests, and people, professing the Christian faith, over the whole world; and we point to the Catholic Creeds as containing a full and concise statement of that faith.

Now, we really do not see what room there is to mistake what we mean by the visible Church of Christ on earth.

What, then, is the difference between us and Roman Catholics?

We have always thought it to be this—that they consider the Church of Christ to consist only of that part which acknowledges the Roman Church to be the mother and mistress of all Churches, and the Pope to be the Vicar of Jesus Christ on earth: and, of course, that all other bishops, clergy, and people that do not acknowledge this, are no part of the Church of Christ on earth. We have always thought that this is the keystone of their notion of the Church; whereas we think that there are Churches on earth, parts of the visible Church of Christ, that do not thus acknowledge the Roman Church as mother and mistress, nor the Pope as Vicar of Christ: and yet, notwithstanding, are really parts of Christ's Church on earth.

We are truly happy to see that in this essential question "Philalethes" appears to agree with us.

We pointed to the Greek Churches, which do not acknowledge Rome as their mother and mistress, and which expressly deny that the Pope is the Vicar of Christ; we pointed to them in proof that "Philalethes" was wrong in taking the expression "Christian Church," as if it meant only the Roman Church. And to this "Philalethes" answers—"Sir, I am aware of the existence of these Churches." Very good: then these are parts of the Church of Christ on earth, though they do not acknowledge Rome as their mistress, nor the Pope as the Vicar of Christ.

We have now good grounds for hoping that as "Philalethes" and we come to understand each other better, we shall agree in sound notions of the Church of Christ. This is the effect we hope for from a fair and candid discussion.

"Philalethes" takes some pains to prove that this Greek Church holds Transubstantiation; but he produces no proof except the opinions of individuals. We have already called on him to say whether he considers this method of proof, sufficient to establish the doctrine of a Church; and he has not answered us.

For instance—if we produce as many and as great authorities in the Church of Rome, saying, "The image is to be worshipped with the same honour and worship with which we worship those whose image it is," will he admit this as proof that this is the doctrine of the Roman Church? We ask him to answer this—"Yes," or "No."

If he will not what right has he to offer us the same proof that the Greek Church holds Transubstantiation?

How do we know that the Roman Church holds Transubstantiation? We know it thus:—She has decreed it in the Council of Trent, and has put it into her creed. We ask the same proof that the Greek Church holds it. Let "Philalethes" show us in what council she had decreed it; in what creed she has inserted it.

With respect to the case of Berengarius, which has hitherto been the main subject of "Philalethes's" letters (but of which he says so little in this letter), we beg to say, that we do not at present clearly understand how far "Philalethes" agrees with us, or how far he differs from us, about the real merits of that question. We think no good can come of any discussion in which the parties do not take the pains, each to understand the real opinions of the other about the matter in discussion. We, therefore, beg "Philalethes" to tell us exactly what his opinion is.

The question stands thus:—"Philalethes" brought forward the fact, that Berengarius was condemned, and forced to retract his opinion in various councils. We selected the most important, that which has been put in the canon law, consisting of Pope Nicholas II. and 113 bishops, held at Rome, in the year 1059. We gave the words which Berengarius was compelled to sign—that the true body and blood of Christ is, "in a sensible manner (sensualiter), handled by the hands of the priest, broken and ground by the teeth of the faithful." We affirmed that the word, sensualiter, can mean nothing else than this, "in a way that one senses can judge of and perceive." Now, we want to understand what "Philalethes" thinks of this. Does he think that the Pope and Council were right? or does he think that they were wrong? He has not told us, and we call on him to tell us: we cannot discuss this matter with him without knowing what his opinion is. We, therefore, call on him to answer this.

Our opinion is, that he will never venture to say that the Pope and the Council were right.

And if they were wrong, and if—according to his notions—the Pope and the Council spoke the doctrines of the whole Church, where was then the visible Church of Christ, according to his notion?

But if the Pope and Council were wrong, what are we to think of those, who, on "Philalethes's" confession, placed Berengarius in a position in which he had nothing but "destruction before him and sorrow behind," merely because he did not continue stedfast in the profession of false doctrine?

But "Philalethes" asks, why did not poor Berengarius walk off out of the Council at Rome to Constantinople? He tells us to look at the map, and it is only a step. Well, on a small map it may be three inches; but on the ground it may be a thousand miles. It was not so easy to do this when Rome was in her glory. If this were so easy, what a fool John Huss must have been! Why did he not walk away quietly when they were going to burn him?

We have received other letters, not meant for publication, on this subject of "the visible Church." We intend, in our next number, to propose our views more fully concerning it.

ON PURGATORY.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

SIR—I shall now proceed to obviate your objections, and to gratify you by showing that what you reject as "mere assertion" can be supported by irrefragable proofs; and that what you so explicitly deny is a matter of fact. I shall begin with St. Basil, Com. in Cap. ix. Isai. T. i. p. 554:—"The words of Isaiah (Cap. ix. 19)—through the wrath of the Lord is the land burned"—declares "that things that are earthly shall be made the food of a punishing fire, to the end that the soul may receive favour and be benefitted. And the people shall be as fuel of the fire" (ibid): This is not a threat of extermination, but it denotes expurgation according to the expression of the Apostle; "If any man's works burn he shall suffer loss; but himself shall be saved, yet so as by fire"—(1 Cor. iii. 15.) Truly, since our God is called a consuming fire, he will consume the wood and what vices arise from matter, which adhere to the soul in the flesh, not in the spirit. And when the fire shall have consumed the wood of sin, as it does grass, then that matter being destroyed which was fuel to the chastening fire, the Prophet says—"The burnt mountains shall repose," &c. (ibid Cap. x. p. 563-4). St. Gregory of Nyssa (Orat. pro defunct, Tom. II, page 166, et seq.) "But when he (man) has quitted his body and the difference between virtue and vice is known, he cannot be admitted to approach the Divinity till the purging fire shall have expiated the stains with which he was infected." Next, St. Ambrose, (Serm. xx. in Psal. cxviii. T. i, p. 1238)—"Take care that you carry not with you to the judgment seat of God, wood nor stubble which the fire may consume. Take care, lest, having one or two things that may be approved, you at the same time, have much that may give offence." "If any man's works burn, he shall suffer loss; but himself shall be saved, yet so as by fire, (1 Cor iii. 15)." "He will be saved," the Apostle said, because "his substance shall remain, while his bad doctrine shall perish." Therefore he said, yet so as by fire, in order that his salvation be not understood to be without pain. He shows, that he shall be saved indeed, but that he shall undergo the pain of fire, and be thus purified, not like the unbelieving and wicked man who shall be punished in everlasting fire. (Com. 1. Cor. T. 2. in App. page 122)." St. Jerome, (Adv. Jov. Lib. ii. tom. iv. par. ii. page 215.) says: "If he, whose work has burned and suffered loss (as the Apostle says) shall lose the reward of his labour, yet shall he be saved by the trial of fire, so he whose works shall abide which he built upon, shall be saved without fire. Thus there will be some difference in the degrees of salvation." In his comment on Isai. Cap. lxv. T. ii. page 492, he lays down this doctrine with equal perspicuity. "As we believe the torments of the devil, and of those wicked men, who said in their hearts there is no God, to be eternal; so in regard to those sinners who have not denied their faith, and whose works will be proved and purged by fire, we conclude, that the sentence of the judge will be tempered with mercy." My next witness, St. Augustine, (in Enarr. Psal, xxxvii, T. iv. page 295) bears unequivocal testimony regarding this dogma of Catholic faith in the fourth and fifth centuries. He says, "Cleanse me so in this life, that I may not stand in need of that purifying fire, designed for those who shall be saved, yet so as by fire. And why, but because (as the Apostle says) they have built upon the foundation wood, hay, and stubble? If they had built gold and silver and precious stones, they would be secured from both fires, not only from that in which the wicked shall be punished for ever, but likewise from that fire which shall purify those who shall be saved, yet so as by fire." The identity of sentiment, so observable in these passages, is a striking illustration of the uniformity of opinion held by the Catholic Church in the fourth century, respecting this point of doctrine. Their testimony shows, that it was then the belief, as it is now, that some souls were purified after death "before they were allowed to approach the Divinity," so that their notion of Purgatory is one and the same with that of the Catholic Church of the present day, neither of which bear any analogy to the overcharged picture of Purgatory which you give from "a Constant Reader," in page 58, vol. ii. No. 17, CATHOLIC LAYMAN; the tinting of which you set off by some florid touches of your own. The Church, at this time, prayed for the dead too, but not after the manner of the Church of England, as I shall presently show. At some future time I shall meet you on what you call the unscriptural character of the doctrine of Purgatory; but, at present, I am examining, on that point, witnesses of the fourth century; and it is most gratifying to perceive what a uniformity of opinion pervades their evidence, with respect to this doctrine, as believed and taught by the Church at that time; and thus by the seal of their corroborating testimony, they stamp on it the impress of the doctrine of Jesus Christ. I can find in these Fathers no conflicting evidence, no diversity of opinion regarding Purgatory; no speaking of it "as a thing that might or might not be;" but, on the contrary, the clearest and fullest direct evidence in its favour. This you give as mere assertion, and by your own rule goes for nothing.

That it may the more easily appear how closely the opinion of Origen on the doctrine of Purgatory agrees with that expressed in the above cited passages, I shall here subjoin his words—"But when we arrive at that place, he that brings many good works and little that is evil, this evil the fire shall purify as it does lead, that the whole may become pure gold. He that takes with him more of lead suffers the more, that he may be refined, and what little of gold there is after the purification remains. But should the whole mass be lead, that man must experience what is written.—"The sea covered them; they sank as lead in the mighty waters."—(Hom, vi. in Exod. T. ii. p. 148.)

Again—"For, if on the foundation of Christ, you have built not only gold, and silver, and precious stones, but also wood, and hay, and stubble, what do you expect when the soul shall be separated from the body? Would you enter into heaven with your wood, and hay, and stubble to defile the kingdom of God; or, on account of those incumbrances, remain without, and receive no reward for your gold, and silver, and precious stones? Neither is just. It remains, then, that you be committed to the fire, which shall consume the light materials; for our God, to those who can comprehend heavenly things, is a consuming fire. But this fire consumes not the creature, but what the creature has himself built, wood, hay, and stubble. It is manifest, that in the first place, the fire destroys the wood of our transgressions, and returns to us the reward of our good works."—Hom. xvi. in Jerom. T. iii. page 231.

Those fathers of the fourth century, whose opinions I have given, either declare the established doctrine of the Church at that period, or they wrote what was untrue, or heretical. If they have given us the doctrine of the Church in their time, such doctrine must necessarily be true, unless you succeed in showing the Church heretical at that time. If they published that which was not the doctrine of the Church at that time, and wrote only to puzzle posterity, why were not these false principles then, or in the next age, condemned by the Church? To this proposition, I demand a direct reply; and the same I repeat with regard to the citations from Origen, against whom you have not yet given anything more convincing than mere assertion, or individual opinion, neither of which can be admitted as proof. You conclude, rather hastily, that the question of Purgatory, with respect to the first three hundred years of the Church, "may now be considered as settled;" this, too, is assertion, and will require to be formally proved. Origen still stands forth with the same undiminished assurance of credibility, as when I first put him forward; in the sporting phrase, I say, "You have not yet taken a feather out of him," and now he must stand or fall with those other Fathers in whose company I have placed him; yet, should I give him up as being heretical, it would be no difficult matter, independently of him, to prove that the Church, in the second and third century, held the doctrine of Purgatory; this I will prove when you show by proper authority, the Catholic Church, that my citations from Origen are heretical, and have been condemned.

The Catholic Church of the fourth century prayed for the saints, and for the others who died in the Christian faith in quite a different manner.—(Epiph. Hær. 75, sec 7, t. i., p. 911.) (St. Aug. Ench. cap. 109.) For the latter they prayed that God would grant them pardon of their sins, that he would have mercy on them; and for the former, their prayers were thanksgivings.—(Ibid.) "There is a way of living so good that it does not need these helps of prayers and oblations after death.—(St. Augustin Ench. cap. 109, 110.) They who need not these helps after death, namely, the saints, who bring with them, out of this world, only gold, and silver, and precious stones, are, at once, admitted to glory. Of them it is said (Apoc. iii. 21)—"will I grant to sit with me on my throne;" and (Apoc. ii. 26)—"I will give him power over the nations, and he shall rule them with a rod of iron." To these saints, who are already come into the kingdom of God, the supplicatory import of "thy kingdom come" is inapplicable; neither have you given any proof of the contrary. I hold, with St. Cyprian, as I have already stated, that "they pray anxiously to God for our salvation," and by their intercession for man, they exercise that power so distinctly expressed by a rod of iron. They offer up the prayers of the saints on earth to God (Apoc. v. 8.) (St. Cyril, Catech. Myst. v., n. ix. x., page 328) declares that—"The souls of the dead are relieved and comforted by the sacrifice of the altar and by prayer." If space permitted, I could supply many other quotations, equally positive, in favour of this doctrine, all proving the efficacy of prayers, &c., for the dead, and the remission of some sins in a future world; so that it is evident that these prayers, in the fourth century, did go beyond the Protestant notion of prayers for the dead; and if the Catholics have, as you say, grossly violated the ancient practice of prayers for the dead, it is truly consoling to find we are partners in that violation with these holy men named in this paper. In the next place, to my demand of a Scripture proof for holidays in honour of the saints, &c., you reply that, "Scripture proof is required only for articles of faith," and not for "rites and ceremonies," and thence you infer the Church has power to appoint holidays. Are we to understand that "rites and ceremonies" are holidays and prayers? This is precisely your argument.

If Heb. xiii. 7, be with you direct authority to commemorate the Apostles, you must admit, on the same direct authority, that these Apostles still have rule over you; but it could be easily proved that this text is not authority for either the one or the other; so you have yet to give Scripture proof of your prayers for the dead, and for holidays in honour of the saints.

I am, Sir, yours, &c., &c.,

EDMOND POWER.

The arrival of a long letter from Mr. Power has placed us in a disagreeable perplexity, between our desire to deal courteously with our correspondent and our fear of wearying the patience of our readers with further discussion on an exhausted subject. As the best mode of reconciling our duty to both, we print Mr. Power's letter in full, and at the same time, for the convenience of our readers, we portion off those parts of the subjects which have been thoroughly discussed from those which still deserve examination.

We repeat, then, that as far as the Fathers of the first three centuries are concerned, the question is settled—settled, that is, as far as any controversy can be—when both parties are agreed as to the state of the facts, and when nothing remains but a difference of opinion.

The question proposed was—"Do any writers for the first three centuries make any mention of the doctrine of Purgatory?" and it now appears that, during the many months our columns have been open for the discussion of this question, evidence has only been able to be adduced from one of the many writers who flourished during the first three hundred years of our religion, and that one Origen! And we are also agreed as to the fact that Origen is in general a very unsafe guide, and that he has fallen into many heresies.

We differ in opinion, in that Mr. Power holds, that in the passages cited Origen expresses views exactly coinciding with the present Roman Catholic doctrine of Purgatory, and that he was also joined in these opinions by the Church of his day; while we hold that in these passages Origen only expressed a certain heretical notion of his own, in which he was neither followed by the Church of his own day nor the Church of Rome at present.

It would be hopeless to expect that this difference of opinion could be removed by further argument; and we only appeal from Mr. Power's opinion (who, under the exigencies of controversy, is scarcely an impartial judge) to that of the most learned and candid divines of his own communion, who, we have shown, agree with us, and not with him. We think that our readers will be grateful to us for closing all further discussion on this part of the subject, except such as may be calculated to throw some new light on the state of the facts, such as other passages from the Fathers of the first three centuries, which Mr. Power professes to be able to produce, and which, of course, he ought to do, and is perfectly free to do if he can.

It would seem, then, that we ought to come next to discuss the state of the facts as to the writers of the fourth century, by whose help Mr. Power proposes to interpret Origen; but there is something which must take precedence of a question of facts, and that is a question of fundamental principles. Now, in a part of his letter, to which he has invited our especial attention, Mr. Power makes it plain that the principles on which he argues the question are wholly different from ours. He says, "Those Fathers of the fourth century whose opinions I have given, either declare the established doctrine of the Church of that period, or they wrote what was untrue.* If they have given us the doctrine of the Church in their time, such doctrine must necessarily be true. If they published that which was not the doctrine of the Church at that time, why were not these false principles then, or in the next age, condemned by the Church? To this proposition I demand a direct reply."

Now, it is evident that our reply to this question must come before any discussion as to the views of particular writers of the fourth century. For suppose that we were completely successful in demolishing every passage which could be brought forward in proof of Purgatory from writers of the fourth century, Mr. Power would only have to alter the word "fourth," in the argument just cited, into "fifth," or "sixth," or "seventh," or whatever the first century may be in which he can find purgatory to have been part of the received belief among Christians. In fact, it is plain that the way Mr. Power, perhaps unconsciously, argues is—"Purgatory is part of the teaching of the Church now; the Church cannot err, and her doctrines must be always the same; therefore the statements of the Fathers of the fourth century must be interpreted so as to coincide with the teaching of the Church now, and the statements of Origen, so as to coincide with those of the Fathers of the fourth century."

Now, when Mr. Power says—"Either these Fathers declare the established doctrine of the Church of that period, or they wrote what was untrue."† We object to his statement for two reasons; first, he assumes that the established doctrine of the Church is always the same, which is denied, not only by Protestants, but also by Mr. Newman, and the other Roman Catholics who hold the doctrine of development; and, secondly, he assumes that the received belief of the majority of Christians is in every point true, which is denied by Protestants. Now, no one is at liberty to assume, in controversy, first principles denied by his opponent, otherwise the controversy falls to the ground at once. If Mr. Power were at liberty to assume that the Church of Rome is infallible, then it would be needless for him to spend his time in collecting the opinion of the Fathers about Purgatory; he might content himself with saying it is the doctrine of the Church now—that is enough. On the other hand, if we were at liberty to assume the principle of the sufficiency of Scripture, we need not appeal to the Fathers; we might say there is nothing about Purgatory in the Bible—that is enough. But there is a neutral ground on which we can meet Mr. Power, and that is, to treat the matter as a purely historical question. Without assuming the doctrinal point that the writers of the first three centuries must have believed exactly as those of the tenth century, can you ascertain from their own writings whether they believed in Purgatory or not? Can you connect, by historical evidence, Purgatory with the teaching of the Apostles, and can you show that those who learned from them held that doctrine? We have ascertained, in the course of this discussion, that if they believed in Purgatory, at least in all their writings, they said nothing about it; and that though there were many occasions when we might expect them to have mentioned it. There is a great gap, then, between the Apostolic teaching and the first mention of Purgatory—a gap which nothing but the doctrine of the infallibility of the Church can ever bridge over.

Having laid down these principles, we have a clear way to enter next month on the examination of the views of subsequent writers, it being understood that no testimony from the fourth century can make up for the want of earlier evidence—that we are not at liberty to assume it to be impossible that Gregory of Nyssa, or Basil ever could have fallen into error on any point; and that if Mr. Power can even succeed in proving that the Fathers of the fourth century believed exactly the same as Origen, we are free to reply, "so much the worse for the Fathers of the fourth century."

The same principles enable us to dispose of the challenge which Mr. Power repeats as to Origen, whom he says we have left untouched. Mr. Power's mistake is, that he imagines the onus probandi to be on us to show that the passages cited from Origen have been formally condemned; whereas, in truth, it is incumbent on him to show that the sentiments there expressed are those of the church of the time, before he can prove that Purgatory was the belief of the third century. The principle assumed by Mr. Power is, that every sentence in Origen must be understood to be in accordance with the doctrine of the Church, unless it can be showed that that particular sentence has been formally condemned. It would be untrue to assume this in the case of any one of the fathers, but it is perfectly monstrous to assume it of Origen.* Does Mr. Power imagine that there was a "Congregation of the Index" in those days, who went over the works of every eminent Christian writer, expurgating all the faulty passages, and leaving nothing but what might be safely followed by posterity? One would fancy that he must entertain some such belief, from his so often asking us either to receive the doctrine held by such and such a father, or else to show where this sentence was condemned by his successors. At all events, concerning Origen, the hero of a hundred heresies, it is enough to say that, with regard to any exposition taken at random from his works, the odds are that it is not in accordance with the general opinion of the church; and any one who asserts the contrary is bound to prove it.

We must not conclude without some remarks on the other subject which Mr. Power has introduced into this discussion—the necessity for a Scripture proof for church holidays, &c.; because it is an example how ignorant even educated Roman Catholics are as to the first principles of Protestants—ignorance which we hope this journal has already done some good in removing.

Protestants hold, then, that our Lord by his own mouth, and those of his apostles, revealed to the world certain truths which it deeply concerned mankind to know; and that in order that this revelation should not be lost, it was committed to writing in what are commonly known as the "Holy Scriptures." For any thing which claims to be part of this system of truth, the knowledge of which is necessary to men's salvation, they accordingly require Scripture proof.

But they hold, likewise, that our Lord formed his disciples into a society, having full powers to make regulations for its preservation and for the details of its worship, &c.; and for details of this nature they do not require Scriptural proof.

If any one asks us why do we religiously observe the festival of Christmas Day, or why do we make use in our public worship of such and such a prayer? then we answer, on the authority of our Church, and we never think of seeking for any other reply; but if any one were to assert it to be necessary to salvation to observe the festival of Christmas Day, or to say that the church could not do otherwise than command its observance, then, for such an assertion as this, we should ask for Scriptural proof, as well as for historical proof, that the church always did observe the festival in question.

We may add, that the distinction here insisted on, though sometimes lost sight of by Roman Catholic controversialists, is recognized by their best writers who always distinguish between Divine and ecclesiastical traditions.

* For clearness we omit in this argument the word heretical, added here by Mr. Power, the word being ambiguous. The word heresy is sometimes used to denote any grave doctrinal error; sometimes such an error as was condemned by the majority of Christians at the time when it originated. It is plain that it would be a contradiction in terms to speak of the majority of Christians as falling into heresy in the latter sense, though not in the former; and thus the word may be so used as to prejudge the great question at issue between Roman Catholics and Protestants—viz., was it possible for the majority of Christians at any time to fall into serious error on religious subjects.

† This phrase "established doctrine of the Church," being also ambiguous, it is necessary to remark that it is not pretended that the Church had established anything in the first thousand years by any formal decision upon Purgatory; and the question only is whether it was the received belief of the majority of Christians.

* The passages from Origen, which Mr. Power quotes, have been already the subject of much discussion. Not to occupy space unnecessarily, we think it enough to refer the reader to Vol. i., p. 67, 142, and Vol. ii., p. 67.

WHAT IS THE POSITION OF THE PRIEST IN THE MASS?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

SIR—I have observed in your journal many remarks, at both sides, of considerable ability, on the Roman Catholic doctrine of Transubstantiation, and the Sacrifice of the Mass. Such vital topics demand the most careful discussion. Both parties should distinctly comprehend the propositions for or against which they contend. Many of them have been clearly stated, and ably defended by your Roman Catholic correspondents. I am in hopes, therefore, they will explain to me their views on one of the most momentous nature, and as yet untouched by either. We know enough of the disputed change in the eucharistic elements; we know that the same propitiatory sacrifice is said to be there offered up that took place on the Cross of Calvary; but we do not yet know what exact position the priest who accomplishes these sacred mysteries is supposed to occupy. If that which I am about to state be really the doctrine of their church, it will be an additional obstacle to adopting their belief. If, on the other hand, it be shown not to be so, it will be a serious obstacle removed. It is, therefore, well worth their while to grapple with the subject.

The short question is this—is the priest, in the administration of this sacrament, supposed to take on himself the "person, power, and functions" of our Lord Jesus Christ? If he be so, we must require strong proof of so startling a proposition—blasphemous if falsely put forward—and if he be not, I must ask for an explanation of the following passages in the Catechism of the Council of Trent:—

"* The Sacrifice of the Mass is one and the same sacrifice with that of the Cross; the victim is still one and the same, Jesus Christ. * * * * The priest is also the same Christ our Lord; the ministers who offer this sacrifice consecrate the holy mysteries not in their own, BUT IN THE PERSON OF CHRIST. This, the words of consecration declare; the priest does not say—'This is the body of Christ,' but, this is MY body;' and thus invested with the character of Christ, he changes the substance of the bread and wine into the substance of his real body and blood."

But this may be a solitary expression, not meant to convey so strong a meaning as at first sight it bears. Yet it is strange that a few pages afterwards,† in speaking of the power of the priest in the Sacrament of Penance, it says—"The voice of the priest, who is legitimately constituted a minister for the remission of sins, is to be heard as that of Christ himself, who said to the lame man—'Son, be of good cheer, thy sins are forgiven thee.'"

Lest we should give this or the preceding passage a figurative turn, we meet, a few pages further on, language that seems scarcely capable of being equivocal—"In the minister of God, who sits in the tribunal of penance as his legitimate judge, he (the penitent) venerates the power and PERSON of our Lord Jesus Christ; for, in the administration of this, as in that of the other sacraments, the priest represents the character, and discharges the functions of Jesus Christ."

I ask your correspondents to consider these three passages together, and say what power is attributed to the priest, or what is wanting to his actual deification—I mean, during, and with reference to, his celebration of these sacraments. I shall reserve my remarks—if remarks be needed on such a result—till I find whether or not the plain interpretation be that of the Roman Catholic belief. If it be, I should like to see some attempt at supporting its truth; if it be not, I should remind them that the doctrine of Transubstantiation has affected to be founded on a literal interpretation of some texts of Scripture. In a former letter I think I have shown that this supposition is utterly mistaken. In a future I may have to observe that their official explanations of this Sacrament cannot be credited by good Roman Catholics, unless when softened and diluted by a very figurative interpretation.

FONTIUM PETITOR.

THE BLESSED VIRGIN AND THE HOLY GHOST.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

SIR—I fear that Pat's report of the sermon in which the shocking statement was made, that the Blessed Virgin was the wife of the Holy Ghost, must have been but too true, for we find the same sort of thing affirmed, not only in Dr.

* Translated by the Rev. J. Donovan, Professor of the Royal College of Maynooth. Coyne, Dublin, 1829; p. 249.

Marshall's sermon in Ireland, but in books published by authority on the Continent. I will refer your readers to a book, used in the year 1851, in a mission for the benefit of Malaga in the south of Spain, by Father Felix of Cadiz, and reprinted, with grant of indulgences, &c., by licence of Salvador Tonf, then Bishop of Malaga, now Archbishop of Granada. It is called "Novena of the Most Holy Mary, under the title of the Divine Shepherdess of Souls, Protectress of the Mission of the Capuchin Order." It consists of nine supposed offices of the Blessed Virgin in the character of Divine Shepherdess, with a meditation upon each office and a prayer. The title of Divine Shepherdess was first invented in the year 1703. Her nine offices as Shepherdess are:—1. Knowing the sheep. 2. Leading the sheep. 3. Driving away the wolves with her voice and crook. 4. Encouraging the feeble sheep. 5. Healing the sick sheep. 6. Seeking for the lost sheep. 7. Bringing back the lost sheep to the fold. 8. Assisting the sheep at their death. 9. Being an example to the sheep.

The reason why, if all this is true, our Lord speaks of himself as the Shepherd, instead of his mother as the Shepherdess, we need not here inquire, but yet it is worth knowing. To come to the point of this letter, there are appended to this Novena the Seven Mysteries of Joy, the Seven Mysteries of Sorrow, and the Seven Mysteries of Glory. The last of the Mysteries of Glory is as follows:—

"The Holy Ghost enamoured, boasts himself (Blasona) a faithful lover; burning with the flames of love, he crowns thee as his bride. It is assuredly a garland due to thee, for thou wert the most brilliant Shepherdess.

"R. Since thou art my Shepherdess, I am thy sheep—Ave Maria!"

Your obedient servant,

M.

PERSECUTION IN HINDOSTAN.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

Sir—There are very many promises in the Scripture addressed to the afflicted and persecuted people of God, but referring generally to the spiritual consolations to be imparted to them here, or the joys laid up for them hereafter. In one passage, however (Mark x. 29), our Lord expressly says, that those who have suffered the loss of all for his sake shall have "one hundred fold more in this present life" than they have lost. Are we to understand this literally? I think that the following anecdote may be an interesting and instructive reply to the question—interesting, as showing how a poor Hindoo convert understood it; and instructive, as holding up an example which we, who may think ourselves more advanced in the Christian life than a convert from heathenism could be, would do well to follow. The person referred to was a Brahmin, by name Dhondapa; he, with two others, were the first converts in Western India, and were baptized in the year 1825. He was sorely persecuted, almost to death. There was so much bitterness against him, that the missionary, who was the means, under God, of his conversion, feared to baptize him in his native place, but took him to Bombay, a considerable distance, for the purpose. After his baptism he returned home, but there he was an outcast. By the Hindoo law he was considered dead, and his house and land were transferred to another. His wife and children were taken from him, his relations despised and persecuted him, and none of his own people would assist him in any way. His wife was especially bitter against him, called him a devil, would not speak to him, or even walk at the same side of the road with him. The Lord raised him up friends among the Europeans. Being a Brahmin, he had never learned any trade, but he could write a little, and a Christian gentleman gave him some employment in that way, and supported him. After some years, when this friend was removed by death, another was raised up, and thus he was not suffered to want. It was during his residence with the latter friend that the little circumstance referred to took place; this was several years after his conversion, and it is worthy of remark, that at this time he sent more than half of the small sum which he received monthly for his own support to his heathen wife. Her enmity against him was no way abated, but she was in poverty and distress, and Dhondapa nobly acted out his dear Lord's precept—"Love your enemies, bless them that curse you, do good to them which hate you, and pray for them which despitefully use you and persecute you." In the family with whom Dhondapa was living, the Scriptures were daily read, in the Mahratta language, to the heathen servants. Dhondapa was always present, with his Mahratta Testament, and was ready to say a word, when called upon, or reply to a question. In the course of reading, the 10th chapter of St. Mark's Gospel came under consideration, and after various questions had been asked of the listeners, to ascertain how far they understood what was read, and some remarks had been made, Dhondapa was thus appealed to—"Well, Dhondapa, this is a remarkable verse, in which the Lord Jesus says that he will give 'an hundred-fold more in this present life' to those who have forsaken all for him. You have forsaken all—you have lost wife and children, house and lands; can you say that the Lord Jesus has given you a hundred-fold more in this world, according to his promise here?" Dhondapa replied immediately, with great simplicity, to the effect, that it was true that he had given up all that he had for the religion of Jesus Christ, and that he had suffered much in body and mind—that great anger had been felt towards him by his family, who had cast him from them; but God, he said, had been very good to him, giving him great joy and peace in his own mind, and also giving him fathers, and mothers, and children (referring to the friends raised up to him; "Father and mother" is the common Hindoo appellation for a protecting friend) in place of those whom he had lost since he believed on Jesus Christ, and then he paused, and added emphatically—"He says He gives an hundred-fold, but I think He gives a thousand-fold!" Was not this a striking testimony to the truth of God's promises, as well as to the simple, thankful spirit of the poor convert? and ought it not to be a lesson to us who have so many mercies—mercies to our land, mercies to our people, mercies to our families—more than the poor Hindoo? Made, too, as it was, before several heathen servants, for Dhondapa was not ashamed to confess Christ before men, one would have thought that it would have come home to their hearts (for the persecution to which they are exposed, when they profess Christ, is a great hindrance to many poor Hindoos), and have been a word of encouragement, especially to one among them, who knew the truth, but feared to "follow on to know the Lord;" but it seemed to make no impression, for until the Lord is pleased to work by his spirit, however the head may be taught, the heart remains unmoved. This is alike true, of all men, whether nominally Christian or not: our Lord teaches us that the state of the nominal Christian may be even worse than that of the heathen.—Matth. xi. 22. Perhaps another little circumstance regarding Dhondapa may be interesting, and likewise convey another lesson to us. The prophetical books of the Old Testament were not translated into the Mahratta language until some time after the New Testament, and the Pentateuch had been, and it was near twenty years after Dhondapa's conversion that he first saw the Book of the Prophet Isaiah, the first of the Prophets that was printed. A friend brought it to him from Bombay; he was greatly delighted with it, and read it through with great eagerness; he could hardly bear to lay down the book until he had finished it. "Oh!" he said; "these are sweet words, this is all very good, this is the Gospel;" and he determined to learn the book by heart. He had received the Pilgrim's Progress before this, and was very fond of reading it; but one passage puzzled him: he thought that it differed from the Scriptures. He was a very simple-minded man—it was not always easy either to make out his difficulties or to remove them. When a text from the Holy Scriptures could be brought to clear up a passage, or make a duty plain, that satisfied him. In this instance, the friend who tried in vain to remove his difficulty, with regard to the Pilgrim's Progress, at last said—"Well, Dhondapa, if you cannot understand this seeming difference, remember that the Scriptures are the Word of God, while the Pilgrim's Progress is only the word of man." "The word of man!" exclaimed Dhondapa, "the word of man! I thought that it had been the Word of God. I shall put it away—I do not want the word of man, I want only the Word of God!" He could say with the Psalmist—"The entrance of thy word giveth light, it giveth understanding unto the simple; oh, how love I thy law! It is my meditation all the day." May this be our happy experience; and may we be enabled also to pray, "Open thou mine eyes, that I may behold wondrous things out of thy law."

An Eye-witness.

FARMING OPERATIONS FOR SEPTEMBER.

The general ripening of the grain crops being unusually late, by from ten days to a fortnight later than the generality of seasons, renders the farming operations given in our last still appropriate, and harvest operations will, therefore, constitute the chief employment during this month; and from the very uneven and scattered way in which the grain is ripening, will most probably be extended far into the next. Much alarm has arisen during the last fortnight from an anticipated scarcity of hands in cutting and gathering in the harvest, but this is subsiding in some degree, as the men are now fast returning from the English harvest; and as our harvest is not coming in so general or so quick as hitherto, there is but little to fear, in a general way, either from a scarcity of hands, or a higher rate of wages than the farmer is able to pay. With those who may be differently circumstanced, reaping by the scythe must be adopted, at least, in part, which, if carefully performed, will be equally effective with the reaping-hook or sickle, particularly with oats if not allowed to get too ripe. Cutting with the scythe, even with some trifling drawbacks, has particular advantages, which go far in compensation; some of which are—a greater quantity of straw, from the closeness to the ground with which the scythe cuts; and this alone will be of paramount advantage, by giving an increase of fodder, as hay is now both scarce and dear; the corn will cure much sooner after the scythe than the sickle, and can, therefore, be carried and stacked much earlier, thus saving much loss of grain from handling, and also of time.

General Observations.—Avoid as much as possible cutting corn of any kind during rain or while wet, embracing every dry opportunity for that purpose; and immediately as it is cut, let it be bound in very small sheaves, and stooked. If the weather be dry, and can be depended on, laying in swathe ungathered till next day will expedite its curing, and dry up any green herbage that may be cut with the corn. Let it not be capped or hooded till towards evening, or on the approach of rain; and in stooking or field stacking, avoid making either near hedges or trees, keeping them out in the open field, exposed to free air on all sides. As it will be of paramount importance to subject the stubble to the operations of the grubber or the plough, as early as possible after the severance of the crop, let the stooks be made in straight lines, at wide intervals, so that if any delay arises in carrying home the crop; those implements may have room to work while the weather is yet dry, and the land dry and friable.

Stacking.—When fit to be carried, make the stacks with a long shank and a short head, to save thatching; ventilate those by carrying up one or more perpendicular chimneys, which should discharge into horizontal flues, open at both ends, under the eaves, and, as soon as completed, let the stack be immediately thatched.

Ploughing is an operation that no other work should be allowed to interfere with, and should be proceeded with immediately after the severance of the corn. The stubble and annual weeds, by being now ploughed down, will be converted into the richest vegetable manure, and the earth, being laid up high and dry during the winter, will be ameliorated by the influence of alternate frosts and thaws, the inorganic materials broken down and disentigrated, and the ammonia absorbed from the atmosphere, which is always charged abundantly with it, the action of the harrows or grubbers, on the first dry weather in spring, will reduce the surface to the finest possible tilth. Where the land requires subsoiling, this is the best, easiest, and most profitable period to effect it, as it will have a longer time to lie under the fertilizing effects of the weather. In lieu of a subsoil plough, a common plough, stripped of its mould-board, following in the track of the first, will do this work very efficiently; or it may be done by manual labour, by disposing six or eight men along the track of the plough, according to the speed of the horses, with good strong spades, to dig eight to ten inches deep under the depth of the plough, and throw the subsoil, if it be good, on top of that raised by the plough; or, if not of a quality to bring to the surface, turn it over to that depth in the bottom of the furrow. Before this operation is attempted, it must be understood that the land is either naturally dry, or rendered so by draining. The latter cannot be profitably effected if subsoiling do not follow.

Winter Vetches should be sown this month in breadth, according to to requirements. Mixed with rye or oats it comes into use earlier than when sown alone. Four bushels of winter vetches, mixed with four or five stone of rye to the Irish acre, will give the earliest cutting; the same quantity of vetches and oats comes in next; while a breadth sown at same time of unmixed vetches, will only be in its prime when the others are nearly consumed. Three or four lbs. of rape per Irish acre, sown at same time, will materially increase the bulk of provender, and keep the vetches from lying on the ground. In dry land the crop may be sown on the flat, but in land having a tendency to damp, ridges with open furrows will be best; a liberal dressing of manure will vastly increase the weight of crop.

Rape, sown in June last, should now be planted out, the earlier the better, and may still be sown on dry, warm soils, with a favourable aspect; but in cold, backward ones it is too late to sow, though transplanting may be proceeded with, both this and the next month.

Italian Rye-grass and Clover, for soiling early next season, should be sown this month, the earlier the better, in well-prepared, clean, rich, stubble land, after green-crops, or after early potatoes. It will come into use early in May; in some cases it will be fit for cutting some time in April, and with the assistance of liquid-manure or rich compost after cutting, yield several cuttings during the season.

Clover and Grass-seeds, intended for either meadow or permanent pastures, should now be sown; in either cases three or four lbs. of rape to the Irish acre should be sown; it will give shelter to the tender grasses, and afford a nutritious bite to sheep early in the spring, when it should be eaten down.

Wheat, on fallow lands, or after early potatoes, should be sown this month, if the land be sufficiently moist; if not, time must be given for a fall of rain, and the seed committed to the ground, when it is neither too wet nor too dry.

Bere should be sown as early as possible in dry, light, rich soil; it comes in early before the general harvest, and affords a plentiful supply of bread corn for home consumption, at a most critical time, when provisions are both scarce and dear.

Winter Dun Oats have now become one of our best established and most profitable autumn-sown grain crops, and, in many instances, has superseded wheat. It comes in early, is perfectly hardy, and yields abundantly; but it should be sown early, and the soil tolerably dry at the period of sowing, to insure success.

GENESIS AND GEOLOGY; or an Investigation into the Reconciliation of the Modern Doctrines of Geology; with the Declarations of Scripture. By Denis Crofton, B.A. 2s.

"I have taken the responsibility of recommending to the enterprising publishers, whose names appear on the title page, to republish this little work, in its present form, and thus to place it within reach of American Christians, for the following reasons:—First, because I have met with no examination of the connection between 'Geology and Genesis,' so able as this. Other eminent writers, such as Dr. Chalmers, J. Pye Smith, Harris, Buckland, Silliman, Sedgewick and Whewell, have shown great skill in the examination of the Biblical questions connected with geology, but none of them have gone so fully into the argument as Mr. Crofton. Second, because he has opened a track which may be followed further by Biblical students. I mean in the examination of parallel passages of inspiration. Finally, because his course of argument is eminently adapted to satisfy the authorized expounders of God's Word—I mean the Ministers of the Gospel—that there is no collision between 'Genesis and Geology.' Mr. Crofton has made one or two favourable allusions to an earlier production of mine on this same subject, but I cannot suppose that any one will consider so slight a reference to be a reason why I should have formed a high opinion of his work, or why I should not express it.

CAN THE INFALLIBILITY OF THE CHURCH OF ROME BE PROVED FROM ECCLESIASTICAL HISTORY AND THE WRITINGS OF THE EARLY FATHERS?

NO. III.

In our last number we showed that the passage (of Irenæus) on which Roman Catholic divines rely most in proof of the early recognition of the supremacy of the Roman See, does not justify the conclusion which they seek to derive from it; and we promised to adduce in support of our position the authority of Hippolytus, a scholar of Irenæus, and a suffragan bishop of the Roman Church in the beginning of the third century, and who must have been well acquainted with the sentiments of his master and with the general doctrine of the Church at that day.

This Hippolytus, whom the Church of Rome has canonized as a martyr, was Bishop of Portus Romanus, or the Harbour of Rome, at the northern mouth of the Tiber.* He was contemporary with Popes Zephyrinus and Callistus, and suffered martyrdom, in all probability, under Maximin, about A.D. 236.

He was the author of a work, entitled "Philosophumena; or, A Refutation of all Heresies" (Φιλοσοφούμενα ἢ κατὰ πασῶν αἱρέσεων ἔλεγχος). It consisted, when entire, of ten books; of those ten, the second, third, and the beginning of the fourth, do not appear to be now extant. The first has been known for a considerable time, and has hitherto been printed among the works of Origen, to whom it was erroneously attributed; the remaining books (from the fourth to the tenth) were discovered in MS., and brought with several others from the monasteries of Mount Athos, in the year 1842, and were published for the first time in 1851.† The editor, M. Miller, perceived that they were part of the same work of which the first book was already, as we have said, attributed to Origen; and he, accordingly, published them as Origen's. But the Chevalier Bunsen and other eminent scholars have since shown, by most convincing arguments, that the author was not Origen, but Hippolytus.

The importance of this discovery it is hardly possible to overrate. In the sixth and seventh books the author is often treading on the same ground as that traversed by Irenæus in his work on heresies, to whom he expressly acknowledges his obligations, and from whom he frequently transcribes, either verbatim or with some alterations. We have thus in some instances the original Greek of Irenæus restored to us, where we hitherto possessed only the Latin translation: so that the recovery of this work is, to some extent, a recovery of the lost text of Irenæus. But it is with the historical portion of the work—contained in the ninth and tenth books—that we are now chiefly concerned. Here we have a portion of ancient Church history unfolded to us with which, from the lack of materials, our acquaintance has been hitherto most imperfect, and which is of the greatest importance to us, from its relation to certain questions of Christian doctrine and Church discipline which are agitated at the present time.

Let it, then, be borne in mind that the author whose testimony we are about to cite was the scholar of the great Irenæus; one of the suffragan bishops of the Roman Church; one who passed his life at or in the vicinity of Rome; one who was honoured in his day, and has ever since been honoured as one of the leading teachers of the Church; one whom the Church of Rome herself now venerates as a martyr, and commemorates as a saint; one whose statue, discovered 300 years ago, has been received in the Vatican, and placed in the pontifical library, as a mark of honourable distinction.

The testimony of such a man with respect to the Bishop of Rome in those times, must be of the greatest value and interest. Did he look upon him as the supreme head of the universal Church, to whom it was his own duty, as well as that of all other Christians, implicitly to submit? Did he venerate him as the infallible Vicar of Christ? or does he give any intimation that the Bishops of Rome were so regarded by others, or even by themselves? Does he, in short, indicate in any way that claims to supremacy or infallibility were put forth in that age?

Now, in answer to these questions, we learn, from the ninth book, that two Bishops of Rome in succession—Zephyrinus and Callistus—fell into the Noetian heresy. Noetus did not acknowledge the Son of God to be the Logos, or Word, and he denied the distinct personality of the Son, affirming that the Son is the same as the Father, only under a different name. These two Roman bishops, at the very beginning of the third century, lapsed into heresy on a fundamental article of Christian faith. They strenuously maintained that heresy, and propagated by their official authority as Bishops of Rome a doctrine which the Church of Rome herself, with all other Churches of Christendom, now declare to be heretical.

Hence it follows that the Bishops of Rome, in the earliest times of which we have any extant records, erred in matters of faith, and in their official capacity. And, consequently, the infallibility of the Roman See is a doctrine opposed to the truth of history.

What we have just said of the heresy of these two early Popes is remarkable enough; but it is, perhaps, still more surprising to find them enrolled among the saints and martyrs in the public liturgy of the Roman Church. "What a shock," it has been well observed, "must such a discovery give to its faith! How can it place any confidence in the records of the Breviary, or join with heartiness in the prayers tendered there for its use? Thus superstition leads to scepticism, and pious frauds prepare the way for infidelity. And yet one of the so-called reforms for which the Church of Rome is now contending is to make all Churches surrender their own liturgies to the Roman Breviary!"

And if infallibility was not an attribute of the See of Rome in the age of Hippolytus, neither was its supremacy acknowledged. When Zephyrinus and Callistus fell into heresy, and endeavoured to disseminate their false doctrine, Hippolytus resisted them, without appearing to consider himself in the slightest degree bound to conform to them in their doctrine. On the contrary, he boldly stood forth and rebuked them; and thus has given a practical reply to the question which has been raised concerning the meaning of his master, Irenæus, in the passage quoted in our last number. Hippolytus never learnt from Irenæus that every Church and every Christian must conform to the doctrine of the Church of Rome, as such. Let, then, Roman Catholics no longer urge against us the authority of Irenæus. We have in the acts of his scholar, Hippolytus, a commentary upon his words, which speaks too plainly to be misunderstood.

Nor, again, does it appear from the narrative before us, that the Bishops of Rome themselves, in the early part of the third century, entertained any notion that they were supreme Heads of the Church, to whom all other Churches were bound to submit. For though Hippolytus was charged by Zephyrinus and Callistus with being a Ditheist (a believer in two Gods), because he would not confess with them that the Father and the Son are but one Divine Being, under two different names; yet we can discover no intimation that he was accused of heresy on the ground of resisting the Supreme Head of the Church, and rebelling against the Divine authority of Christ's Vicar upon earth.

We are all aware that, according to the theory of the Church of Rome, the official prerogatives of a Pope are quite independent of his moral character. The monster, Alexander VI., the ferocious warrior, Julian II., the voluptuary, Leo X., were, according to that theory, no less infallible than the most pious and virtuous successors of St. Peter. Still it may suggest some thoughts as to the soundness of the theory itself, if we consider for a moment the account given by Hippolytus of the earlier life and character of Pope Callistus,* above mentioned, who, it will be remembered, filled the apostolic chair in the early part of the third century.

Pope Callistus, then, was originally a servant of a certain Carpophorus, a Christian of the Emperor Commodus' household. His master set him up as a banker, intrusting to him a considerable sum of money. Many deposits were lodged in this bank by Christian brethren and widows, upon the strength of the high character which Carpophorus bore. But Callistus turned out a rogue, embezzled the money, became bankrupt, and ran away. Having made his way to the harbour (Portus), about twenty miles from Rome, he found a ship ready to start, and embarked. Carpophorus pursued the defaulter; but when Callistus saw him approaching the ship in a boat, he threw himself overboard, and, being with difficulty saved from drowning, was delivered up to his master, who brought him back to Rome, and confined him in the pistrinum, or domestic treadmill of the Romans. Some time after, certain good-natured persons came to Carpophorus, and begged him to release poor Callistus, who declared that there were outstanding debts due to him, which, if he were at liberty, he could recover. Carpophorus, like a pious man, said that he did not care for his own loss, but that he was anxious about the money of the poor depositors, and, therefore, he consented to set him free. All this was only a pretext on the part of Callistus to regain his liberty. But finding that he was watched, and could not again run away, and having nothing to give his creditors, he resolved upon self-destruction; and, with this view, he entered a synagogue of the Jews, on their Sabbath day, and raised a great uproar. The insulted Israelites did not kill him outright; but, after beating him to their satisfaction, dragged him to the Roman prefect. He sentenced the culprit to be scourged, and then transported him to the mines of Sardinia. Some time after, Marcia, a devout Roman lady, who had influence with the Emperor Commodus, being desirous of doing a good work, sent for Victor, who was then Bishop of Rome, and asked what Christians had been transported to Sardinia. He gave her a list, in which the name of Callistus did not appear, doubtless because the good bishop knew what sort of character he was. Marcia obtained the letter of pardon from the Emperor; whereupon the governor of the island liberated all the Christian prisoners, except poor Callistus. He wept and prayed so hard, however, that the royal messenger prevailed on the governor to release him. When he arrived at Rome, Victor was very much annoyed and perplexed; but, to avoid scandal, held his tongue, and sent him off to Antium, giving him a certain monthly allowance. Here he remained till Victor's death, when Zephyrinus, the successor of Victor, became his patron, and made him his coadjutor, to keep the clergy in order. All went on smoothly till the death of Zephyrinus, when the insolvent banker and quondam runaway slave succeeded to the vacant throne, and signalized his episcopacy by adopting, as we have seen, the Noetian heresy. Such are the antecedents of Pope Callistus, as detailed by Hippolytus in his newly discovered work.

We cannot conclude better than with the following words of the distinguished writer from whom we have derived much of the materials of this article:†—"Great reason have all persons, of whatever nation, for gratitude

* This is the opinion of the most celebrated ecclesiastical historians and divines of the Church of Rome—e.g., Baronius and Bellarmine. Le Moyne's hypothesis, that the Portus Romanus, of which Hippolytus was bishop, was Aden, near the entrance of the Red Sea, is now generally abandoned as untenable.

† The first four books contained an account of the various systems of ancient philosophy—whence the title, "Philosophumena." The next five treat of the various heresies which had appeared in the Church from the apostolic age to Hippolytus's own time—whence the second title above given. The tenth book contains an epitome of the rest.

* Roman Catholic writers have, of course, attempted to deny the identity of Pope Callistus with Callistus the heretic, spoken of by Hippolytus; but of the fact of their identity there can be no reasonable doubt.—Vid. Wordsworth, Hippolytus, p 81, sq.

† Wordsworth, "Hippolytus," p. 219.

to the Almighty God, that he has thus watched over the work of his faithful soldier and servant, the blessed martyr, Hippolytus. We, of the Church of England, may recognise in this treatise a Catholic and Apostolic—yes, and a Roman—vindicator of our own Reformation. Here, a Roman bishop, saint, and martyr, supplies us with a defence of our own religious position with respect to Rome. In his 'Refutation of all Heresies' we see a practical refutation of that great heresy of our own day—the heresy which, either directly or indirectly, is at the root of many prevalent heresies—the heresy of Papal supremacy and Papal infallibility. Whenever, then, we are charged by Romish divines with heresy and schism for not acknowledging the Bishop of Rome as supreme head of the Church and infallible arbiter of the faith, we may henceforth refer them to the marble statue in the Vatican, and bid them consult the treatise of St. Hippolytus. Thankful, however, as we ought to be for this recent discovery, perhaps they who have cause to be most grateful are the clergy and laity of Rome. Truth is to be prized above all things, especially in matters of faith. Arguments from adversaries, real or supposed, and especially from contemporaneous adversaries, are often regarded with suspicion, and rejected with scorn; but here the members of the Church of Rome may read a treatise, written by one whose name they love and venerate, one who has no interests to serve, no passions to gratify—a Bishop, Doctor, Saint, and Martyr of their own Church. He speaks to them from the grave, and from primitive times. May it please the same merciful Providence, which has awakened the voice of Hippolytus from its silence of sixteen centuries, to bless its accents to their souls' health! May it be so blessed from on high, that it may promote the cause of Truth, and the Unity of the Church, and the Glory of Almighty God, now and for evermore

DOES THE WORSHIP OF THE CHURCH OF ROME ANSWER THE TRUE ENDS OF DEVOTION?

THE advocates of the Church of Rome appear to rely much on the assertion that they are a more devout people than those of any other religion; that their practices are more agreeable to the self-denial and mortification recommended in Scripture; that God is more constantly and reverently served among them than among Protestants; and that they take more pains, and are at more cost and trouble in the worship of God, which practically evidences a good, religious mind, and one which must be most secure of God's acceptance.

We doubt not that there are many earnest and conscientious Roman Catholics who sincerely believe that the religion of the heart is not to be found, except within the pale of the Church of Rome; and as our Lord Jesus Christ has himself laid down the criterion of his true followers to be—"By their fruits ye shall know them. Not every one who saith unto me, Lord, Lord, shall enter into the kingdom of heaven, but he that doeth the will of my Father which is in heaven" (Matt. vii. 20, 21) we freely admit that there is no better test of the truth of any religion than its adaptation to produce the fruits of real virtue in those who cordially and consistently embrace it.

Without venturing to prejudge a matter of such vast practical importance, we would remark, that it is not always those who make the loudest profession of religion that are the most devout or consistent in either their feelings or their lives; and that it is one thing for a Church really to advance true devotion and piety to God, and another to appear to do so, by making a great show and noise about it. Sir Edwin Sandys, whose name has already been several times referred to in this journal, has observed, that "the Church of Rome has so contrived its rules and orders, as rather to comply with and fit every temper and inclination, good or bad, than to work any real good effect on any." This observation may seem severe; but whether it be justified by fact and experience we shall presently see when we have examined a little more minutely the frame and constitution of that Church, with a view to discerning whether it be really more fitted for the exciting of true devotion, and leading a good life, than that of the Church to which we belong, and which we believe to be the true Church of Christ and his Apostles.

Before we can apply the test supplied by our Blessed Lord, we must, however, understand what is the meaning of it—what is DOING the will of our Heavenly Father? Performing "good works," says the Church of Rome. We shall discuss this hereafter; but, for argument's sake, let it pass for the present, and let us first inquire what are the good works, the doing of which, it is said, will gain man entrance into the heavenly kingdom?

Most dispassionate men will, we think, agree in the definition that a good work is an action useful to others, inspired by an unselfish feeling. To make a work good, there must be a pure intention as well as a generous action. In judging of other men's actions we always look beyond the mere external conduct to the internal motive which led to it. Have we not always a natural inclination to search into the intentions of those whom we see acting around us? Every one will freely admit, that patriotism inspired by vanity or selfishness is not true patriotism; that devotedness based on ambition for power or personal aggrandizement, is not devotion; liberality instigated by a desire of praise and fame, is not charity.

There are everywhere Pharisees who make long prayers—to be seen of men; who invite to feasts—those who can invite them in return. Patriots who struggle for their country—only until they are in a position to sell and to betray it. Philosophers who worship knowledge—as the high road to the Temple of Fame. Warriors who magnanimously risk their lives—for a coronet or a kingdom. Philanthropists who erect posthumous hospitals—at the expense of their posterity. Alas! how few are there whose motives will bear a close investigation. Let each one study himself, and scrutinize a little into the secret springs of his best actions, and say whether the dismal truth be not the same still that our Blessed Lord proclaimed it to be in His time—"There is none that doeth good; no, not one!"

What are we, then, to think of the self-satisfaction of the thousands, who are trusting to their good works as a sure passport to heaven, but this, that such men take but a superficial view of their own conduct, and give little attention to the motives by which they are actuated, thinking only of the results they produce? What care ordinary men for the purity of the spring, so long as the stream, muddy or clean, fertilizes the land?"

And yet these practical men, as they would be deemed, are not without their show of reason. If the heart be always to be thus searched and analyzed, say they, no one will be sufficient to bear the examination—the best men will be discouraged, and found wanting—and, after all, is not the work the essential matter? What else has the world any concern in? Is it not the work that relieves the wretched? Whether the intention be holy or vain-glorious, the result is the same. In either case, are not the poor and sick relieved and society benefitted? Ought we not, therefore, to applaud the act, and care little for the intention? Thus society connives at setting up a new definition of goodness, and lowers the standard of virtue to include works springing from the impure fountain of vanity and ambition—as if good works, done to be seen of men, could delude God, who searcheth the heart, and in whose sight the very heavens are unclean! Is this doing the will of our Father who is in heaven?

The next step in the downward path of those who look to good works to save them, seems to us to be this—"The law of God strictly enjoins us to constant vigilance over all the acts of our lives—to watch and pray, lest we enter into temptation." We are not to kill, nor injure, nor revenge, nor steal, nor even covet. Surely, such strict vigilance over ourselves, in every act of our lives, is impracticable, and would render life intolerable! Among good works to be done, surely a choice may be made; one may take the place of another. He to whom prayers are irksome may make it up in alms-giving—each may thus accept what he does not dislike, and overlook what is not according to his taste. Thus is a flexible law substituted for the inflexible law of God, and good works made more easy. This is practical step the second in the downward path of those who look to good works for their salvation! Is this doing the will of our Father who is in heaven? or is it not rather doing our own will, who are of the earth—earthy?

We have still to trace the matter further. Having got rid of the trouble of scrutinizing our motives, and allowed ourselves to choose those duties and virtues which are most palatable or easy to us, we still have good works to do, or we cannot be saved by them; and as moral works, even when confined to the mere outward act, are burdensome, and not always easy to be performed, we begin to think that the pain they cause must be acceptable to God, and that the more toilsome they are the more meritorious they must be—suffering is, after all, the essential point. Do we love repose and home?—let us go on laborious pilgrimages. Do we enjoy the indulgences of a well-provided board?—let us mortify ourselves with fasts and abstinences. Bodily pain is repugnant—let us scourge our flesh with voluntary flagellations. Pity, however, that we are in all these matters outdone by the Pagans themselves. Roman Catholic devotees are far exceeded by the idolatrous Indians. The Fakirs, among the Buddists, will stand with their arms stretched out, till their limbs wither. A Roman Catholic devotee will perform his stations round a stone cross upon his knees; but Indian devotees will perform a pilgrimage from one end of Hindostan to the other, prostrating themselves, and measuring the road with the length of their own bodies. The Turkish fast of Ramadan far exceeds, in severity, the fast of Lent in Europe. Perhaps, you think it meritorious to wear hair-cloth next your skin, and use the scourge; but what is that to the worshippers of Juggernaut, who prostrate their bodies to be crushed under their idol's car, and run an iron hook through their ribs, and swing themselves in the air! Here are sufferings, mortifications—shall we say merits? How have these fanatics arrived at this, but by indulging the belief, that physical pain may be substituted for moral works, so as to purchase by suffering the liberty of indulging their passions? Man practically feeling the difficulty of doing works truly good, tries to compound with God by substituting works of suffering! This is practical step the third in the downward path of those who look to good works for their salvation. Is God a demon, taking a savage delight in the misery of his creatures? Is this doing the will of our Father who is in heaven?

Good works of this kind being somewhat too hard for ordinary practical men, means must next be found to mitigate them. Piety must be made easy, or it will soon be out of fashion. Is fasting too severe for you?—a dispensation is ready at hand, if you will only pay for it. Do you dislike abstinence?—you may purchase the privilege of eating meat. Is there any rule so strict in the Church of Rome that it may not be dispensed with, at convenience, for money? To repeat prayers and submit to other penances is irksome; but if you be rich, and a chapel or convent to be built, is there not a means of escape which practical men can easily avail themselves of, and thereby escape the punishment of long prayers? Alas! that prayers should ever have been made so spiritless as to be imposed as a punishment. What a sad view of Christianity! Man prays to God as a punishment—as a punishment he asks God to bless him, and this prayer, instead of a privilege, is made a burden, and Christian men are driven to the task of counting prayers by rosaries, as the Bedouin Arabs in Algeria, or the Muftis at Cairo, who repeat the name of God ten thousand times in an hour, and call that piety. Would it not be as useful to have a thousand rosaries wound off by a steam engine? Is this doing the will of our Father which is in Heaven, or is it a still lower step in the downward path of him who looks to his good works to bring him to Heaven?

One step more, and we have done. There are men who believe they may do their good works by proxy. There are Moslem pilgrims who go to Mecca for other Musselmen. Are there not priests here, too, who say masses for anybody who will pay for them? Does not the Church of Rome boast she has a treasury of the funded merits of the supererogatory good works of the saints, which she will dispense at a small cost to those who need indulgences to make up for their own deficiencies? What is this but good works done by proxy? Alas! is this the way to attain Heaven, by doing the will of our Father who is in Heaven? and can any better proof be wanting that it is actually the truth, and that practical men feel it to be so, that by their own good works they cannot merit heaven or earn salvation?

Do we, then, wish to discountenance good works, or wish such good works to be deemed useless or impracticable? Our readers shall judge in our next; and in the meantime we would earnestly recommend to them the able tracts of Napoleon Roussel, to which we are largely indebted for many of the ideas we have here brought before our readers, and which are full of materials for thought worthy the attention of Irishmen at the present crisis.

THE INDEX PROHIBITUS AND THE INDEX EXPURGATORIUS.

A QUESTION often arises, how far it is just or fair to take books written by individual members of a Church, as proof of the real doctrine and teaching of that Church.

For instance, if we were to produce any very extravagant doctrine from a Roman Catholic writer, and to say that this was the doctrine of the Church of Rome, we would at once be told that this was unfair; that the doctrine in question was only the doctrine of that individual, and not the doctrine of the Church.

We admit that this argument is a very fair one, in a general view; for no man is bound to believe everything that every other person in the same Church with him may choose to believe.

But other circumstances may sometimes make a Church very deeply responsible for what its writers print and publish; and may make it much more difficult for individual members of that Church to free themselves from being involved in the errors published by others.

If individual members say that their Church infallibly provides for universal agreement in doctrine among the teachers and doctors of their Church, then it is not so easy for them to reply that what those teachers and doctors print and publish is only their own opinions and errors, and not the doctrine of their Church.

And if we find a general consent and agreement among a great number of the doctors of that Church, in propagating a particular opinion, then it is still harder to say that it is not the doctrine of that Church.

For instance, in the question about worshipping of images, if we were to quote Azorius, saying—"The image is to be worshipped with the same honour and worship with which we worship those whose image it is,"* and were to say that this is the doctrine of the Church of Rome, we should, of course, be told that we were arguing unfairly; that this was only the opinion of that individual doctor, and that it is not the doctrine of the Church of Rome, and that Roman Catholics do not believe in it.

Now, while we admit that one man is not to be charged with the error of another, if he really does not hold it himself, we are at least entitled to say that the Church of Rome does not succeed in preventing her most famous doctors and teachers falling into most grievous and sinful errors.

And when we show that Azorius himself says of that very doctrine (in the place above referred to)—"This is the constant sentence of the divines;" and when we further show that the great St. Thomas, Alexander of Ales, Bonaventure, Albertus, Richardus, Caprcolus, Cajetan, Coster, Valentia, Vasquez, and many others of the greatest authority in the Church of Rome, say the same thing, it certainly becomes much harder to clear the Church of Rome of approving of this doctrine.

But when we come further to consider the laws and institutions of the Church of Rome, her responsibility for what her authors and doctors print and publish appears to be much greater still.

Alone of all the Churches of the world, the Church of Rome undertakes to examine and decide on the merit of all books in respect of faith and morals, before she permits them to be printed and read. She undertakes not only to forbid the printing and reading of all that are bad, but she undertakes also to correct and amend all that require to be corrected, and then to give them forth with her authority and sanction, as containing nothing injurious to faith or morals.

And when we further find that she has provided tribunals over all the world to accomplish this great work, and that those tribunals are at this day actually at work in performing this task, we do not see how it is possible any longer to maintain that the Church of Rome is not responsible for the doctrines contained in the books which she thus sanctions and approves.

Our readers will see that we have been led to this subject by the letter of Mr. Brian, of Kerry, that appeared in our number for August. Our intention is now to give an historical account of the laws and tribunals of the Church of Rome about THE INDEX; and we shall afterwards go on to show what these tribunals have approved, and what they have condemned; and thus it will appear for what opinions and doctrines the Church of Rome is really responsible.

We find no general law of the Church of Rome concerning the publishing, approbation, or prohibition of books previous to the year 1515. At the fifth Council of Lateran, held in that year, under Pope Leo X., session x. (which is now counted a General Council in the Church of Rome), we find the first decree on the subject.—Labbe and Cossart, vol. xiv., p. 257. This decree mentions the late invention of printing books as the reason for this new step. The decree goes on to declare, that—"For all future times, no one should presume to print, or cause to be printed, any book or other writing, as well in our city (Rome) as in any other state or diocese, unless first diligently examined and approved by subscription under their hands, in the city (Rome), by our Vicar and the Master of our Sacred Palace; but in other states and dioceses by the Bishop, or some other qualified person deputed by him, and by the inquisitor of heretical wickedness, or of the diocese." And the decree goes on to denounce penalties against all who disobey—such as the forfeiture and burning of the books, a heavy fine upon the workmen, excommunication, the penalties of contumacy (no joke in those times), and, lastly, "the indignation of Almighty God, and of his blessed Apostles, Peter and Paul," which the Pope, no doubt, thought he had power to excite against whatever poor printer he pleased.*

This, we believe, was the first law made by the Church of Rome on the subject; but it was not the beginning of the "INDEX," for no LIST was then published of books which were "prohibited," and nothing was said about books to be corrected.

Forty-four years afterwards the first list was published, according to Van Espen (Jus Ecclesiasticum, vol. i., p. 234. Ed. Louvain and Brussels, 1700) in the year 1559, drawn up by the Inquisition at Rome, and sanctioned by the authority of Pope Paul IV. It consisted of three classes—

I. Of those writers, all whose works, upon whatever subject, although not connected with religion, are wholly forbidden; among whom (says Van Espen) the names of some Catholic writers are found.

II. Single works condemned, of writers whose other works are not forbidden.

III. Certain anonymous writings, with all writings published anonymously before the year 1519, to which are added a catalogue of sixty printers, all books published by whom, whatever the author or whatever the language, are forbidden.

It might be Chrysostom, or it might be St. Augustine; but it then became sin to read their writings, if printed by some poor printer that the Pope wished to ruin!

What is important here to be observed, concerning that decree, is this—that, by this decree, not only every bishop was hereby made an officer of the Church of Rome, to determine what books might be suppressed and what prohibited in their diocese, but every chief officer of that dread tribunal, THE INQUISITION, which so long deluged Europe with Christian blood, in every state or diocese in which that office was established. This authority, thus given to them, will be important when we come to consider the proceedings of the Inquisition in this respect.

The next step was taken at the Council of Trent. A committee was appointed (session 18) to consider how the system could be made most effectual. This committee was to report to the council; but as the council came to an end before it had considered the proceedings of the committee, a decree was passed at its last session (25th)—"that whatever was passed by them should be submitted to the Most Holy Roman Pontiff, that it should be concluded and published by his judgment and authority."

In consequence, the TEN RULES OF THE INDEX, together with a corrected list of prohibited books, was submitted to the Pope, and authorized by him. These rules are printed at the end of the Council of Trent, and have since been followed as the laws of the INDEX.

Rule IV. says, that the reading of the Bible by all persons in general does more harm than good; and forbids any one to read the Bible, even in a Catholic translation, without a licence, in writing, from the bishop or inquisitor. Those who read the Bible without this license are declared incapable of receiving absolution for sin until they give up their Bibles. Monks are forbidden to read or to purchase a Bible without a licence from the prelate of the order.

We may observe, by the way, that the title of these rules is, "Regulæ Decem de Libris Prohibitis"—that is, "Ten Rules about Prohibited Books;" and one of these ten, as we have seen, is about the Bible itself.

Rules V., VI., and VIII., provide for correcting and amending books before they are printed; and rule V. provides even for correcting the table of contents and index of a book. We will show afterwards how this power has been used.

Rule VII. forbids all books "which treat of filthy and obscene subjects . . . . except ancient books, written by heathens, which are permitted for the sake of the elegance and fitness of the language!"

Rule X. confirms the law passed at the Lateran Council, which we have given above, both as to the persons who were to examine and approve, and as to the penalties. It gives power to bishops and inquisitors-general to condemn and prohibit even the books permitted by these rules themselves! And the names of all books expurgated or amended are to be sent to the notary of the Sacred Universal Inquisition at Rome, and the approbation of the authorized person is to be printed in the beginning of every book.

The Bull of Pope Pius IV., confirming the INDEX then made, with these TEN RULES prefixed to it, may be seen at the end of the proceedings of the Council of Trent. It is dated March 24, 1564.

Another great tribunal was created for the same purpose, of forbidding, correcting, and approving of books, by a Bull of Sixtus V., in the year 1588. This is called, "The Congregation of the Index." This tribunal consists of a certain number of the cardinals, chosen by the Pope. It has a secretary, and a number of officers called "Consultors," chosen from the religious orders. The duty of these officers is to examine the books given to them, and to report on them. But the decision rests with the cardinals only. This tribunal has not superseded the others; bishops, inquisitors, &c., all have the same powers that they had before in their several districts; but this tribunal has power over all the world.—Van Espen, vol. i., p. 238, &c.

This tribunal is in full operation. Its decrees may be seen, from time to time, in the Tablet, and other newspapers. We copy the following from the Tablet, published on the 20th of August:—

"DECREE.

"Thursday, 21*st day of July*, 1853.

"The Sacred Congregation of the Most Eminent and Reverend Lords Cardinals of the Holy Roman Church, by OUR MOST HOLY LORD, POPE PIUS IX., and the Holy Apostolical See, set over and delegated to the Index of Books of unsound doctrine, and to the proscription, expurgation, and permission of the same in the Universal Christian Republic, held in the Apostolical Quirinal Palace, hath condemned and doth condemn, hath proscribed and doth proscribe, or having elsewhere condemned and proscribed, hath commanded and doth command to be placed on the index of prohibited books, the following works—

[Here follow the names of four books lately published.]

"Therefore, let no one, of what degree or condition soever, presume in future either to publish, or, being published, to vend or retain, in any place, or in any language whatever, the aforesaid condemned and proscribed works; but let them be bound to deliver them to the ordinaries of the places, or to the inquisitors of heretical pravity,* under the penalties enacted in the Index of Prohibited Books.†

"Which being reported to OUR MOST HOLY LORD POPE PIUS IX., by me, the undersigned secretary of the Sacred Congregation, his HOLINESS approved of the decree, and commanded it to be promulgated. In testimony whereof, &c., &c.,

"JEROME CARD DE ANDREA,
"Prefect, Loco ✠ Sigilli.
"F. A. V. MODENA,
"Or. Pr. S. Sad. Congr. a Ser."

Now look at the whole of this vast system.

The Pope's Vicar-general, and the master of his palace have power to prohibit, amend, and sanction, all books printed in the Roman States.

Every bishop has authority to prohibit, amend, and sanction all books printed in his diocese.

Every inquisitor has the same authority in his province or district.

Their lists are to be returned to the Inquisition at Rome.

The CONGREGATION OF THE INDEX has a general power of doing the same "in the Universal Christian Republic."

We are not now inquiring whether it be right that any Church should assume to itself powers so vast, or whether it be possible that such powers can actually be exercised for the real good of religion and knowledge. We are only showing that this vast system is really in existence, and in actual operation in the Church of Rome, for more than 300 years past; in order that all may consider whether the doctrines which, in those 300 years, have never been condemned nor corrected, but always sanctioned and approved by her tribunals, are not fairly and justly to be charged upon the Church of Rome; and whether she be not really hostile to those doctrines which have been expurgated and erased out of books, as the condition of obtaining her sanction and approval and her permission that those books should be published and read.

We propose, in our next number, to show what those tribunals of the Church of Rome have done; what doctrines they have sanctioned, and what they have condemned; and we expect that our readers will look with interest for what is to follow.

IS THE PROTESTANT BIBLE A CORRUPT AND MUTILATED TRANSLATION OF THE HOLY SCRIPTURES?

NO. VI.

WE conclude our comparison of the Douay and Protestant Bibles, with the most important difference between them. There are seven books—Tobit, Judith, Wisdom, Ecclesiasticus, Baruch, and first and second books of Maccabees—about which the two Bibles are at issue. The Council of Trent (decree, ses. 4) pronounces these books "of equal authority with the other books of Scripture," for proving doctrines and reforming morals; and pronounces anathema, or a curse, against all who do not receive them as canonical Scripture. The Church of England and Ireland declares that these books are not canonical, nor to be used for establishing any doctrine.

The question comes to this—were these books written by the inspiration of the Holy Ghost, as the unquestionable books of Scripture were?

If these books were written by inspiration, then the Church of England and Ireland has mutilated the Bible by leaving out those books. If those books were not written by inspiration, then the Church of Rome has corrupted the Bible by putting in those books. We repeat that the question is, "did the authors of those books write them by Divine inspiration?" It must be clear that if the books were not written by inspiration at first, they could never come to be inspired afterwards; either these books were the Word of God from the first, or they are the word of man now. This, truly, is a question well worthy of being examined.

And how are we to examine it? By what evidence are we to decide?

We observe that all the books in dispute are books professing to belong to the Old Testament. Those books profess to have been written, and it is admitted that they were written before the birth of our Saviour.* If those books were then inspired, they were part of the Jewish Scriptures, and the Jews were bound to receive them as such: here, then, we have to inquire "did the Jews acknowledge these books as part of their Scripture? and if they did not, did our Saviour or his apostles reprove or correct the Jews for not receiving those books as Scripture?" This is a question that should certainly be inquired into. If the Jews did receive those books as Scripture, and if our Lord never reproved them for so doing, then we may be sure that those books were really Scripture, and that we ought to count them Scripture now. If, on the contrary, we find it to be certain that the Jews in our Saviour's time did not count these books as Scripture, and that our Saviour never reproved or corrected them for rejecting those books, then we may be equally sure that our Lord did not think that those books were Scripture. And, besides this, we may fairly inquire, "were those books looked on as inspired Scripture in the churches which the apostles founded;" we may be sure that the apostles took care that the churches should be furnished with correct copies of the Old Testament, and that the copies read in the Church in the earliest times were the right copies; and we should, therefore, inquire whether those seven books were acknowledged in the early Church as canonical Scripture.

Our readers will like to know how the facts really stood: and it may be satisfactory to them that we should give them the answer out of Roman Catholic writers of the greatest learning and character. We quote first from Du Pin, a learned doctor of the great Roman Catholic University of the Sorbonne, in Paris. His "History of Ecclesiastical Writers," which was examined and approved by that university, contains a dissertation on these books.—Vol. I., Preliminary Dissertation, sec. 2.

First, he quotes Josephus, a very learned Jewish historian, who lived about our Saviour's time, and who wrote a full history of the Jews, and he gives Josephus's account as follows:—. . . "We only receive and approve of

---

* This law did not pass without opposition. It was opposed in the Council by Alexius, Bishop of Melitanus, who said he was willing to consent as to books published afterwards, but not as to ancient books. Labbe et Coss. vol. xiv., p. 238. When we come to see how some of the Fathers have been dealt with, we may think that Alexius was a far-seeing man.

* We recommend this to the consideration of those who suppose that THE INQUISITION is not now in existence or operation.

† It is said by Van Espen, vol. i., p. 236, xix., that these words refer to the ten rules above mentioned.

* This is admitted of all these books except, perhaps, Wisdom. Some think this book was written by Philo the Jew, who lived about the time of our Saviour.

those prophets who wrote many years ago, according to the pure truth, by the inspiration of the Spirit of God. . . . . : We have only twenty-two books" (Josephus gives the list by which it appears that the seven books now in dispute were not in the list of twenty-two books, which agreed exactly with the Protestant Bible now.)

Du Pin goes on thus.—"Origen, St. Jerome, the author of the abridgment attributed to St. Athanasius, St. Ephiphanius, and several other Christian writers, do testify, that the Jews received but twenty-two books into the canon of their holy volumes."

Again—"The ancient Christians have followed the Jewish canon* in the books of the Old Testament. There are none quoted in the New Testament but those that were received into the canon of the Jews, and the greatest part of these are frequently cited there. The first catalogue of the canonical books made by the ecclesiastical Greek and Latin authors comprehend no more."

Again†—"The first catalogue we find of the books of Scripture among the Christians is that of Melito, Bishop of Sardis (2nd), set down by Eusebius in the fourth book of his history, ch. 26. It is entirely conformable to that of the Jews. . . . Origen (3rd), also, in a certain passage drawn out of the exposition of the first Psalm, reckons twenty-two books of the Old Testament. . . . . The Council of Laodicea (4th), which was the first synod that determined the number of the canonical books; St. Cyril, of Jerusalem (4th), in his fourth catechetic lecture;‡ St. Hilary (4th), in his preface to the Psalms; the last Canon, falsely ascribed to the Apostles (3rd); Amphilochius (4th), cited by Balsamon; Anastasius Sinaita (6th), upon the Hexameron, lib. 7; St. John Damascene (7th), in his fourth book of orthodox faith; the author of the abridgment of Scripture, and of the festival letter attributed to Athanasius; the author of the book of the hierarchy, attributed to St. Dionysius; and the Nicephori; follow the catalogue of Melito. Gregory Nazianzen (4th), is of the same opinion."

He then mentions several others who reckon twenty-four books, which he says St. Jerome accounts for by showing that they reckoned Ruth and Lamentations as separate books; whereas the Jews, in counting twenty-two, included Ruth in Judges, and Lamentations in Jeremiah; so that, in fact, there was no real difference between the list of twenty-two and the list of twenty-four.

Here, then, we see the proofs set down, by a learned, candid, honest, Roman Catholic doctor; and let us remember what is thus proved.

1st. The Jews did not count these seven books inspired Scripture.

2nd. The inspired writers of the New Testament did not quote these seven books; and we know that our Saviour never reproved the Jews for rejecting a part of Scripture, which, no doubt, he would have done if they had deserved it.

3rd. The ancient Christians did not count these books among the inspired Scriptures, seeing that twenty ancient writers and Fathers, who have left us lists, all agree in giving the list as it now stands in the Protestant Bible.

4th. The first Council that settled the list, gave the list of twenty-two books only.

All this Du Pin has candidly proved on the one side. Let us now see what he has to say on the other side.

"The first catalogue of the books of the Holy Scriptures, where they added some books to the Jewish canon, is that of the third Council of Carthage, held in the year 397, when the books of Judith, Tobit, the Wisdom of Solomon, Ecclesiasticus, and the two Books of the Maccabees, were reckoned in the number of the canonical books. . . . . This catalogue of canonical books is confirmed by the authority of Pope Innocent I.§ in an epistle to Exuperius, and by that of a Roman Council, held under Gelasius, in the year 494, and is followed in the decree of Eugenius to the Armenians (15th century), and by the Holy Council of Trent. All these catalogues serve to acquaint us in general what were the books that were always believed to be certainly canonical, and which they are whose authority have been questioned by antiquity; but, nevertheless, we ought to speak of them particularly, for although they were not received in the first ages by all churches, nor reckoned by all authors in the canon of the books of the Bible, yet they were frequently cited by the ancients, and sometimes, too, as books of Scripture, and for this reason were afterwards admitted into the canon along with the first."

Here it is to be observed, that the learned Du Pin does not mention a single Father as having left us a list of the books of Scripture as the Douay Bible has them now. All he can say is, that some of the ancient writers have sometimes quoted one or more of those books, "sometimes, too, as books of Scripture;" which is certainly true. But no Father has left us a list including these books. ALL who have left a list give us the list of the Jews, in which the seven books were not.

Du Pin then goes on to examine each book of the seven by itself, giving us such comments as these—"The Book of Tobit (one of those now in the Douay Bible) is rejected in all the ancient catalogues of the books of the Bible, and not received into the number of the canonical books." "The Book of Judith is not only rejected in all the ancient catalogues of the canonical books, but it is also scarcely mentioned by the ancients," &c., &c. He gives the names of the Fathers and ancient writers who have quoted each of the seven books; and, with great candour, gives us this useful caution, "but it does not follow that all those (who quoted them) acknowledged them for canonical."*

We think it may fairly be said that this evidence in favour of these seven books is reduced almost entirely to the lists given by the Council of Carthage, in the year 397, and the Council under Gelasius, in the year 494. These are the only lists that have come down to us from the ancient Church, that include the seven books in the canon of Scripture.

We will examine these two Councils presently. It will be more convenient to consider first another Roman Catholic writer, of no less learning and ability—viz., Father Calmet, the learned commentator on the Scripture.

In his preface to the Book of Wisdom, one of the seven, he says:—"The Book of Wisdom was not always received by the Church as canonical, as not being admitted into the Jewish canon of Scripture." He thus tries to get over this and other objections:—"To the scruples of those who seeing antiquity wavering upon this point, have found some difficulty to persuade themselves to admit this book into the canon, we oppose the third Council of Carthage, in 397; that of Sardica, in 347; that of Constantinople, in Trullo, in 692; the eleventh of Toledo, in 675; that of Florence, in 1438, and, lastly, the fourth Session of the Council of Trent; all which expressly admitted this book into the class of Holy Scripture."

It may surprise our readers to see how many councils he refers to, where Du Pin only brought forward two besides that of Trent. The reason was, that Calmet, though very learned in other things, knew very little about the councils, while Du Pin knew them well. It often happens that men, only a little acquainted with a subject, will bring forward proofs that a man more learned will not bring forward. So it is here. The canons of the Council of Sardica are manifestly forged; and, even as they stand, they contain no list of the books of Scripture. The Council of Toledo was a little assembly of only 17 bishops, in Spain; the proof from it is only this—"If we attend to that which the Holy Scriptures says of wisdom, 'it is the splendour of eternal light,'" which words are found in the Book of Wisdom. If the other councils, as we shall show, are worth nothing, seventeen bishops, 700 years after Christ, cannot render a book inspired. The Council in Trullo is declared by Labbe and Cossart to be wholly condemned by the Popes (vol. vi., p. 1316)—an awkward authority for a Roman Catholic to bring forward. This Council did nothing but confirm the canons of the Council of Carthage, held in 397. What that was worth, we shall see presently.

The Council of Florence (15th century) said nothing at all about the books of Scripture; Calmet must have been imposed on by a forged decree, pretended to have been passed by it.

There remains of his list, only the Council of Carthage to be considered.

This Council, though not general, is of great authority. But this list of canonical books was evidently not put in by the Council itself, but by some forger in later times. This is quite plain; for the Council was held in the year 397, Cæsarius and Atticus being consuls, as the council itself relates, and yet the canon which contains the list of canonical books refers to Pope Boniface, who was not Pope until 418, or twenty years after!—(See the list of Popes in Labbe and Coss. Con. Gen. vol. xvi., p. 130.) So it is clear this list was made and put in by some one who lived so long after the council, that he had forgotten who was Pope at the time it was held.

There is further proof that this list is forged. The Council of Constantinople, in Trullo, 692, confirmed the canons of this Council of Carthage; but it also confirmed the canons of the Councils of Laodicea, which rejected the apocryphal books.—(Labbe and Coss. vol. vi., p. 1140, can. 2.)

Did those 211 bishops in Trullo mean to confirm both the list as it is in the Protestant Bible and, also as it is in the Douay Bible? That is not very likely; but if there was no list in the Council of Carthage, then those 211 bishops confirmed only the Protestant list in the Council of Laodicea.

This disposes of one of the chief authorities brought forward by Du Pin. His only other one was the council said to have been held by Gelasius, at Rome, in the year 494 (Labbe and Coss. vol. iv., p. 1260.) This council is a manifest forgery, wholly unworthy of credit. It rests altogether on the authority of Isidore Mercator, who lived in the 9th century, and who is now acknowledged by all Roman Catholics of learning to have been the most impudent and audacious forger that the world has ever seen. No writer before his time has mentioned this council or list of Gelasius. There are no authentic records that can be relied on. Some say it was held by Pope Damasus, some by Pope Gelasius, some by Hormisdas. The copies differ so much, that the Roman cardinals, appointed by the Pope to correct the Decretum of Gratian, when they came to a passage quoted from this council, had to say—"it cannot be known which is the pure and true reading."—Note of the Correctors on Dist. xv., c. 3.

This council contains long passages, word for word the same with the decretal epistle of Pope Anacletus, which it is now confessed that this Isidore forged along with about sixty other epistles from the early Popes.—(Compare with Decret. Dist. xxii., c. 2.) This council contains a list of the Patriarchal sees, also exactly agreeing with that forged epistle, making Alexandria the second; which list is directly opposed to the second General Council (Labbe and Coss. vol. ii., p. 948, can. 3), and is not found in any genuine writing of antiquity. The whole thing rests on the credit of that infamous forger. It is enough to have the canon law filled with his forgeries, as we shall show some day that it is; why should we have him corrupting our Bibles too?

Richter, the learned editor of the Canon Law, says of this council—"They are not wanting who consider the whole apocryphal." And well they may, when it is traced to Isidore.—Leipsic Ed., 1839, vol. i., p. 31.

And, after all, it is more than doubtful whether Isidore ever put any list of the canonical books into this council at all. One of the oldest copies in existence (that in the Pope's own library), gives the council without any list of the books of Scripture in it.—Berhard in Canones Gratiani, vol. ii., p. 316. So it would seem the list was put in by some later forger, in still later times!

And now we may see the reason of what Du Pin says about those lists of Gelasius and Carthage—"These definitions have not been followed by all authors and all Churches, until it was at last entirely determined by the Council of Trent." And Calmet says, in that preface to the Book of Wisdom mentioned above—"Some late interpreters, as Lyranus and Cajetan (the cardinal), did not admit it as indisputably canonical."

What! the great question, so all-important to the Church, "What books are really the Word of God to man," not settled in the Church, for 1500 years after Christ!

What could account for this? Hear Father Calmet—"The Church, always cautious and wary in her decisions, did not decree to admit them for canonical till after mature judgment, and long deliberation!" . . . . "Each Church kept to its own tradition, to admit or not to admit books, till the truth was at length discovered!" A plausible reason for the books of the New Testament not being immediately known to all Churches; and yet that list was very early settled. But from whom had the various churches the tradition of the Books of the Old Testament? Was it from the Apostles? If not, from whom has the Church of Rome that tradition now? If it were, how came those traditions to differ?

But we have shown that this tradition in the early Church was always one. We have shown from Du Pin, himself a Roman Catholic—1st, That the Jews acknowledged but two-and-twenty books; 2nd, That the Apostles quoted no book as Scripture but what was in that list; 3rd, That every list that has come down to us, except two (that of Gelasius and Carthage), counts only those same books; and we have shown strong reason to believe that those two lists are forgeries!

The fact now stands out, that there never was in the Christian Church any genuine list of Holy Scripture, which included those seven books now in the Douay Bible, until the Council of Trent drew up that list in 1546!

And then that council solemnly cursed all who reject those seven books! Cursed St. Jerome, cursed St. Cyril, cursed St. Epiphanius, and all that host of Fathers who admitted only the Jewish list! Cursed, in fact, the whole ancient Church of God!

Look at the Douay Bible now, with its seven books, based upon forgery and fraud, and established by cursing the Church of God; compare it with that Bible which still holds to the sacred list of the early Church, and say which Bible has been most faithful in preserving the Word of God pure and unmixed.

WE have seen in the Tablet newspaper, of September 24, a report of what took place in the Revision Court of the City of Dublin on the 20th.

It appears that the Rev. Mr. Keogh, of St. Michael and St. John's Chapel, in the City of Dublin, appeared in court in support of a claim to have the chapel-house registered. When about to give his evidence, Mr. Keogh, "declined to be sworn on the Protestant Testament." Mr. Keogh stated, "that if he took the oath on that version, the act against his own conscience, formed as it was

---

* Canon means the rule or list of the books.

† We add to the name of each author here mentioned the number of the century in which he lived, as far as it can be ascertained.

‡ As a specimen of the testimony of these Fathers, we give the following from the place referred to in St. Cyril of Jerusalem. We choose him because he was Bishop of Jerusalem, and there, at least, we may expect that the true tradition of the Old Testament books, as approved by the Apostles, would be handed down in the Church. "Learn also diligently, and from the Church, which are the books of the Old Testament, and which of the New: and read not I pray any of the apocryphal books." . . . "Read the TWO-AND-TWENTY books of these Scriptures; and have nothing to do with the apocryphal books. Those only study earnestly which we read confidently, even in church. Far wiser than thou, and more devout, were THE APOSTLES and the ancient Bishops, the rulers of the Church, WHO HAVE HANDED DOWN THESE. Thou, therefore, who are a child of the Church, trench not on their sanctions. And of the Old Testament, as hath been said, study the two-and-twenty books; and then, if thou art diligent, strive to remember by name as I repeat them." And then he gives the list of the books.

§ This Pope lived before Pope Boniface. There was another Pope, Zozimus, between them. Now we shall see that the list now in the Council of Carthage was not made until during or after the time of Pope Boniface, and it is not easy to see how Innocent could have confirmed it before it was made. We strongly suspect that this epistle of Innocent is a forgery. It is now confessed by all learned Roman Catholics, that the greater number of the epistles that pass under the names of the early Popes were forged by Isidore Mercator, and we hope to show in a future number, that this letter is no better than the rest.

* It may be mentioned that there is more countenance, in early times, for the Book of Baruch than for any other. But the testimony of St. Jerome is conclusive against it.

at present, would be so base that he might deservedly be deemed unworthy of credit."

In a case of the same kind which lately occurred at Carlow, it appeared that all Roman Catholics do not think as Mr. Keogh does. In that case it was stated, that two Roman Catholic bishops had lately taken their oaths on the very book thus refused by the witness, and that these bishops made no objection at all to it; and the barrister, himself a Roman Catholic, stated that he had carefully compared the two Bibles, and that he saw no reason at all why Roman Catholics should object to be sworn on the Protestant Bible.

For ourselves, we have no wish at all that Roman Catholics should be forced to swear on the Protestant Bible. Notwithstanding the serious errors we have shown in the Douay Bible, we still count it to be the Word of God, although perverted in some places, and dishonoured by the addition of what is not the Word of God. As friends of civil and religious liberty, we are quite willing that Roman Catholics should be allowed to swear on their own Bible, just as Jews are allowed to swear on the Old Testament.

But we think that, on so solemn and important a question, those who come forward, as Mr. Keogh has done, to say, in public court, that it is a base act to swear on the Protestant Bible, may fairly be asked to give the proof of what they say. And if they be Christian men, who have a care for the souls and consciences of others, as well as for their own, we think they ought to be ready and willing to come forward and give the reasons of what they say. We, therefore, invite Mr. Keogh, in a kind and friendly spirit, to come forward and discuss in our pages the respective merits of the Douay and Protestant Bibles. We will send him a copy of this number, and of all the numbers in which our articles on the two Bibles have appeared, and we invite him to come forward and correct anything in what we have said, which he may think that he is able to correct. He may rest assured that he will meet with perfect courtesy and fairness from us, and we trust he will come forward in a manly and straightforward way, and state his objections to the Protestant Bible.

THE CHURCH VISIBLE AND INVISIBLE.

We have been asked our meaning, in speaking of the "Visible Church of Christ," as we did in our last number; is there a visible Church of Christ and also an invisible Church? Has Christ two Churches?

We know of but one Church—the Church of Christ. But though we see that Church, in a manner, in the midst of this world, we see her not as God sees. When we try to think and to believe of that Church as she is in herself, as she appears to his all-seeing eye, we are forced to call the Church invisible, because we cannot see her as he sees. But he has provided means by which we may see her so as is fitting now for mortal eyes, for those who are to walk by faith, and not by sight; and in respect of these means of seeing her, we call her the visible Church of Christ.

We cannot give up this two-fold way of speaking of the one Church of Christ, because we know the truth of that saying of Hooker's—"For lack of diligent observing the difference, first between the Church of God mystical (that is, invisible), and visible: then between the visible, sound, and corrupted—sometimes more, sometimes less—the oversights are neither few nor light that have been committed."—Book iii., ch. 1.

The Church of Christ is one, from his first coming to his coming again. Those now with Christ, those still on earth, and those who are yet to be born, are one Church to him. But our present question is about that part now on earth. Who constitute the Church of Christ on earth, as seen by him, who seeth all things as they truly are?

First, mark the description of that Church, as given by his Spirit. We have a reason for choosing the following passages:—"Thou art all fair, O my love, and there is not a spot in thee" (Canticle, or Song of Solomon, iv. 7); "My spouse is a garden enclosed, a spring shut up, a fountain sealed; thy plants are a paradise of pomegranates"* (verses 12 and 13); "Christ also loved the Church, and delivered himself up for it; that he might sanctify it, cleansing it by the laver of water in the word of life, that he might present it to himself a glorious Church, not having spot, or wrinkle, or any such thing, but that it should be holy and without blemish."—Ephs. v. 25, 26, 27. These passages are selected for this purpose, not by us, but by St. Augustine.

The question is, of whom is this Church really and truly composed? and we turn to St. Augustine for the answer, and he answers thus:—"That number of the just, who are called, according to his purpose, of whom it is said 'The Lord knoweth them that are his; THAT is the garden enclosed, the fountain sealed, the well of living water, the paradise with the fruit of pomegranates."—Contr. Don. lib. 5, c. 27. And, again, "neither do they belong to the Church who appear to be within, and live contrary to Christ—that is, do contrary to the commands of Christ; nor are they to be judged to belong at all to that Church which he cleansed by the laver of water in the word, that he might present it to himself a glorious Church, not having spot, or wrinkle, or any such thing."—Lib. 4, c. 1.

* This was one of the best fruits growing in that country.

It is evident that this must be so. Wicked Popes,* wicked bishops, wicked priests, wicked laymen, are spots in the Church. Of these St. Jude says—"These are spots in your feasts of charity, when they feast with you."—Ep. verse 12. They can be no part of that Church which has no spot, or wrinkle, or any such thing. This, then, is God's view of the Church; he sees it thus: to him it is without spot or wrinkle. This Church is the spouse and the body of Christ; every member of this Church has a living union with Christ and with each other. The Spirit of Christ, proceeding from him, and dwelling in them, is that bond of union. But this inward bond of union, however real in itself (and nothing is more real), is not visible to us, and, therefore, in this respect, we call Christ's Church invisible.

Christ might have done no more than unite a multitude of individuals to himself by his own Spirit dwelling in each; and this would have been a real Body of Christ, known to Him; but to mortal eyes it would have been only an invisible Church.

But Christ has also formed those who believe in him into a visible society or fellowship, bound together by visible signs, and uniting in an outward profession of his faith. This is that "fellowship of the Apostles" in which all were required to join who believed in Christ.—Acts ii. 41, 42. And Christ has furnished this visible society which he instituted, with visible institutions, with orders of ministers, appointed and commissioned by him; for, "when he ascended upon high, he led captivity captive, and gave gifts unto men. . . . . He gave some apostles, and some prophets, and some evangelists, and some pastors and teachers" (Ephes. iv. 8 and 11). Not all these gifts to all men, but some to all; for these are abiding gifts till the Body of Christ, that is, his true and living Church, shall come to perfection (verse 13.)

And for this unity of the visible society or fellowship Christ prayed (St. John's Gospel, xvii. 21), in that same night in which he was betrayed, "that they all may be one; as thou, Father, art in me, and I in thee, that they also may be one in us." His prayer included a visible unity that the unbelieving world could see, for the object was, "that the world may believe that thou hast sent me."

And St. Paul left a standing rule for preserving that outward unity, when he said, "I beseech you, brethren, mark them which cause divisions and offences, contrary to the doctrine which ye have learned, and avoid them." (Rom. xvi. 17.)

Thus Christ gave an outward and visible form to that mystical and invisible body, which is his Church; thus he made that Church visible to us.

Hooker has well observed of the mystical or invisible Church—"Whatever we read in Scripture concerning the endless love and the saving mercy which God showeth towards his Church, the only proper subject thereof is this Church." He has well observed, too—"Even so on the other side, when we read of any duty which the Church of God is bound unto, the Church which this doth concern is a sensibly known company. And this visible Church in like sort is but one, continued from the first beginning of the world to the last end. . . . . God hath ever had, and ever shall have, some Church visible upon earth."—Book 3, c. 1.

We should consider the Church in both respects, that we may understand alike God's promises to his Church, and our duties concerning it; and we should carefully mark this difference between the Church as she is in the sight of God, and the Church as she is visible to man. As we see her, she has spots; as God sees her, she has none. She is all fair in herself, but she may appear with much foulness to us; for Christ has not chosen to make the outward fellowship perfectly answerable to the mystical Church or Body.

Writing for our Roman Catholic brethren, we may state this more boldly in the words of St. Augustine than in our own. Speaking of the visible Church, he says—"There are also within enemies of God, and those whose breasts the spirit of Antichrist possesses; and yet these bear spiritual and divine offices: . . . . within as well as without such are found; however, the separation of those who are within, from the perfection and unity of that love not only God knows in some, but even man in some."—De Bass., lib. 4, c. 7.

The visible form which Christ has chosen to give to his Church, is thus imperfect, in seeming to enclose multitudes who are not really members of that Church which is the spouse and body of Christ. For, as St. Paul says, "If any man have not the Spirit of Christ, he is none of his."—Rom. viii. 9.

And this outward and visible form in which the Church appears to us, is still further imperfect in this, that it does not always enclose, or appear to enclose, all those who are members of the living Body. So St. Augustine says, in speaking of that number of the elect who truly constitute the Church—"There are some of that number who as yet are living wickedly, and are lying even in heresies, or in the superstitions of the Gentiles; and yet even there the Lord knoweth them that are his; for, in that unspeakable foreknowledge of God, many who seem to be without are indeed within, and many who seem to be within are without. Of all those, therefore, who, so to speak, inwardly and hiddenly are within, consists that garden enclosed, that fountain sealed, that well of living water."†

The comprehensive character of the Invisible Church—that is, of the Spouse and body of Christ—as she appears in the sight of God, is still farther shown in St. Augustine's doctrine, that even schismatics, in respect of those things in which they do not separate, do still remain in connection with the Church,‡ which opinion Archbishop Bramhall adopts.—Vol. ii., p. 80, 8vo.

What St. Augustine says of heretics (Ep. 162) is also well applied by Bramhall to schismatics, who says—"It is much more true of schism, that he who is involved in schism through the error of his parents or predecessors, who seeketh carefully for the truth, and is prepared in his mind to embrace it whensoever he finds it, is not to be rejected as schismatic. This very bond of unity and preparation of his mind to peace, is an implicit renunciation and abjuration of his schism before God."—Vol. ii., page 891, 8vo.

That this preparation of the heart towards peace does really belong to the mystical body, is thus said by St. Augustine, speaking of the song of the angels (Luke, ch. ii., v. 14), "Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace to men of good will," which he says would not have been sung by angels at the birth of Christ, "unless God wishes this to be understood, that they are in the unity of the body of Christ who are in the peace of Christ; but they are in the peace of Christ who are of good will."—De Bapt., lib. 4, c. 7.

In all these respects, then, while we reverence the outward and visible communion of Christ, as ordained and founded by Christ himself, and most solemnly binding on all to whom the knowledge of it is given, we see how imperfect that outward communion is, as representing the Spouse and Body of Christ, as she really is in herself, and in the sight of God. We do not therefore despise that communion; we reverence it, such as Christ appointed it to be, for we know that he would have it as a net, which catches both bad fish and good (Matt. ch. 13, v. 47 & 48). But we regard it such as he made it, not such as men pretend it to be; and we seek to impress on ourselves and others one more quotation from St. Augustine—"Certainly it is manifest that which is said, 'within and without the Church,' is to be considered in respect of the heart, not of the body" (Contra Don. lib. 5, c. 27). To be living members of Christ, united to him by his spirit dwelling in our hearts and working in them, this, and nothing less, is to be truly members of the Church of Christ.

Now, we ask our Roman Catholic readers to consider sincerely if, as St. Augustine everywhere teaches, the outward and visible form of the Church, which we see with our eyes, is so far from being a perfect form of the true and living Church, which is the body and spouse of Christ; and if, as the same St. Augustine teaches, the promises of endless mercy do belong only to the living Church, what confusion and error must arise from insisting on applying all those promises to the outward and visible Church? Yet this is what Roman Catholics are constantly doing, whenever they are desirous to prove the infallibility of their Church from Scripture.

And if the Church visible be thus imperfect, by containing a vast multitude of wicked men, who have not the Spirit of Christ in their hearts, who are not really members of the Church as God sees her; and if this multitude of the wicked may be greater or less in proportion to the sound part, and may fill her ministry and orders in greater or less proportion; then the visible Church may be more or less corrupt, at different times and different places, on that account. And though the visible representation and form of the pure and spotless Church may be thus obscured to a great extent, yet, since Christ intended that evil should be allowed to mingle, more or less, in the visible Church, we cannot, on that account, deny that he has a visible Church on earth.

We earnestly invite the attention of Roman Catholics to the foregoing statement of St. Augustine's doctrine respecting the Church; and we ask them if they can pretend to say that their visible Church, as it exists at this day, is without spot, or wrinkle, or blemish, or any such thing? Are there none in it, laymen, priests, and bishops, who are "spots and blemishes?"

* Father Paul quotes Hieronius, saying, of certain ages, "those times produced not Popes, but monsters!"—Treatise on Eccl. Gov., p. 62.

† When it was objected to Archbishop Bramhall, that St. Augustine said, "the elect before they are converted do belong invisibly to the Church," he replied—"Yes, and before they were born also."—Works, vol. i., p. 78, 8vo.

TALK OF THE ROAD.—No. XVII.

Well, Pat and Jem were digging Mr. Nolty's potatoes, and it was a sorrowful sight to see, for half the potatoes, and more, were bad; and every one looked sad and sorry, and the poor fellows had hardly the heart to dig. And Pat and Jem had two ridges next each other; and they talked a little betimes.

"Well, Jem," said Pat, "it's not like praty-digging in old times, when praty-digging was pleasant; when every man seen his work just done for that year, and enough before him for the winter."

"Aye, Pat," said Jem, "and a bit of a fire at the rig's end, with the childer roasting the praties in the ashes; but I doubt we will never see that again."

"I wonder how it came at all, or what came on the praties at all, at all," said Pat. "Sure there was praties long enough, and never no disease in them; I wonder how it comes at all."

"One thing's plain enough, Pat," said Jem, "it was God done it Himself, or let it be done, surely; but still I'm wondering why he let it come upon poor creatures?"

"I wonder would the Bible tell us anything about it," said Pat; "I mind now reading about famines, and the Bible allowed it was God sent them, and I'm thinking it allowed, too, it was for the wickedness of the country he sent them."

"Well, sure, that's like enough," said Jem, "and we'll have a look for that same when the work's done."

Well, they could not talk a great deal, because they were so busy; but they had a word now and again. And, when they were going home,

"I wonder," said Pat, "what Father John makes it out to be for?"

"Well, I'll tell you that," said Jem, "for a man that was in chapel on Sunday told me; he said Father John allowed it was the readers done it; for that the readers was come out of the towns of Sodom and Gomorra, in England, that is the wickedest places at all; and that people coming out of them towns here is enough to bring down the vengeance of God upon Ireland entirely; and it was that done it all on the praties, by Father John's account; and, deed, as I heard, he said enough to make the people put the readers out of Ireland entirely, and out of the world too, if they only believed the half what Father John told them."

"And I wonder," said Pat, "does Father John think that Sodom and Gomorra is in England? Don't I know them places is in the Bible, and not in England? But it's little Father John minds what he says, when he thinks the people knows nothing about it. But how did the praty disease come seven or eight years ago, when there was no readers here at all, and no one thinking about the Bible? Sure, didn't all the stir about the Bible begin after the praties got bad? and how would the readers bring it afore they came themselves?"

"Well, I'm thinking," said Jem, "Father John's reason is as bad as his cure; sure, didn't Mr. Smith get a mass said for his praties one time, and it's little the better they were of it; and didn't I go to Father John the first year myself, like the fool I was then, and didn't he give me holy water to put round the heaps for a cure, and didn't every praty in it turn bad on me? and why would his reason be better than his cure?"

"Aye, and don't I mind the second year," said Pat, "when all the country was going to the Blessed Priest* up in Tullybricken, that was put out of his parish by the bishop for bad living, for blessed salt to put on their praties at setting time (and the nice little living he made for himself out of the poor creatures with his blessed salt), and didn't they all turn out one worse nor another? and after that it's little I mind what the priests say about the praty rot. Sure, it's plain enough that the Lord doesn't let on to them what he's going to do, and why would we look to them for the reason of it?"

"Well, Pat," said Jem, "I'm thinking if any reason is to be got for it all, it's in the Bible we will get it. And, sure, don't we know that nothing but God's own Word can tell beforehand what He is going to do, or the reason of anything that it pleases him to do? and them that does'nt stick to his Word, nor doesn't want the people to see it, sure, it's not them we ought to look to to know what He does, or what He means."

Well, as they were walking along, they fell in with the Rev. Mr. Owens; and when they had bid the time of day, Mr. Owens asked what they were doing; and they said, digging Mr. Nulty's potatoes; so Mr. Owens asked, how the potatoes turned out; and then, says Pat,

"Why, your reverence, the praties are bad entirely under every clod you turn up."

"Aye," said Mr. Owens, "did you never read anything like that in the Bible?"

"No, your reverence," said Jem, "but we were just wondering would it be there."

So Mr. Owens took out his Bible, and read, "Is not the meat cut off before our eyes, yea, joy and gladness from the house of our God: the seed is rotten under their clods."—Joel i. 16, 17.

"And, your reverence," said Jem, "will you tell us why God does the like at all, for sure it be to be Him that does it."

"That's true, certainly," said Mr. Owens; "for the Scripture says, 'The Lord hath called for a famine, and it shall come on the land seven years.'"—2 Kings viii. 1.

"And does the Bible tell us anything about the reason of it, your reverence?" said Jem.

"Surely it does," says Mr. Owens; "listen to this;" so Mr. Owens read, "Shall there be evil in a city and the Lord hath not done it?† Surely the Lord will do nothing but He revealeth His secret unto His servants the prophets."—Amos iii. 6, 7.

"Well, your reverence," said Pat, "that's just it, we want to know the secret of it. Is it for the wickedness of the people that God does it all?"

"That is the reason that God's Word gives," said Mr. Owens; "listen to this—'Alas, for all the evil abominations of the house of Israel! for they shall fall by the sword, by the famine, and by the pestilence; then shall ye know that I am the Lord.'"—Ezekiel vi. 11, 13.

"And what sort of sins is it for? your reverence," said Pat.

"For all sins, and for all turning away from God," said Mr. Owens; "but there are some sins that are specially marked. In the next chapter we read—'Make a chain, for the land is full of bloody crimes' (ch. vii. 23;) and in ch. xxxiii. 25—'Ye shed blood, and shall ye possess the land?'"

"Well," said Pat, "if it wasn't on the road, forment that very field that Mr. Browne, the agent, was shot about land, and the people all working in that very field, and looking on, and not one of them would tell which way the men went that did it!"

"Yes," said Mr. Owens, "the people were banded together then to shed innocent blood for the possession of the land, and God has scattered them off the land since. That is a sin that cries to God against a land; and so does forgetting God, and turning away from the knowledge of his holy word and will."

"And does your reverence think it was all for the sins of the Catholics?" said Jem.

"Indeed, I do not, Jem," said Mr. Owens; "we have all had our sins and our forgetfulness of God and of His word, and His dealings are meant for us all."

"But, your reverence," said Pat, "there's one thing that puzzles me still. When God sent the curse on the praties didn't he hurt them that loved and served him, as well as them that turned away from him? and wouldn't that be enough to make them turn away from him too? sure your reverence's praties were as bad as Father John's, every bit," said Pat, scratching his head.

"We never understand any of God's dealings rightly," said Mr. Owens; "until we learn to understand his love and goodness first. 'He doth not willingly afflict or grieve the children of men.'—(Lamentations iii. 33.) The Prophet Joel, who spoke of the seed being rotten under the clods has showed us that, even to the wicked, God's vengeance is sent in mercy; just listen to this—'Therefore, also, now saith the Lord, turn ye even to me with all your heart, and with fasting, and with weeping, and with mourning; and rend your hearts and not your garments, and turn unto the Lord your God; for He is gracious and merciful, slow to anger, and of great kindness, and repenteth Him of the evil.'—(Joel ii. 12, 13.) Did you ever read our Saviour's parable of the Prodigal Son, in St. Luke's Gospel?" said Mr. Owens, turning to Pat.

"I did, your reverence," said Pat.

"And what brought him back to his father?" said Mr. Owens.

"It was the famine, your reverence, I mind that well," said Pat. (See St. Luke's Gospel, xv. 14, &c.)

"And there has been a worse famine in Ireland than any we have been talking about," said Mr. Owens; "a famine that makes souls perish; 'not a famine of bread, nor a thirst for water, but of hearing the words of the Lord.'—(Amos viii. 11.) And, don't you see, Pat, that since God sent the disease on the potatoes, He is bringing the people to seek for the Word of God; isn't that using the potatoe famine to drive out a worse famine?"

"That's truth, your reverence," said Jem.

"And don't you be afraid," said Mr. Owens, turning to Pat again, "that those that knew and served God will turn away because he sends them trials; if God means judgment in mercy to them that forget Him, much more to them that know Him; 'whom the Lord loveth He chasteneth,' and He tells them that to comfort them.—(Hebrews xii. 6.) And then they can say with St. Paul, 'who shall separate us from the love of Christ? Shall tribulation, or distress, or persecution, or FAMINE, or nakedness, or peril, or sword? . . . In all these things, we are more than conquerors through Him that loved us.'"

So then they were come to where Mr. Owens must leave them to go his way, and he was bidding them good night kindly; and Pat stopped him for a minute, saying—

"One thing more," your reverence, "is Sodom and Gomorra in England, for Father John allows it is?"

So Mr. Owens said, "St. Peter tells us that the Sodom and Gomorra that God destroyed by fire from heaven were meant 'for an example to those that after should live ungodly;' and so wherever there are ungodly men, there is the spiritual Sodom. But if Father John meant that wherever the Bible is read, there is Sodom and Gomorra, you may judge for yourselves of that. But if Father John was wise, he would not talk so much of Sodom and Gomorra being in England, for fear we should show him, out of the Douay Bible, that Babylon is in Rome."*

So Mr. Owens bid them good night again, and the boys went home for that night, talking by the road of Mr. Owens and Father John.

* Our readers may have observed that, in Ireland, a Blessed Priest—that is, a priest who pretends to the power of working miracles—is almost always one who has been put out of his parish for immoral conduct; perhaps because he has no other way of living, and such a one has no scruple at living by lies. But these Blessed Priests are much fewer in the country than they used to be; perhaps because the people are getting more sense.

† "Which the Lord hath done?' (Douay Bible). The meaning is that all judgment is from God. The note on this verse in the Douay Bible is a good one; "He speaks of the evil of punishments of war, famine, pestilence, desolation, &c., but not of the evil of sin, of which God is not the author."

* If the reader will look at the preface to St. Peter's 1st Epistle in the Douay Bible, he will read this: "He wrote it at Rome, which figuratively he calls Babylon;" alluding to ch. v., 13.

We would request our valued correspondents, both Roman Catholics and Protestants, to limit the length of their communications, and not to discuss a variety of distinct topics in one letter.

Contributors of £1 per annum will be furnished with six copies, any of which will be forwarded, as directed, to nominees of the subscriber. The Catholic Layman.

DUBLIN, OCTOBER, 1853.

THE unexampled success of our attempt to establish in this country a periodical devoted to the investigation of religious truth, in a candid and Christian spirit, has, from time to time, roused among the opponents of free inquiry, lay and clerical, an amount of irritation, which our English neighbours may find it difficult to understand; but which we, who have a better opportunity of studying the various phases of Irish character, are able to appreciate without difficulty.

The era, indeed, has passed away when men of excitable and, perhaps, ferocious habits, among the higher classes of society in Ireland, were ever ready to avenge a slight or an insult, real or imaginary, by an appeal to the sword or the pistol; and when such weapons were generally kept at inns, for the accommodation of gentlemen travellers, who might think proper to order "pistols for two, and breakfast for one," meaning, of course, the survivor after the morning's amusement; and when it was no unusual thing for two opposite counsel to fall out in court in discussing a legal point, and retire into a neighbouring field to settle it with pistols, and then return as if nothing had happened, to resume their business in a more peaceable manner, finding the bench, jury, and spectators (who well understood the cause of their absence) quietly waiting to hear which of them was killed. The days, indeed, have happily passed away when five practising barristers might have been daily seen in the Hall of the Four Courts, each of whom had "killed his man." But we were scarcely sanguine enough to suppose, as our wiser and sober-minded English friends might be disposed to do, that with the age of the "Fighting Fitzgeralds" and "Bully Egans," the lowest order of Irish minds had ceased to be excitable, or that the age of calm reasoning and dispassionate fair play, should at once have universally succeeded to that of passionate ferocity, and lawless barbarism.

The progress of education in Ireland has, indeed, wrought wonders within our own experience, but for which the success of such a paper as ours would, we well know, have been impossible; and we cannot but feel a hope for our beloved country, when we peruse not only the able and temperate letters of respected Roman Catholic correspondents, published in our pages, but the vastly more extensive private communications from every part of this kingdom, warmly acknowledging the fairness and ability with which we have handled so many important subjects of a controversial character, and adopting almost in words the very sentiment with which we commenced our labours,* that "if the members of the Church of England and Ireland are ever to be reconciled to the Church of Rome, or those of the Church of Rome to the Church of England, it must be effected by other means, than by exciting men's passions against one another."

We have been so little accustomed to boast of our achievements, that probably it may startle some of our subscribers to hear, that so large has been the demand for our periodical, among both Protestants and Roman Catholics, that, though not yet quite two years in existence, our present issue amounts to the considerable number of 10,000 copies monthly, with every prospect of increasing circulation, in both England and Ireland.

This fact, it appears, has not only become known to those watchful guardians of the public faith, the Roman Catholic clergy (who never fail to acquaint themselves as to such matters with a vigilance which does them credit, so long as it is exercised in a legitimate way); but has at last been trumpeted forth by a portion of the press, with an excitement and an amount of vituperation, which would be in the highest degree amusing, if it were not a sad thing to contemplate any public journal, however small its circulation or weak its influence, abusing its power by, inasmuch as in it lies, exciting its readers to violence and crime.

We have now before us a copy of a local journal in which, after a tissue of abuse, which we shall not condescend to transcribe, the editor concludes as follows :—

"The funds for the gratuitous distribution of the LAYMAN come from the Exeter Hall Treasury. Copies of it have been sent to every police station in Ireland, and above 130,000 copies have been already circulated through the country, at an expense which it is really melancholy to contemplate.

"Such doings should not be allowed to go on. A stop must be put to them at once, and, as the most effective way, we would suggest the following simple one—

"Let every Catholic knock down the first man that puts into his hand a number of this vile periodical—for by doing so he gives him a deliberate insult and provocation, quite sufficient to justify a man in committing a breach of the peace."

We pass by the assertion about the Exeter Hall Treasury, of the existence of which we were previously ignorant; as, also, the assertion, that copies have been sent to every police station—as we know not on what authority our cotemporary makes such a statement, though we heartily desire that it may be true—and come at once to the admirable and simple, but perhaps somewhat ludicrous, plan of extinguishing the CATHOLIC LAYMAN, which our editorial opponent considers the most effective one.

"Let every Catholic knock down the first man that puts into his hand a number of this vile periodical! for by doing so he gives him a deliberate insult and provocation, quite sufficient to justify a man in committing a breach of the peace!"

We intend to enable our editorial friend (who appears to be as sensitive to insult, as any of the worthies of half a century ago), to begin his practice at this simple species of knock-down arguments, by presenting him with a copy of this number, through her Majesty's post, free of all charge, leaving it to the petty sessions at Limerick, or elsewhere, to settle the point of law, whether knocking down the post-man be a justifiable means of punishing the letter-carrier for not having opened and read, on his way from the post-office, all the newspapers addressed to the irascible editor, and ascertained accurately whether there were or not contained in any of them such a deliberate insult and provocation as would justify a man (editor or not) in committing a breach of the peace! As, however, we have no serious expectation that this summary method of extinguishing our journal is likely to be brought into active operation, much less before the judicial bench, we would add one word of serious consolation, to soothe the irritated feelings of our susceptible cotemporary.

The CATHOLIC LAYMAN has now been in existence for nearly two years. He asserts that 130,000 copies have been already circulated. If its articles have been, as he also asserts, "so meaningless and without point, that they could neither make a Protestant a whit more steadfast in his faith, nor leave a doubt in the mind of any Catholic as to the truth of the religion he professes;" if the subject be, indeed, "such as no one but a mad fanatic would give a straw for reading;" and its columns "filled with nothing but the most stupid misrepresentations and lying calumnies of Catholicity and its priesthood," Roman Catholics would, no doubt, feel it as an insult that such a paper should be offered to them, without being instigated so to do by the pugilistic editor who has so tardily come forward to vindicate the honour of Irish Roman Catholics, and he may rest satisfied that not a single number of such "a vile periodical" as he describes, would ever be read by one of them.

We fear, however, that the anger of our combative friend, who is really doing his best to effect for us, what we have ever shrunk from doing for ourselves—viz., puff us into notoriety, and increase the desire to read our "fanatical effusions," is really attributable to another cause, and it is simply this. He knows we have been and are eagerly read by all intelligent Roman Catholics (and there are thousands of them in Ireland) who wish to hear both sides, and judge for themselves, and he and the class to which he belongs are extremely angry, not with us who provide, but with those who read anything but what the Roman Catholic priesthood thinks proper to approve of. If our pages were returned or destroyed without being read, can our readers doubt that the editorial wrath would melt away into a chuckle of delight, at the waste of the money of the supposed "Exeter Hall Treasury," which might otherwise have gone to the support of those whom he would brand as apostates, and who have so little regard for the truths in which they have been educated, as to "sell their souls" for a mess of pottage, the much-abused "soupers" of Kerry and "jumpers" of Connemara. It is the sad fact, that the age is gone by, in which Irishmen could be insane enough to mistake friendship for insult, and calm reasoning for fanatical animosity, which rouses the spleen of an adversary whom we do not even name, but would willingly bring to a better frame of mind, were it in the power of reasoning and Christian charity to do so.

That our English friends may not, however, conceive that it is all plain sailing with us in Ireland, we must at the same time enlighten them, and gratify a correspondent, by printing, without a single comment, a letter just received from a person who subscribes himself James Willson, Skibbereen, merely adding that we are ignorant whether or not there be such a person, or whether the signature be an assumed one.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

Skibbereen.

SIR—For the first time in my life your accursed journal, yclept CATHOLIC LAYMAN, came across me—sent, I suppose, by some firebrand fanatic, for the purpose, it seems, of Protestantising, infidelising, uncatholicising, or anything-ising me. I assure you, sir, that your hell-born efforts, aided by the powers of darkness, and the exchequer of heretical England, will never be able to estrange the Irish from the ancient faith. You may as well give up the unhallowed work of belieing our creed; it has withstood the attacks of all schismatics, heretics, &c., since the dawn of its establishment; and it now safely defies, and will till the consummation of time, all attempts of wicked, alien governments—all attempts of hired, vile, mean, mercenaries to shake or outroot it.

No wonder that an undying animosity should eternally exist between Catholic and Protestant, when such fiendish appliances are laid hold of by you and your well-paid "Priest Protection Society," to disseminate nothing but lies and blasphemies beyond the conception of man.

Your writings, let me tell you, are a tissue of the grossest, the basest, and the most unprincipled, unscrupulous, effrontery. There is not a scintilla of charity blended in them throughout; if there was, Catholics would listen to, and respect them; but when your LAYMEN are, from first to last, one diabolical onslaught against Christianity, Pope, and Popery—one eternal tirade of misrepresentation, lies, infamy, and slander—can you expect other than that Catholics will burn your infamous, hellish productions, and not let them pollute their dwellings? What a plausible story comes out in your last vomit about a country station and Father John! Ah! Satan himself could not produce, if he had the power (but he certainly suggested it) a more iniquitous, shameless, conglomeration of lies. I may safely say, and not without reason, that your society are in uninterrupted communication with that boy. You and they show it. Noscitur ex sociis. Depend upon it, and take it upon my ipse dixit, tho' a laic, that a just Judge will one day arraign you before his unerring tribunal for the scandal you now show those little ones, of which Christ speaks. But you have the cheek to call upon Catholic bishops and priests to prove the "boasted infallibility of their Church." With sovereign contempt they treat your challenge. You admit your Church's fallibility; therefore, she is not the Church Christ promised to be with till the end of time; and hence, by reason of her avowed fallibility, she has within her, Atheists, denying God the Father; Deists, denying God the Son; Methodists, denying the Queen's supremacy; Calvinists, asserting that murders, perjury, &c., are all God's decrees; Unitarians, denying Christ's Divinity; Presbyterians, who would fain annihilate the Church of England; and, among innumerable other sects Ghorams,† denying baptismal regeneration. Are not these the fruits of liberty of conscience, and private interpretation of the Holy Scriptures? Seven-hundred-and-fifty sects of Protestantism have been enumerated. Is this a mark of unity? Assuredly not; and not having this mark, the Holy Ghost, the Paraclete, cannot be expected to govern your Church through the mouths of her bishops. You must admit (for Protestant history cannot deny it) that, unless you wish to add another flagrant lie to the black catalogue already uttered by you, and which you will continue to utter no doubt, the murderous, the adulterous, the incestuous King Henry VIII., was the founder of your iniquitous, perjuring, anti-christian, bloated, mammon Church. Who was Luther, but an envious, a proud friar? And pride and envy were the cause of his apostacy. No sooner did he fall, than he broke his vow of chastity, and induced a nun to fall with him, and do the same: so Luther and his paramour lived and died in fornication. These were holy founders, and the faith, or, rather heresy, they spread is holy too. Yes; so holy that Luther is placed next to Christ and St. Paul. The Saviour of mankind, the Apostle of the Gentiles, and Luther—the firebrand of hell, the arch-heretic, the Apostle of Protestant, revolutionising England—put in juxta-position, would make the very Mahometans blush! But your lies are the most unblushing and barefaced. By lies and money you propagate your tottering Church. By calumniating Popes, Popery, bishops, priests, monks, nuns, the confessional—in fact, anything Catholic—all Christianity, you keep from utter annihilation the most damnable heresies, blasphemies, and abominations ever broached, spoken, or practised by men.

Whilst you pour forth such ribald denunciations against our holy religion, we cannot characterise you anything less than demons—actually devils in human shapes; for Satan, if he were to walk amongst us, could not abuse us more—could not more turn into ridicule the ceremonies of our holy religion than you do and England's hireling press. I shall take another opportunity to address you. In the meantime I hope you will favour me with a reply, if you do not let this appear in your next issue.

Having thus for once gratified our correspondent by inserting at length a letter not quite in accordance with the spirit and tone of our paper, we shall only express a hope that his next communication may be written in a somewhat milder spirit, in which case we shall be happy to give him, as we have so often given others, the best reply in our power.

We regret to add, that an able letter, written in an unexceptionable spirit, in defence of the Infallibility of the Church of Rome, reached us too late for insertion in our present number—but will cheerfully be inserted in our next.

WHAT COUNCILS ARE GENERAL AND INFALLIBLE.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

SIR—In your number of the CATHOLIC LAYMAN, for June, 1852, you published a short letter from me, in which I asked what authority could be produced from the Fathers of the first three centuries for Purgatory. I have since read with interest several letters and articles on the subject in your paper; and, I must say, that I am satisfied with the result, that there is no proof of Purgatory to be found in the first three hundred years of the Church. And I cannot but think that if any such proof were to be found, it would have been brought forward by some of your correspondents.

My present wish is to ask another question, which I hope you will settle for me as plainly. In the creed of Pope Pius IV., which the Church of Rome requires every one to believe, as "the Catholic Faith," I find the following:—"I also, without doubt, receive and profess all other things delivered, defined, and declared by the sacred canons and œcumenical councils." Now, sir, I am a plain man, who asks plain questions, and expects plain answers; and I want to know what councils does the Church of Rome consider œcumenical or general (for, I suppose, they both mean the same); and where will I find the list of œcumenical councils in which I am to believe?

Now, my reason for asking is this—it is a common saying, that the man who buys a pig in a bag is a fool for his pains; and I think that is right. Would any of your readers, who deals in pigs, be content, in a fair or a market, to buy a pig tied up in a sack, the way he could neither see nor feel it, nor know whether it was good or bad? Well, I think not; and I am sure I would not. Now, my religion is of more consequence to me than anything else; and I do not like to take my religion in a bag, the way I cannot know nor see what it is. And before I can profess this creed of Pope Pius IV., like an honest man, I want to know how many general councils there are, and where I can see the list of them.

Hoping that you, sir, will give me a plain answer to this plain question.

I remain your obedient servant,

A CATHOLIC.

We are always anxious to answer our correspondents questions; and we would never have undertaken to answer such questions if we had not made a due preparation in the knowledge of books and authors.

But, we must protest against our correspondents asking us questions that no man living can answer.

At the same time we must confess our correspondent's question is a very fair one. It cannot be supposed, that our correspondent should solemnly profess to believe "all things declared by the œcumenical councils," without so much as knowing how many such councils there are, or what councils are really œcumenical according to the Church of Rome.

Every collection of councils, that we have seen, consists of many hundreds; and it is acknowledged by all Roman Catholics, that not more than twenty of these at most are really œcumenical or general, and that of the rest many are false and heretical, and many more not general or œcumenical; and it must be confessed, that it is only reasonable for Roman Catholics to ask to be informed which of these councils they do really profess to believe, in the creed of Pope Pius IV. It is certainly a most reasonable question.

At the same time we must protest, that it is a question that no man living can answer with any degree of certainty whatever.

No infallible Pope can tell what councils are really œcumenical or general; for we suppose that if any infallible Pope could have done so he would. And of this we are quite sure, that no Pope ever has attempted to do so.

No œcumenical council can do so; for though we admit that such a council did once lay down such a list, in the most solemn manner possible, yet we know that all Roman Catholics are now agreed in saying, that that œcumenical council was wrong.

No fallible man can do so, for though numbers of fallible men have made the best guess they could, yet they have differed so totally from each other, and they all differ so widely from the only general council that tried to lay down the list, that it is evident that they are but guesses; and who can tell which guess is right, when no infallible Pope would attempt to decide, and when the only council that attempted it is confessed, by all Roman Catholic writers, to have been wrong?

To show that we are not really shrinking from the question, nor answering in culpable ignorance, we will give some of the guesses that have been made, and let our correspondent judge.

Cardinal Bellarmine, who is one of the greatest authorities in the Church of Rome, reckons eighteen general or œcumenical councils, ending with the Council of Trent.

The collection of councils made by Labbe and Cossart, two French Jesuits, which is one of the highest authority, reckons—we really cannot say whether 19 or 20, the counting is so curious. It runs thus—

Nice I., a general council.

Sardica, a general council.

Constantinople I., the SECOND general council!

In other words, "there's one, and there's another, and there's another, and that makes TWO!!"

There was a reason for this certainly, for it is more than doubtful whether any such council as Sardica ever was held; but if put down in the list as a general council, it surely ought to count as one. Yet they put it in the list, and do not count it. This list also ends with the Council of Trent, and makes with Sardica twenty, without it nineteen. So they considered either one or two as general councils, and infallible, which Bellarmine rejected as fallible.

But, to look a little closer at this list, Labbe and Cossart reckon the Council of Constance the SIXTEENTH general council (reckoning Sardica, it should be the seventeenth). Well, that very Council of Constance itself does count itself the TWELFTH.

This is remarkable, as being the only case in which a general and infallible council has attempted to give a list of general and infallible councils; and it is curious to see how all Roman Catholics agree to consider it wrong.

In their 39th session that council made a solemn decree, that every Pope, at his election, should profess to hold the faith of "the general councils;" and they give the list of general councils which the Pope was to profess, and that list consists of ELEVEN—(Labbe & Coss. vol. xii. p. 241); and yet this council is now counted the sixteenth or seventeenth! How can that be? Why, Labbe and Cossart take five other councils which were held before this of Constance, and pronounce them general councils, although this infallible Council of Constance did not include them as such in its list. These councils are—Sardica, three Councils of Lateran, and the second Council of Lyons. The Council of Constance counted none of these general, though they are in most lists now. What presumption in fallible men, if they really believe in the infallibility of general councils, thus to set aside the decision of a council which they themselves confess to be infallible!

But, we have other lists still to puzzle us.

When Queen Mary came to the throne of England, and found the Church of England already reformed, she set about to bring it back into subjection to Rome. Cardinal Pole was then appointed Legate of the Pope, to reconcile the English Church to Rome; in this capacity he held a council of all the English Bishops at Lambeth, in the year 1556; and the second decree of that council, calls the Council of Florence "the EIGHTH General Council"—(Labbe & Coss. vol. xiv. p. 1737). Now this Council of Florence was held after that of Constance which called itself the twelfth! And this Council of Florence, which is called the EIGHTH by the whole English Synod and the Pope's Legate, is called, by Bellarmine, the sixteenth! by Labbe and Cossart, the seventeenth!! and if Sardica was counted in the list it would be the eighteenth!!! So, here is a difference of no less than TEN general councils in the list!

When that Council of Florence was first published by Abraham Cretensis, it was expressly styled THE EIGHTH; and the approbation of Pope Clement the Seventh prefixed to that first edition, called it THE EIGHTH. No wonder then that the Pope's Legate, and the English Council, called it the eighth. But how then can it be the 16th, 17th, or 18th now?

There are plenty of lists besides for people to guess among. For instance, when the Council of Trent was to be held, Cardinal Contareuus presented to Pope Paul III. a short account of councils already held, and he calls the Council of Florence THE NINTH. But we need not go farther with these lists; we have shown that there is no certainty at all what councils are general, and what are not. No Pope has ever attempted to decide; for Popes are so modest, or so prudent, that they never interfere while great authorities are disputing; but whenever men come to agree about a disputed point, then the Pope takes the opportunity to pass an infallible decree, because he can do it safely then when there is no one to dispute it.

We must say again, that supposing the Creed of Pope Pius IV. to be right, and that the Catholic Faith does really consist in believing all that the general councils have declared, then it is the most reasonable thing in the world that our correspondent should expect to get a plain answer to his plain question, what councils the Church of Rome holds to be general. We are very sorry that we cannot answer him; and we think it very strange and unfair that the Pope or the Church of Rome does not give a plain and authorized answer to the question.

Our correspondent must now see that in professing the Creed of Pope Pius IV., he would really (according to his own homely, but appropriate simile) be taking his faith in a bag, without the possibility of knowing what it is. No man can tell him, with certainty, what it is; because no man can tell him with certainty where it is, or in which of the councils it is to be found.

But, if our correspondent had asked us—"What councils are really general?" we should have no difficulty at all in answering that the four councils of Nice, Constantinople, Ephesus, and Chalcedon, were truly general, because they were always received by the whole church. It is not important to inquire whether the council at Constantinople, A.D., 553, and that held at Constantinople, A.D., 680, were truly and really general (though we think they were) because those two councils made no additional decrees about the faith. But no later councils have any pretensions to be general councils, because they were all councils only of the Eastern and Greek Churches, or only of the Latin or Western Churches.

If any one ask what decrees did those four truly general councils make about the Catholic Faith? we answer that the whole faith which they held and established is to be found in the Catholic Creeds.

We also suggest to him, that there were true Catholics before ANY of these councils were held. St. Peter was a Catholic, and St. Paul, and all the other writers of the New Testament; and by studying their writings (about which there is no uncertainty at all), we may learn what it was then to be a Catholic.

If any Roman Catholic, or especially any Roman Catholic Priest, will give us a list of general councils duly authorized by the Church of Rome, with proof that it is so authorized, we will, of course, be ready to publish it. But we are sensible that we are now asking a question that no man living can answer.

THE INDEX EXPURGATORIUS AND THE DOUAY BIBLE.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN.

SIR—As your correspondents appear to take an interest in the subject of the Index Expurgatorius, I think it right to give you an account of a pamphlet I met some time ago, in which it was recommended to the Roman Catholic authorities to expurgate the Douay Testament. The author of the pamphlet (whom I believe to have been a Protestant) maintains that there is sufficient precedent for such a proceeding. See, for example, the expurgation of the Scripture references in Stephens's Bible (Index Exp. Vat. p. 41). And as there are many passages in the Douay Testament which appear at first sight at variance with Roman Catholic teaching, he proposes that they should be altered or expunged. I forward some specimens of the proposed alterations, which appear conceived in the spirit of the good friar who said, that if he had been by St. Paul when he was writing, he would have recommended him to leave out some ugly sentences which smelt of the faggot.

I am, sir, &c.,

A SUBSCRIBER.

I. Matt. xxii. 29.—"You err, not knowing the Scriptures," read "from your knowing the Scriptures."

John v. 39.—Dele "Search the Scriptures."

2 Tim. iii. 15.—Dele "And because from thy infancy thou hast known the Holy Scriptures, which can instruct thee to salvation, by the faith which is in Christ Jesus."

Acts xvii. 11, 12.—Dele "Daily searching the Scriptures, whether these things were so," because from this it would appear that what the Apostles preached was compared with the Scripture by those who heard them.

2 Pet. iii. 16.—Dele "Which the unlearned and unstable wrest, as they do also the other Scriptures, to their own destruction," because it would appear hence that the unlearned and unstable were in those days allowed to have the Scripture in their hands.

II. Matt. xvi. 23.—Dele "Jesus turned and said unto Peter, Get thee behind me, Satan: thou art a scandal unto me: for thou savourest not the things that are of God, but those that are of men."

Luke xxii. 24.—Dele "There was also a strife among them which of them should seem to be greater." For the Apostles must have known that St. Peter was the greatest.

Acts viii. 14.—"The Apostles sent unto Samaria Peter and John," read "Peter was pleased to go unto Samaria, and took with him John."

Gal. ii. 11.—"When Cephas was come to Antioch, I withstood him to the face, because he was to be blamed," read "wherein I was to be blamed."

III. 1 Tim. iv. 3.—Dele "Forbidding to marry and commanding to abstain from meats."

Luke iv. 38.—"Simon's wife's mother," read "Simon's mother."

1 Tim. iii. 2-4.—"It behoveth a bishop to be blameless, the husband of one wife." Dele "the husband of one wife." This sentence of St. Paul having been anathematized by the Council of Trent (Sess. xxiv. De Soc. Matr. Can. ix.)

Ib. v. 12.—Dele "Let deacons be the husband of one wife."

Titus i. 5, 6.—"And should'st ordain priests in every city. . . . If any be without crime, the husband of one wife." Dele "the husband of one wife."

IV. Jas. v. 16.—"Confess your sins one to another." Dele "one," and read "to another;" otherwise the text might be used to prove that priests should confess to the laity as well as the laity to the priests.

V. Jas. v. 15.—Dele "And the prayer of faith shall save the sick man, and the Lord shall raise him up." For extreme unction, which is here meant, is never given but when it is hopeless that the sick man shall be raised up.

VI. 1 Cor. xiv.—Omn. delend. because what it declares, concerning prayers in an unknown tongue appears inconsistent with the performance of the mass in Latin.

VII. Heb. ix. 26, 27, 28.—Dele "once;" for it is certain, from the decree of the Council of Trent (Sess. xxii. De Sac. Miss. Can. I. III.), that Christ is offered many times every day.

1 Peter iii. 18.—Dele "once," for the same reason.

The pamphlet referred to contains many other expurgations, but the specimens here given are sufficient.

[We open our columns to give the Roman Catholic authorities the benefit of our correspondent's suggestions; but we do not think they will adopt them. It is true that the alterations proposed might remove some few of the points most obviously at variance with Roman Catholic teaching; but no amount of expurgation could make the book what they would consider a safe one. He whose duty it is in all points to obey the Church, will only be perplexed if offered the services of another guide, claiming to have Divine authority. And even were the whole book rewritten now, so as to correspond exactly with Roman Catholic teaching, in its present form, what a check would this fixed standard be upon the future development of Christian doctrine as the Church may shape it some few hundred years hence?]

THE CATHOLIC LAYMAN IN KILPATRICK.

NO. III.

In our August number we told you of a conversation between Dennis Gasteen and Tim Donovan, which came rather to a sudden end, because Tim Donovan took offence at Gasteen's saying that, in praying to the saints, he ran the danger of committing Idolatry. However, when Tim's anger cooled down, he became only more anxious to confute his friend, Dennis. So he read a good deal on the subject out of books Priest Moloney had given him, and before the next meeting he had got such a mass of learning together as was quite enough to overwhelm poor Dennis Gasteen. He produced testimony after testimony from the Fathers, until he had got together such proofs of the antiquity and catholicity of the custom of praying to the saints, as he thought could not be resisted.

We do not think it profitable to give a detailed report of their discussion, because it was, on both sides, all attack and no defence. Tim Donovan pelted Dennis with quotations from the Fathers, and Dennis replied with texts of Scripture. And he was not inclined to listen to the quotations from the Fathers at all; "For," says he, "if prayers to the saints is so useful a thing, it is very strange that we should not be once told in the Bible to pray to them; that, on the other hand, those who worshipped angels should be rebuked for it (for I cannot find any instance in those days of any one praying to a saint), and that our Lord Jesus Christ should be always spoken of as our only mediator and intercessor."

"This may appear strange to you," said Tim, "because you imagine that you are to find everything in the Bible; but as I see it proved that the Church has, in all ages, invoked the intercession of the saints, if it is not in the Bible, it only shows me how little we can depend on the Bible alone for teaching us all we ought to know about the mode of worshipping God. If you will only take this book, and read the words of the holy Fathers that I have read to you, I think you must come to be of my opinion too."

"What is the use," said Dennis, "of my reading that book? How am I able to tell whether what is in it was ever said by the Fathers or not? Have we not seen in the CATHOLIC LAYMAN how many a passage that was brought up as if it was written by the Fathers turned out not to have been written by the real Fathers after all, but by people hundreds of years after, that no one knows anything about? And how many another passage, even when it was really written by those they said wrote it, turned out to have quite a different meaning when you read it along with all the rest that was joined to it, from what it seemed to have when it was taken out by itself.* I know too well the way of quoting that some of your writers have, to trust much to them, unless I knew some one that saw the very words in the books they took them from. Don't I remember how some of you tried, in the CATHOLIC LAYMAN, to make out Bishop Jeremy Taylor to be a Roman Catholic, until they printed together his own words and the words you put in his mouth. By the way, I don't think that same gentleman has ever written to them since."*

To all this Jem was positive in insisting that the quotations in his book were all fairly made, and as Dennis would not take his word for it, Tim offered to lend him the book to take up to Mr. Townsend's, and try if he could pick any hole in it.

"I tell you what will be better," said Dennis, "bring the book up yourself to Mr. Townsend's controversial class, at seven this evening, and try what he can say to it."

Now, another day Tim would no more have thought of walking into Mr. Townsend's controversial class than he would have thought of going in for his amusement into the fever hospital; but this day he was so full of spirits at the victory he and his book had gained over Dennis Gasteen, that he thought he would try their effect on Mr. Townsend too.

So, at seven o'clock, the two men went up to Mr. Townsend's school-room, and, when a fit time was come, Dennis introduced Tim, whom Mr. Townsend remembered to have met at his house before, and he told the story about Tim Donovan's book, and gave him an account, as well as he remembered, of all the arguments that had been used on both sides. So, said Mr. Townsend—

"Well, Dennis, if he makes out that the Church has, in all ages, made use of prayers to the saints, we must own that it will be a difficulty for us to explain how this custom should have always existed, supposing it wrong; and, on the other hand, Mr. Donovan, it would still be a difficulty for you to explain how it came to pass, supposing that such a practice existed in the Apostles' days, that they never gave the least hint of it in their writings."

"It may be strange," said Tim, "but I am not bound to explain it; I am safe in doing what the Church always has done."

"But, sir," said Dennis, "I want you to look at this book of his, and tell me if all these passages given here are fairly quoted out of the Fathers."

Mr. Townsend smiled, and said—"You must give me credit both for more extensive reading and a better memory than I possess if you think I could answer such a question as that off-hand. I think I told you once before what kind of sized collection the writings of the Fathers would make."

Tim's spirits rose, and he whispered to Dennis that Mr. Townsend was shirking the point, and was as much afraid of the book as himself. However, Mr. Townsend said that he had no objection to look at the book, and see what was in it; and when he had turned it over a few minutes—"How is this?" said he; "I thought you said this book would prove that the Church, in all ages, used prayers to the Blessed Virgin and the saints!"

"And does it not, sir?" said Tim.

"Why," said Mr. Townsend, "In the first place there is nothing here about the ages of the Church that I should like best to hear about—that is, the Apostles' age, and the times that were near them; and there is not any proof with regard even to the times when there were men alive whose fathers or whose grandfathers might have seen the Apostles. I don't see here anything, or at least anything of any weight, from any of the writers of the first three centuries; the greater part of the writers here quoted lived farther from the Apostles than we are from the times of King Henry VIII; and they got their knowledge of the Apostles' doctrines from reading their books, just as we do ourselves."

"Well, sir," said Tim, impatiently, "I'd like to keep to the point; read over these passages here, and just tell me what they prove."

"Why," said Mr. Townsend, "supposing these quotations to be fairly and honestly made (of which, of course, I can't pretend to judge without examination), they prove that the practice of asking the intercession of the saints had become general in the Church in the fifth and sixth centuries."

"Well," said Tim, with a triumphant air, "perhaps you ought to grant more than that; but that's enough for me. Take it as far down as you like—say the sixth century—you own that those great divines of the sixth century thought it right to pray to the Blessed Virgin. Now, I want you to prove them heretical in that opinion, if you can. Show me the General Council by which they were condemned, or tell me when they were cast out of the Church's communion for so believing, or when any formal censure was passed on them for this practice."

"I don't pretend to be able to do it," says Mr. Townsend.

"Well, sir," said Tim, "if they were in the wrong you could do it. There is not a heresy that ever was started that was not at once condemned by the Church, and the heretic that started it cut off as a rotten branch."

"And burned," said Dennis.

"See here," said Tim, not minding him, "the picture of the Apostolic tree," showing him a drawing out of Dr. Milner's book, "here I have the Catholic Church, with its noble branches of bishops, and confessors, and martyrs, and there you see how the heretics are represented as broken off on all sides from its body, from the very earliest down to Luther, and Calvin, and Muggleton, and Johanna Southcote. Now, sir, I defy you to show me any one here cast out as a heretic for praying to the saints; and as you own that the practice existed in the sixth century, I conclude that it was the doctrine of the Church, and therefore necessarily Catholic and Apostolic. There, sir, find the flaw in that argument if you can."

"The flaw," said Mr. Townsend, "is just this—that you take for granted that the Church can never err, and that her doctrine and practice have been always in all points the same. But you ought to know that this is the very chief point of difference between us and you. We hold that the doctrine of the Church, which was perfectly pure as delivered by our Lord and his Apostles, became by degrees more or less mixed with human corruptions in the course of ages; just as the little stream, which flows so fresh and sparkling out of our little lough above, collects many an impurity in its course; and when it has become a great river, and flows through the large city, some sixty miles hence, though its waters are still sufficient to support life, they are very different from those so bright and clear, which allows us to see every pebble in the bottom. We hold that, besides the erroneous doctrines whose teachers were cast out of the Church as heretics, there were other errors which were never branded as heresies, and which, though they received no formal sanction from any truly General Council, yet passed into the belief of the most eminent of the Church's teachers. The fact is, then, that the doctrines and practices of the Church of the sixth century, while they are very far indeed from being identical with those of the Council of Trent, are very far also from being identical with those of the Apostles. There, then, is my answer to you; I make you a present, as far as this question is concerned, of the sixth century; I give you St. Basil, and St. Leo, and St. Gregory; but until you can prove that the doctrines of that time were identical with those of the Apostles' time, you will not have got a step towards deciding the question."

Now, poor Tim Donovan was under the disadvantage of being here taken by surprise, and having the controversy turn on a point on which he was unprepared, for he had expected that Mr. Townsend would have endeavoured to make out that the quotations in his book were erroneous, or the translations bad, or, in short, that the saints referred to did not hold the doctrines imputed to them, and as he had never heard the idea started that St. Leo, or St. Gregory, could possibly go wrong, it quite took away his breath to hear them thrown overboard so summarily. However, he made as good a fight as he could on a sudden—"And, sir," said he, "if the Church did not hold the same doctrines in the sixth century as in the Apostles' times, will you please tell me the name of the heretic who made the change, and give me the year when he lived. Until you can do this, sir, I shall take the liberty of believing that the Church's doctrine was always the same; for I have learned from Dr. Milner that the only way you can find any support for your notions is, if you can make it out that all the Christian world went to sleep one night Protestants, and woke the next morning good Catholics; and, sir, though you may be a very fine controversialist, and very clever at proving black white, I think, with all submission, this is more than you'll be able to do."

"Thank you for the compliment," said Mr. Townsend, laughing, "but I think I can return it, for it's the argument you are using that would prove black white."

"I don't understand you, sir," said Tim.

"Why," said Mr. Townsend, "by the arguments you have been using you might prove the hair of my good friend, Mr. Driscoll, here, to be as black as a raven's."

Old Mr. Driscoll shook his head, which was, indeed, white and venerable enough. "You might have proved that, sir, easily fifty years ago, but I fear you would find it a hard matter to do it now."

"Well, but," said Mr. Townsend, "you own it was black once, and can you tell me the exact day on which it became gray? Or do you remember the night when you went to bed with your fine black head of hair, and woke up the next morning with as snowy locks as you have now? Because, unless you can give Mr. Donovan satisfaction on these points, he will not believe any change to have taken place at all, unless you can tell him the exact hour and minute it occurred. And," proceeded Mr. Townsend, "it was a pity I did not know your way of arguing last Tuesday; for there were two English farmers walking through my fields, that had come over to see if they could find a farm in this county they would like to take; and said they to me—'You have a great sight of weeds here, sir.' 'Well,' said I, 'we would call that clean enough here.' 'Perhaps you may,' said they; 'but we find that what you call cleanly farming in Ireland, we should think very slovenly in England.' Now, Mr. Donovan," said Mr. Townsend, "if I had had you to help me, I might have held out that there were no weeds there at all; for I sowed nothing but good seed there, and I defy any one to tell who put in the others, or what was the day or night they first came."

It was an unlucky illustration of Mr. Townsend's, for some of his hearers found the subject of the English farmers, and their relative modes of farming, more interesting than that he was on. "But," he continued, "What I am driving at, boys, is this:—The way to know whether St. Jerome and St. Leo taught the same as the Apostles is, to compare their writings together. You have no right to take for granted that they must of course be the same, because you may be unable to tell who changed them, or when they were changed. You have no right to be sure that the crop you find growing in the sixth century is the same exactly that was planted by the Apostles, and that it has not got a single weed mixed up with it."

"Well, sir," said Tim Donovan, rising to go away, "the upshot of the matter is, that you will never persuade me that St. Jerome, or St. Leo, were heretics, and therefore I am contented to believe as they did."

"Very well," said Mr. Townsend, rising too, "it would be better if you were contented to believe as Peter and Paul did; and as for later Saints and Fathers—though I am too honest to pretend that they thought exactly in all points as Protestants do now—you will find that they were still further from thinking exactly as Roman Catholics do now; and if you make it a rule to believe as they did, I fear Father Sheehy will not be pleased with you."

They then bid each other good night, and went home.

Review.

Meditations from St. Chrysostom, on the Study of the Word of God, consisting of Passages literally Translated from his Works. By Robert King, A.B. George Herbert, Grafton-street, Dublin.

THIS little book, of which we give the title above, is one which we can cordially recommend to our readers. It is an attempt to make known to the English reader some selections from the writings of one of the most eminent of the Fathers of the Church—one whom both Protestants and Roman Catholics agree to hold in high esteem. It contains nothing of a controversial character, Mr. King having very wisely abstained from adding much of his own, and merely permitting his author (in a very faithful translation) to speak for himself. He has, indeed, prefixed a life of St. Chrysostom, abridged from "Butler's Lives of the Saints;" but this, though written by a Roman Catholic, contains nothing that can give offence to any Protestant; so that this cheap and pretty little volume is one which a Roman Catholic might safely present to a Protestant, or a Protestant to a Roman Catholic.

We think that the first reflection which will occur to an English reader who, for the first time, examines a work which, like the present, contains tolerably copious selections from one of the Fathers, is, how imperfect an idea he can form of the spirit of their writings from the isolated passages which are quoted in books of controversy. We are informed by an ancient collector of good things, of a man who, having a house to sell, sagaciously took with him a single specimen brick, for the full information of intending purchasers. And it would be fully as easy to judge of the comforts of a house by the sight of a single brick, as it would be to form a notion of the spirit of one of the Fathers from what controversial writers produce of their works. For instance, we have ourselves, on several occasions, produced rather copious quotations from St. Chrysostom on the subject of the Word of God; and yet, we think the most diligent student of the CATHOLIC LAYMAN will scarcely be prepared to find how very anxiously this eminent Father had his heart set on "promoting the free circulation of God's holy Word among all classes of persons—how little sympathy he had with that spirit which represents them as dangerous to any—how repeatedly he urges the absolute necessity of their use for all—how earnestly he insists on the statement, that where ignorance of them exists, there, by all means, may we expect heresy to be found—how strongly he recommends the constant perusal of them by the ignorant as well as the highly educated—by the private layman as well as the studious ecclesiastic—at home in the cottage as well as in the church—how great he represents the advantages of the study to be—what a consolation in affliction, what a support under the weight of oppressive cares; and, in fine, how simply he disposes of some of the objections which have been made by people anxious to discourage the study, against the value of the free and unrestrained use of the Holy Bible."

Wishing to lay before our readers some specimens of Mr. King's translations, we have had great difficulty in selecting from so much that is admirable, and present the following passages, not as the best, but as those which first came to hand:—

Chrysostom recommends his flock to peruse carefully at home, beforehand, the particular portions of Scripture which were to be read and commented on at Church. Excuses for "want of time," or not being supplied with copies of the Scriptures, answered.

"One favour I shall ask of you before I proceed to handle the words of the Evangelist—and I must beg of you not to refuse the demand; for neither is the object of my desire anything of an oppressive or burdensome nature, nor is it an object of such a character as to benefit me the receiver only, but, [on the contrary, one which will be accompanied with advantage to] yourselves also by whom it is conferred—nay, to you perhaps it may prove far more beneficial in its tendency. What, then, is it that I would require of you? It is, that on the first day of the week, or on the Sabbath itself, you would, every one of you, take in your hands that portion of the Gospels which is to be read out among you here; and while you sit at home, read it over attentively, and often search into, and examine the contents, and study them carefully; so as to note what is plain, and what obscure; and what statements have the appearance of being contradictory to others, although not so in reality; and, in short, after having weighed all carefully, then come, thus prepared, to our meeting together, where you may hear the preaching of the Word. And the advantage likely to result from such study, both to yourselves and to us, will be not at all inconsiderable. For we shall not have occasion for much trouble, in making clear to you the force and meaning of the expressions used, when your mind has been already familiarized to the consideration of the terms; and you yourselves also shall by this method become much more sharp and clearsighted, not only in your hearing, or in your learning for yourselves, but even so as to become competent to instruct others also.

"For, according to the present mode of proceeding, the most part of those who attend in this place are obliged to take into their minds altogether, both the words of the text and our comments upon them. And if we were to keep acting on this plan even for a whole year together, it cannot be expected that they should reap much benefit from such a course. For how should they, when all the attention they give to the matter is bestowed merely in a passing, occasional, sort of way, and just for this short season while we are here?

"And if some will throw the blame on the matters of business and cares which engage them, and the urgent pressure of their employments, public and private—in the first place, this very circumstance is one which of itself involves no little culpability—that a man should allow himself to be encircled with such a flood of worldly affairs, and so entirely nailed to the cares of this present life, as to be unable to bestow even a brief period of leisure on matters that are of more vital consequence than all beside. Then further—that this is mere dissembling and pretence, may be argued to a demonstration from the time spent in company between them and their friends, and their frequent visits to the theatre, and the hours they spend in the assemblies, looking on the equestrian feats there;—employments in which they have not unfrequently consumed whole days.

"Thus, you have been able to find seasons in abundance for keeping company with your friends, and none of them has ever complained on those occasions, of a want of leisure from worldly business—and for these worthless amusements you can afford to forget all your excuses, and enjoy profound leisure—but if you be called on to occupy yourselves with the things of God, these are with you so much less necessary and valuable than all the rest, that you do not feel it requisite to set apart ever so small a portion of your time for giving to them your undivided attention. And are men of such a disposition worthy to enjoy the air they breathe, or to see the light of day?

"There is also another excuse employed by persons of this indolent frame, which is utterly devoid of reason—viz., that they have never gotten a Bible, and have none in their possession. And as far indeed as the wealthy are concerned, it would be ridiculous for us to spend any words on such a pretext. But as I believe that many of our poorer brethren are in the habit of using it very often, I should be glad to ask of them this one question, whether they have not every one of them gotten, complete and perfect, all the tools and implements belonging to the different trades at which they individually labour? even though they have to struggle with poverty in the most pinching form? How then is it not absurd, there indeed to set forth no excuses, but carefully to use all means to prevent the existence of impediment of any kind, in the way of their toils;—but here, where such unspeakable benefits are to be reaped, to be whining over their want of leisure and their poverty? And further, even if any be so far sunk in poverty, yet might they from the continual reading which is kept up in this place, escape from being ignorant of the contents of any part of the Divine Scriptures. King, p. 41."—Homily ii. (al. x.) on St. John i. 4, Op., Tom. viii. p. 62. Ed. Bened, Paris, 1718.

Chrysostom does not consider poverty a sufficient reason for being without a copy of God's Word.

"See you not the workers in brass, the goldsmith, the silversmith, the tradespeople of any class, how they keep all the implements of their trade safe and ready for use; even though hunger press them—even though poverty afflict them—still they prefer to endure all hardships rather than part with any of the instruments of their profession, and live by the sale of it. Many, certainly, have chosen rather to borrow for the support of their family and children, than to give up even the smallest of the tools of their trade. And very naturally, for they know that if these be sold, everything that concerns their trade becomes useless to them, and all the source of their gains is taken away. For while they retain these implements, it is possible for them at length to liquidate, in the course of time, the debts they are liable to, by constant working at their trades; but if, in the first instance, they were to give those implements away to others, they should not be able afterwards to contrive any means at all of relieving their poverty and hunger. And such, too, should be our disposition. For just as the implements of their trades are the hammer, and anvil, and pincers, exactly so the implements of our profession are, the books of the Apostles and Prophets, and all the Scripture, composed by Divine inspiration, and full of what is for our profit.

"And as these persons of whom we speak, fashion with those implements whatever vessels they take in hand, just so we, by means of these of ours, labour at our own souls, and correct what is injured, and repair what is worn out with age."—King. p. 16, Op. Tom. i. p. 736.

On such passages as these Mr. King remarks, in his short preface, that they furnish, by anticipation, a reply to a specious objection of modern date:—

"It has been often said, by men disparaging the value of the Sacred Scriptures, 'If they be of such importance to our eternal interests, how then could people be saved at all before printing was invented? How could men possibly all have Bibles in the old times, when manuscripts were more costly than gold and precious stones? Chrysostom gives us plainly to understand that he thought far otherwise; that in his opinion, if men were unsupplied, they were to be blamed; and that, had they a sufficient interest in the object, all, even the poorest, might, by a little exertion, have been furnished with the Sacred Word. But it was no wonder if, when men ceased to attach a due value to the contents of the Bible, copies became scarce, and then, as a necessary consequence, of costly price."

Chrysostom's answer to the objection that the Scriptures are difficult to be understood—The Bible written by plain men, and intended for plain people to read.

"'What, then,' says some one, 'if we do not understand the contents?' Undoubtedly, even if you do not understand the contents, much improvement in holiness accrues from the very reading of them. But further, it is impossible for you to be alike ignorant of all:—for it was for this reason that the grace of the Spirit appointed that publicans, and fishermen, and tent-makers, and shepherds, and goatherds, and unlearned and ignorant men, should compose these books, that none of the unlearned might be able to have recourse to this excuse; that the words there spoken might be intelligible to all; that even the mechanic, and the servant, and the widow woman, and the most unlearned of all mankind, might receive profit and improvement from what they should hear.

"For it was not for vain glory, like the heathen, but for the salvation of the hearers, that those authors, who from the beginning, were counted worthy of the grace of the Spirit, composed all these writings. For the heathen philosophers, indeed, and their orators and writers, not seeking the common welfare, but aiming only at their own aggrandizement, if ever they did say anything useful, did, in their usual obscurity, conceal even this in a sort of dark mist, as it were. But the apostles and prophets did quite the reverse; for what proceeded from them they set before all men plain and clear, as being the common teachers of the world, that each individual might be able, even of himself, to learn from the mere reading the sense of what they said. And foretelling this, the prophet exclaimed, 'They shall be all taught of God. And they shall not say every man to his neighbour, know the Lord, for all shall know me, from the least of them unto the greatest.' And Paul saith—'And I, brethren, come to you, not with excellency of speech, or of wisdom, proclaiming to you the mystery of God.' And, again, 'My speech and my preaching was not with enticing words of man's wisdom, but in demonstration of the spirit and of power.' And, again, 'For we,' saith he, 'speak not the wisdom of this world, nor of the princes of this world, that come to nought.'

"And who is there that does not understand plainly the whole of the gospels? Who that hears that, 'Blessed are the meek, blessed are the merciful, blessed are the pure in heart,' and so forth, will need a teacher in order to comprehend any of these sayings? And as for the accounts of miracles and wonderful works, and historical facts, are they not plain and intelligible to any common person? This is but pretext and excuse, and a cloak for laziness. You 'do not understand the contents.' And how will you ever be able to understand them, when you will not so much as take a single glance at them? Take the book in your hands, read the entire history, and when you have secured a knowledge of what is simple, come back to the obscure and hard parts over and over again. And if you cannot, by constant reading, make out what is said, go to some person wiser than yourself, go to a teacher, communicate with him about the things spoken of, show a strong interest in the matter; and if God see you displaying so much anxiety, he will not despise your watchfulness and earnestness: but even if no man teach you what you seek after, Himself will surely reveal it.

"Remember the Eunuch of the Queen of the Ethiopians, who though a barbarian by birth, and pressed by innumerable cares, and surrounded on every side by many things to occupy his attention, aye, and unable, moreover, to understand what he was reading, was reading, nevertheless, as he sat in his chariot. And if he showed such diligence upon the road, consider what he must have been when staying at home. If he could not endure to let the time of his journey pass without reading, much more would he attend to it when sitting in the house. If, when he understood nothing of what he was reading, he still would not give up reading, much less would he after he had learned. For in proof that he did not understand what he was reading, hear what Philip saith to him, 'Understandest thou what thou art reading?' And he, upon hearing this, did not blush, nor feel ashamed, but confessed his ignorance, and says—'For how can I, unless some man should guide me?' Since, then, when he had not yet a guide, he was occupied even so, in reading, he therefore speedily met with one to take him by the hand. God saw his earnestness, accepted his diligence, and straightway sent him a teacher.

"'But there is no Philip here now.' Aye, but the Spirit that influenced Philip is here. Let us not trifle, beloved, with our salvation. 'All these things were written for our sakes, for our admonition, upon whom the ends of the world are come.' Great is the security against sin which the reading of the Scriptures furnishes; great is the precipice, and deep the gulf, that opens before ignorance of the Scriptures. It is downright abandonment of salvation to be ignorant of the Divine laws. It is this that has caused heresies—it is this that has led to profligate living—it is this that has turned things upside down. For it is impossible, impossible, for any one to come off without profit, who constantly enjoys such reading with intelligence."—King, p. 18. 22., Op., Tom. i., p. 736.

Those who strive to understand the Scriptures sure to obtain aid from the Holy Spirit.

"Let us then, I beseech of you, attend with all diligence to the reading of the Divine Scriptures; for thus shall we attain to knowledge, by constant application to their contents. For it cannot be, that he who gives his attention to Divine things with earnestness and strong desire, should ever be neglected; but even though we have no human instructor, the Lord himself, descending from on high into our hearts, will enlighten our mind, give a brightness to our reasoning faculties, reveal those things that are hidden, become our teacher in what we know not, if only we be willing to contribute our own part; for, 'call not,' saith he, any one master upon earth.' When, therefore, we take into our hands the volume indited by the Spirit, let us collect our thoughts, summon up all our attention, put away from us every earthly care, and thus set about our reading with much devoutness, with much diligence, that so we may be guided by the Holy Spirit to a right understanding of what is written, and thus reap much benefit from the study.

"For that barbarian Eunuch of the Queen of the Ethiopians, surrounded as he was with so much grandeur, and driving along in his carriage, did not neglect his reading, but holding the prophet in his hands, kept attending to the study with much diligence, and this, although he understood not the contents. But, nevertheless, when he contributed all that was needful on his part—earnestness, interest, attention—he obtained a guide. And consider now, I pray you, what a remarkable thing it was, not to forget reading, even when he was going on a journey, and, moreover, when seated in his carriage. Listen to this, you that will not be persuaded to do this even in your houses, but think that the reading of these Scriptures is a needless task, and that because men have the company of a wife to occupy them, or servants to look after, or cares of other sorts of business to attend to, it is therefore inconvenient for them to take much trouble about the reading of the Scriptures. For see here an Eunuch, a native of a savage land, both of them circumstances calculated to draw one into habits of great indolence; and besides this, the man's grandeur and state, the abundance of his wealth, the very circumstance of his being on a journey, and driving in his carriage (for it is no easy matter, but a very difficult one, for a person so travelling to attend much to reading,) yet, nevertheless, his earnestness and strong anxiety removed every impediment, and he held fast to the perusal; and did not say—as many now-a-days—I do not understand the contents, I cannot comprehend the depth of what is written there—what good would there be in my taking the trouble in vain, and to no purpose, reading, when I had no one by able to guide me to the meaning? None of this reasoning entered the thoughts of that person, barbarian as he was in tongue, yet philosopher in heart. But reflecting that he should not be elected, but would be sure to obtain help from on high, if he were to contribute his own part, and what was according to his ability, he kept reading on.

"Therefore, the Lord of mercy, beholding his earnest desires, neglected him not, nor left him unprovided for, but sent him a teacher directly.—King, p. 31. 35. Hom. on Genesis, ch. xiii. Tom. iv. p. 349.

"Observe you now what an advantage it is to apply to the reading of the Divine Scriptures with diligence and earnestness. For this was the reason why I brought before you the narrative concerning this barbarian, that there may be no one among us who would feel ashamed to imitate the example of the Ethiopian, the eunuch, that would not even on a journey neglect the reading of them. For that barbarian is fit to become teacher of us all, whether we be of those who have chosen a private life, or of the number of them that pursue military affairs, and live in pomp and grandeur—and, once for all, fit to teach every body, not men only, but women too, as being constantly at home—aye, and those too, who follow the profession of monks, that all people may understand that there is no season unsuited to the perusal of the Divine oracles, but that it is possible, not only at home, but likewise when we move about in public, or pursue our journey, or are in the midst of many persons around us, or are involved in business—to be still occupied with them, in order that when we contribute what is sought on our part, we may speedily obtain the help of one to guide us For the Lord, seeing our concern about spiritual things, will not disregard us, but will afford us the illumination [that cometh down] from on high, and enlighten our understandings."—King, p. 36., Op., Tom iv. 349.

The Holy Scriptures are the door into Christ's Sheepfold· He that useth them not, but entereth in by some other mode is a thief.

"First, he shows who is the deceiver and the thief, characterizing him thus from the Scriptures, and saying—'Verily, verily, I say unto you, he that entereth not by the door into the sheepfold, but climbeth up some other way, the same is a thief and a robber.' Observe the tokens of the thief. First, that he doth not come in openly. Secondly, that [he entereth] not in the way of the Scriptures; for this is what is implied in, not by the door. Herein he points at both such of these as were before him, and such as were to be after him, Antichrist, and the false Christs, and Judas, and Theudas, and any other such, if such there have been.

"And appropriately enough hath he called the Scriptures a door; for they lead us to God, and open to us the way of acquaintance with God. They make the sheep. They guard them, and exclude the wolves from liberty to enter. Like some well secured door, [the Scripture] stops the way of ingress against heretics, placing us in all the security that we could wish for, and not allowing us to be deceived into error. Nor shall we, so long as we open not this [door] improperly, be easily overcome by our enemies. By means of it we shall be able to distinguish all, both such as are shepherds, and such as are not.

"And what means, into the sheepfold? To the sheep, and the care of providing for them; for he that useth not the Scriptures, but climbeth up some other way, that is, cutting out for himself a different road, and not using the legalized one, he is a thief.

"Here again you see him exhibiting agreement with the Father, in thus bringing forward the Scriptures for public use. To this end also said He unto the Jews, 'Search the Scriptures.' And he adduced Moses publicly among them, and cited him as a witness, and all the prophets likewise. For 'all they,' saith he, 'that have heard the prophets, shall come unto me.' And 'if ye believed Moses, ye would have believed me.' And here he suggested the same view metaphorically, by the use of words, 'climbeth up some other way;' pointing at the Scribes, who taught for doctrines the commandments of men, and were transgressors of the law; as he himself also intimated in that reproof which He addressed to them, saying, 'None of you keepeth the law.' Well, too, did he make use of the expression 'climbeth up,' and not 'cometh in,' as describing the act of a thief attempting to get over the wall, and engaged in a procedure, each step of which is accompanied with peril."—King p 65 (Op., Tom. viii., p. 346).

If any of our readers should imagine that the passages cited from Chrysostom are opposed to the teaching of the Church of Rome, or that the saint may have even had a sly reference to that church when speaking of the thief who entered not by the door of the holy Scriptures, but used some other way of access, we would beg such a reader to dismiss from his mind an impression founded only on the conduct of some modern writers in the Romish communion, but inconsistent with the teaching and practice of the ancient Church of Rome. To that Church we owe the translation of Scripture which has stood its ground the longest, and has occupied the greatest extent of territory, we mean, the Vulgate translation into Latin. This translation was, of course, not made for the benefit of those who had learning enough to read the Scriptures in the original language in which they were written; it must have been intended for the unlearned members of the Western Church, who had Latin then for their common language. And no doubt the learned men who translated the Bible out of Greek and Hebrew into Latin, would equally, and for the same reason, have translated it into French, or English, or Irish, if any of these had happened to be the language spoken by unlearned men in Italy in their day. And since it is a boast of the Church of Rome that her principles are unchangeable, our Catholic friends ought not to allow themselves to give credit to any of their communion who would endeavour to persuade them that the freest circulation of the Scriptures is opposed to the principles of their Church.

FARMING OPERATIONS FOR OCTOBER.

(From the Irish Farmers' Gazette.)

October should be the principal month for sowing wheat; if on naked fallow, properly and timely prepared last month would be better, when the land is sufficiently moist; but after clover, beans, peas, early potatoes, or vetches, the present month will be most suitable. Early sowing insures an early harvest, produces a well-harvested, bright, and plump grain, and prevents the losses sustained by late harvests, and a tempestous autumnal equinox. If sown of a naked fallow, the furrow should be from four to six weeks old, at least, to allow of sufficient consolidation; if after clover, it should be ploughed down for a fortnight, at least, to allow the furrows to close, consolidate, and the first fermentation of the rotting green clover to be over. It is now generally admitted to be advantageous to the after-crop that the clover be eaten down short, or cut close, before being ploughed in; if after peas, beans, vetches, or potatoes—provided the land has been well manured for those crops—no other preparation is necessary, than to plough up with a neat, close furrow, with a well-raised arrass, in broad sets, to give sufficient cover to the seed, if the land be dry enough to sow under the harrow; or if in narrow ridges, the seed to be lightly harrowed in, fresh mould raised from the furrows by the drill-grubber or furrow-plough, and finished by the shovel. Procure the seed as far from home as possible, and from an earlier soil than that to be sown. It should be of the present year's growth, well harvested, firm, and plump; and let no pains be spared in cleaning it from all weed seeds, in the first instance, and then pick out any mixtures, so that the sample may be pure of its kind; avoiding smutted, rusted, or mildewed samples.

Steeping.—The necessity of steeping wheat, as a preventive of smut and other fungoid diseases, has been so well established that it is not now necessary to recapitulate them. Those most effective are as follow:—Make a brine of salt and water, strong enough to float an egg, and of sufficient quantity to stand in the vessel about six inches higher than the seed; dissolve and add to the brine half a pound of sulphate of copper (bluestone) to every twenty tones of seed to be steeped, pour in the seed and let it stand forty-eight hours, frequently stirring it, and removing such seeds, from time to time, as may be found floating; then lift the seed, and set it to drain in a sieve, and, when drained, dry it well, by mixing it with some dry, finely-slaked lime; it should be mixed so thoroughly that each seed may be coated over with lime, and then passed through a sieve, which will prevent any two seeds sticking together.. It is then fit for sowing, and should not be heaped together for any length of time, lest it heat; and should unsuitable weather set in, it should be spread thinly on a dry floor, and turned over daily.

Dr. Steel, now secretary to the Royal Dublin Society, made experiments, in 1850, on the smut in wheat, and discovered the following excellent steep:—Chloride of lime 1lb., water 1 gallon; mix well together, stir it frequently for an hour, and then let it stand for a short time, draw off the clean solution, and in this steep the seed for two hours; it is then taken out, dried, and sown.

Sowing.—The modes are—First, broadcast, the most simple and the most common; in this way the land may be ploughed first in broad sets, the seed sown and harrowed in; or the land may be properly prepared, harrowed, the seed sown and ploughed in, with a light furrow, in wide sets, or in narrow ridges of about six furrows—the latter is a favourite method in Ireland, and also a good one. In some districts the land is ploughed into narrow ridges first, and after a stroke of the harrow, the seed sown, then well harrowed, and the covering finished from the furrows by the aid of a furrow-plough or drill-grubber, to raise fresh mould enough, and spread with the shovel; or the seed may be drilled, in continuous rows, with a drill-machine, after the land has been properly pulverized, and laid level with the harrows, or by ribbing with the common plough. By the latter mode the land is first ribbed, the seed sown broadcast, which falls into the open drills, and then harrowed, first lengthways with the open drills, and then lightly across. The seed comes up in drills, and is an excellent mode when the weather and the state of the land is suitable. Another mode is by dibbling, or dropping the seed in holes made by hand or machines constructed for the purpose; by this plan a great saving in seed is made, and many experiments go to prove it very productive; but in our climate the land is seldom found in a proper state to practice it on the great scale. Sowing wheat, or other corn crops, in drills has many advantages over the other modes. It gives facility of keeping the land clean, by either the hand or horse-hoe; air and light are more equally distributed through the crop, and at harvest time the work may be more equally distributed on the reapers, and there is a certainty of the work being more evenly and cleanly executed; and if to be laid down with clovers and grass seeds, the advantages are greater still, as the latter, instead of being smothered up and often destroyed almost as soon as they vegetate, have abundance of light and free air till they get perfectly established.

Winter Vetches, to stand the winter, should be sown some time this month, the earlier the better; and to insure productive crops a liberal dressing of manure will be necessary. For details see the operations for last month.

Winter Dun Oats should be sown early, not later than the middle of the month, if possible; but as dry weather when sowing is of the utmost consequence to the safety of this crop, it should be taken advantage of in getting it in, either earlier or later.

Here and Rye, if not sown previously, should be sown without loss of time.

Beans.—Russian beans should be sown by the middle of this month, in well-cleaned, deeply-ploughed, and well-manured land; the crop harvests early, and is an excellent preparation for wheat. This is also the best time to sow Mazagan beans.

Peas.—In land sufficiently dry and warm, a breadth of peas may be sown; but for a general crop, in most soils, early spring sowing is to be preferred.

Cabbages for use the latter end of spring and early summer, should be finally planted out this month; it is important that this crop should have time to make fresh roots, and get thoroughly established, before vegetation ceases; therefore, if a suitable breadth cannot be accomplished this month, it will be rather late next, and had better be put off till the first open weather in spring. The land should be well pulverized, dry, or well drained, and well manured.

Potatoes have lately suffered, and that heavily, in some places, particularly the Kemps; but the accounts are favourable in most districts regarding the safety of those called Protestants, or Scotch Downs, which are generally considered identical. Kemps taken up and either pitted or stored in houses, during the last month, though clean and free from disease, have rapidly become tainted. The present cool weather is favourable to their preservation. When taken up, keeping them dry and cool is of the first importance, and dry lofts will be the best place to store them; in pits, and on damp, ill-ventilated floors, on the ground floor, they decay rapidly. But care should be taken to cover them with dry litter, to exclude the light from those intended for table use, otherwise they will become green and ill-flavoured; those for seed are the better of being exposed. If lofts cannot be spared, the best plan will be to prepare beds of dry land, as if for planting, and pack the potatoes over it closely, but as little in contact as possible, and cover them up with six or eight inches of earth, to exclude air and frost. In this way we have kept them safe till the spring every year since the first great failure, and a rood of ground will contain the produce of several acres. Mixing peat-charcoal, or dry peat-mould mixed with lime, amongst the potatoes in store will have the most beneficial effect. If either of those modes are unattainable, and that the land is not wanted for immediate use, it will be better to let the crop lie in the land, first removing the haulm, and covering with fresh earth, and dig them out as wanted. If pits must be adopted, they should be well thatched with straw only, for some time, to exclude rain and frost, and not put together in such quantities as to endanger heating; or if straw cannot be had, cover very lightly with earth. We strongly recommend planting to proceed cotemporaneously with the lifting; in dry land they may be planted in drills, but as we find their safety depends on the free escape of the watery element, we strongly recommend the lazy-bed system for potato culture.

Chicory.—By the end of this month the chicory roots will be sufficiently matured for lifting. When lifted, they should be carted to a convenient washing place, washed clean, sliced and kiln-dried.

Parsnips and Carrots should be lifted and stored when the leaves begin to get discoloured; store them in heaps three or four feet wide and as many high, bringing them to a point at top, and thatch well with straw, to keep out rain and frost; some fine dry sand or dry turf-mould will keep them fresh and sound. Parsnips for table use are best left in the ground, and lifted as required.

Swedes and Mangels should be lifted and stored in a similar manner, in dry weather, as soon as ripe, which may be from the middle to the end of the month, or as soon as frost threatens. The heaps may be made six or seven feet wide, and as many high. Some brushwood laid in in layers, as the heaps are building, will be of service in preventing the heaps from tumbling down, and facilitate the thatching. If the weather be mild these roots may continue growing, or commence a new growth; but as the increase in size at such a period is chiefly watery fluid, and, from the absence of sun to elaborate the more nutritive components, the increased size is found, from experience and analysis, not to compensate for the deterioration of the more nutritive elements, and the keeping properties of the roots much injured, so that early lifting is to be recommended.

Stall-Feeding.—The cattle intended for stalls should now be housed, as the nights are getting long and cold, and the herbage weak and watery; so that by leaving them longer out, they would be rather losing than improving in condition. After housing, they should have plenty of free air, lest they perspire too much, and get cold; and let them have but moderate supplies of green food or roots in the beginning, to avoid scouring.

Milch Cows will require some extra assistance henceforth to keep them up as much as possible to their usual quantum of milk, or it will rapidly decrease. Grains, cabbages, turnips, mangel, leaves, &c., will now be in requisition, and well paid for in this way.

Store Cattle may still lay out, but should have shelter and dry lying at night.

CAN THE INFALLIBILITY OF THE CHURCH BE PROVED FROM SCRIPTURE?

Once upon a time a blind man went astray in the middle of a wood, at a considerable distance from a certain large town. The paths were so entangled that, even had he the use of eye-sight, it would have been almost impossible for him to have discovered the right way; and as the wood was never traversed by any passenger, there was no hope of his obtaining any assistance. But necessity is the mother of invention. As his life depended on his getting out, his ingenuity was sharpened to such a degree that he could not be detained by any ordinary obstacle. So, after considerable thought, he invented and put in practice a very simple way of making his escape. Can any of our readers guess how? Why, he just went to the town and got a guide, and then the guide showed him the way out.

What a nonsensical story! exclaims a reader; why, if the blind man could not find his way, how could he get to the town to look for a guide; or supposing that he did, by any chance, make his way to the town, what need would he then have for a guide out of the wood? Well, really, perhaps there is some force in this objection. All we can do is, to request those readers who are so severely critical upon a poor little story, told only for their amusement, to require at least as much consistency and plausibility in the proofs offered to them of a truth, which they are told it is essential to their salvation they should believe. And now for the application of our story.

When the advocates of the Church of Rome endeavour to form a proof by arguments from reason for the infallibility of their Church, the line they generally take is to try to make out that it is impossible for men, by the exercise of their private judgment, to arrive at any certainty on matters of religion. Those who suppose that they might possibly obtain some knowledge of God's truth from the study of his Word, are told that without the authority of an infallible guide it is impossible for them to know what books deserve to be counted as Scripture; or, supposing this ascertained, that it would be impossible for them, without an infallible interpreter, to arrive at a knowledge of the meaning of the Bible. In short, the advocates of the Church of Rome represent men, without the help of an infallible guide, to be in as helpless a condition as the blind man in the wood, of whom we have just told.

But, then, unfortunately, the next thing they have to do is, to give some proof that the infallible guide actually exists, whom they represent to be so necessary. They know that they cannot expect their Church's claims to be received on her bare word alone: and so they are compelled to bring forward some proofs from reason and Scripture. But who is to judge of these proofs? Why, just the individual whose private judgment they have represented as so little trustworthy. At one time they talk as if without the Church's authority an individual could not prove by Scripture testimony such fundamental truths as the atonement or the Divinity of our Lord. At another time, they suppose the same individual capable of solving the most difficult problem in all theology—namely, the eliciting from Scripture a proof of the infallibility of the Church of Rome. This is exactly sending the blind man a long journey to look for his guide.

Now, just consider how many things the private Christian must have accomplished before he can obtain from Scripture a proof of the existence of an infallible Church. He must know—(1) That the Scripture is the Word of God—(2) That it has been brought down pure and uncorrupted to us—(3) He must be able to understand the meaning of it—(4) Supposing that he has proved from Scripture that some Church is infallible, he must know what a Church is, and what constitutes a body of men to be a Church—(5) Since there are several bodies of men calling themselves Churches, and condemning one another as guilty of error, schism, and heresy, he must ascertain which of them is that society where infallibility is to be found—(6) If in the Church selected there be different opinions as to the seat of infallibility, he must be well assured in whom this great privilege is vested before he can be bound to acknowledge and submit to it—and (7) If it be found that everything propounded by the guide selected is not alleged to be infallible, he must have some rule for knowing when his infallible guide is speaking infallibly, and when he is not. All this the private Christian must perform without the help of any infallible guide, for they are the steps absolutely necessary in the process of finding one. If he can arrive at certainty on these points by the exercise of his private judgment, then he may very well dispense with any infallible guide, and trust his private judgment a good deal further. If he is so skilful in diving into the mysteries of Scripture as to be able to elicit from the text—"Thou art Peter, and on this rock I will build my Church," the doctrine—The Bishop of Rome is infallible—he can scarcely require a guide to tell him the meaning of texts so comparatively plain, as "God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son that whosoever believeth on him should not perish, but have everlasting life."

When therefore we proceed to discuss the meaning of the texts which are brought forward in proof of the infallibility of the Church of Rome, we are arguing with opponents who are beaten before the battle commences. By offering texts at all in proof of such a doctrine, they place themselves in an untenable position. They rest the authority of Scripture on the infallibility of the Church, and now they want to establish the infallibility of the Church by the authority of Scripture. This is the vicious circle out of which the advocates of Romanism never have been able to escape.

But whether they are consistent in appealing to Scripture or no, it is ground we are heartily glad to get them on; and so, without further preface, we go on to consider the passages they usually bring forward.

And first, then, we shall take a class of passages, both from the Old and New Testament, which are brought forward as describing the perfection and purity of the Church. We take as specimens, for the most part, those selected by the writer of THE TOUCHSTONE.

Isaiah lix. 20, 21.—"The Redeemer shall come to Zion, and unto them that turn from transgression in Jacob. As for me, this is my covenant with them, saith the Lord: my Spirit that is upon thee, and my words which I have put in thy mouth shall not depart out of thy mouth, nor out of the mouth of thy seed, nor out of the mouth of thy seed's seed, saith the Lord, from henceforth and for ever."

Ps. lxxii. 5, 7.—"They shall fear thee as long as the sun and moon endure, throughout all generations. In his days shall the righteous flourish, and abundance of peace so long as the moon endureth."

Isaiah liv. 9.—"As I have sworn that the waters of Noah should no more go over the earth, so I have sworn that I would not be wroth with thee, nor rebuke thee. For the mountains shall depart, and the hills be removed, but my kindness shall not depart from thee; neither shall the covenant of my peace be removed, saith the Lord that hath mercy upon thee."

Eph.* v. 25, 26, 27.—"Christ also loved the Church, and gave himself for it: that he might sanctify and cleanse it with the washing of water by the word, and present it to himself, a glorious Church, not having spot or wrinkle or any such thing; but that it should be holy and without blemish."

We are content not to raise any question as to the applicability to the Christian Church of the passages here alleged from the Old Testament. None of them certainly speak in loftier language of the glories of the Church than that last quoted from the New. But then it must be remembered that the Church consists of two parts—a Church militant, and a Church triumphant: that the Church has two conditions—a present one of imperfection and trial, a future one of glory and happiness. We are not warranted in applying to the one state the promises which refer to the other. If the Church be not in a position to claim as already fulfilled the promises of her being holy, pure, and without blemish, neither may she assert for her doctrine greater perfection than for her practice. None of the prophecies quoted justify us in separating the one from the other; nay, they speak even more strongly of the righteousness and peace which was to abound in her, than of the truth by which she was to be distinguished. If, then, we prove by unquestionable Roman Catholic authority, that these promises of glory and perfection are not fulfilled in the present state of the Church, we may fairly set these texts aside as having no bearing upon the present question.

First, then, we cite the declaration of Pope Adrian II. by his nuncio, at the imperial diet of Nuremberg (1522). "We know that for a long time there have existed many abominations in this holy See, abuses of spiritual things, excesses in the exercise of jurisdiction: all things, in short, have been changed and perverted. Nor need we wonder that corruption has descended from the head to the members, from the Supreme Pontiff to the inferior prelates. We have all, that is, prelates and ecclesiastics, turned aside each one to his own way, for none of us have done well, no not one."—Rainald. Ann. Eccl. An. 1522, n. 66., tom. xx., p. 365.

Secondly, we offer the testimony of Cardinal Bellarmine—"Some years before the rise of the Lutheran and Calvinistic heresy, according to the testimony of those who were then alive, there was almost an entire abandonment of equity in the ecclesiastical judgments; in morals no discipline; in sacred literature, no erudition; in Divine things, no reverence; religion was almost extinct."—Concio xxviii. Opp. vi. 296. Colon. 1617.

We could add abundance of other Roman Catholic acknowledgments that the Church, in her present state, is very far indeed from being in a position to claim, as her own, the character of being a glorious Church, free from spot or wrinkle or any such thing.

We may, therefore, hence deduce a general caution; before we apply any statement of the Scripture to the Church, we must ascertain what part of the Church, and what state of the Church is there spoken of. It is only by not attending to this caution men have thought they had made out a Scriptural proof that the Church which voted image-worship lawful, and the Books of the Maccabees canonical, was free from error; and they might make out exactly as good a proof from the texts we have given, that the Church which had Alexander VI. for its head was free from sin.*

The next texts we shall consider are our Lord's promises.—Matthew xvi. 18.—"The gates of hell shall not prevail against it;" and Matthew xxviii. 20,—"Lo I am with you always, even unto the end of the world."

We may fairly infer from these words the perpetual existence of the Church, and that our Lord has promised it his constant protection; but there is not a word here about infallibility. These texts would have force, if Protestants asserted that the Church had become extinct in the sixteenth century, and that Luther had founded a new Church; but, on the contrary, they always speak of the event which then occurred as a reformation of the Church, implying that she existed before, though not in a pure state. Protestants believe that Christ always has been with his Church, and has never withdrawn his protection from it. There is no more signal proof of this than the history of those times; when the gates of hell made their fiercest assault against the Church, when an infidel Pope (Leo X.) was recognised as the Head of the Church; when, according to the description just quoted from Bellarmine, there was in morals no discipline, in Divine

* This passage from Ephesians is one of those cited by Mr. Rourke, and affords, according to him, an invincible demonstration that the Church never rebelled against Christ, by error, idolatry, or false worship. Does he not see that the same text affords just as good a demonstration that she never rebelled against him by sin, that she was never in such a state that religion could be said to be "almost extinct?"

Mr. Rourke adds, that if the Church was liable to err, Christ could not love her! It approaches to blasphemy to deny the love of our Saviour, because of the imperfections which we experience in this sinful world.—See infrà, p. 128.

things no reverence, religion was almost extinct. Even in those worst of times she still retained the germs of vitality: she still preserved the fundamental doctrines of the Gospel: she still was the depository of the Word of God; and when religion was re-animated in the world, it was not by the overthrow of the Church and the institution of a new society, but by the exertions of teachers from her own bosom, who had nothing to do but to clear her from modern corruptions, to claim their true place for the doctrines which had been from the beginning, using no other instrument of reformation, than the Scriptures, which she had never parted with.

Matthew xviii. 17.—"Hear the Church."

This is one of the texts which, in want of better, are sometimes brought forward to prove the infallibility of the Church. We have before had occasion to show how little it has to do with that question, and here we again print the context of the passage, that those readers who are not familiar with the Bible may be able to see how very unfair is the controversial use which has been attempted to be made of this text:—

"If thy brother trespass against thee, go and tell him his fault between thee and him alone: if he shall hear thee, thou hast gained thy brother; but if he will not hear thee, then take with thee one or two more, that in the mouth of two or three witnesses every word may be established. And if he shall neglect to hear them, tell it unto the Church; but if he neglect to hear the Church, let him be unto thee as a heathen man and a publican."

Here, then, we see that the text refers not to questions of doctrine at all, but to private disputes between Christians, and especially at the time when they formed a small society in the midst of heathens. They are directed, if they fail to settle their differences amicably among themselves, or by the intervention of friends, to bring the case—not before a heathen law court (see 1 Cor. vi.), but before the Church. Of course it does not mean the Church universal, which could not possibly take cognizance of every private dispute among Christians, but the particular congregation to which the parties belonged. And either party refusing to submit to the arbitration of the Church was to be treated as a heathen—as excommunicate from their society. All this is so very plain and simple that we can scarcely acquit of dishonesty those controversialists who wrest what is said about the decisions of particular churches on points of private difference between Christians, as if it were meant of decisions of the universal Church in points of doctrine.

1 Tim. iii. 15, 16—"That thou mayest know how thou oughtest to behave thyself in the house of God, which is the Church of the living God, the pillar and ground of the truth. And without controversy great is the mystery of godliness—God was manifest in the flesh, justified in the spirit, seen of angels, preached to the Gentiles, believed on in the world, received up into glory."

On the words "pillar and ground of the truth," applied to the Church in the foregoing text, an argument is founded in behalf of the infallibility of the Church.

As our article has already run to great length, we shall not raise a question as to whether the words "pillar and ground of the truth" refer to the Church at all; although Gregory Nyssen and other Fathers understand them here as spoken of Timothy himself, while other distinguished men read them in connection with what follows, understanding, by the "pillar and ground of the truth," those fundamental doctrines contained in the 16th verse; just in the same way that the Apostle's Creed is called by so many Fathers the pillar of the truth (Epiphanius), the foundation of the faith (Augustine), &c. But understanding the words as referring to the Church, there is no difficulty in explaining them. The Church is that body which preserves and keeps, which maintains and upholds, the Christian faith; and just as heretical congregations were the pillars and stays of falsehood, maintained and defended it, testified to it and endeavoured to continue it to posterity; just so is the Church the pillar and ground of truth; it professes the Christian faith, and maintains it as the truth of God, notwithstanding all the persecutions of its enemies.

Neither is there any difficulty in showing what the words do not mean. The Church is not the foundation on which the truth is built, and is not that which gives it authority and makes it be truth. On the contrary, the truth is the foundation on which the Church is built, and is what makes it to be a Church. So St. Chrysostom, on this very passage, says—"The truth is the pillar and ground of the Church," and we have Scripture testimony to the same position.—Eph. ii. 20, 21, 22; Matthew xvi. 18.

Again, nothing is more certain than that this phrase, "pillar and ground of the truth," did not, in the judgment of the early Church, imply infallibility. It is applied, as we have said, by Gregory Nyssen, to Timothy, by St. Basil to Musonius, Bishop of Neo Cæsarea, Ep. 67; to Athanasius of Ancyra, Ep. 62; by Gregory Nyssen to Basil, Or. 19; to Athanasius, Or. 23; to Eusebius of Samosata, Ep. 29. We could add to our list, but we may give instead the statement of Gregory Nyssen, that every pious member of the Church may lay claim to this title. The following is his explanation of the passage in question; and though, in our private judgment, it is not the most natural way of interpreting the text to refer the words to Timothy, yet those who have sworn (as all Roman Catholic priests have once) to interpret Scripture according to the unanimous consent of the Fathers, will never hereafter, we hope, venture to apply this text to the Catholic Church—"Paul, while he builds up the illustrious Timothy as a house to receive God, places in it these two pillars, on one of which he inscribes the name of faith, and on the other conscience. . . . By both these we may become such pillars as Peter, and James, and John, or if there be any one else that hath been, or shall be worthy of this name. For whosoever is perfected in these two commandments [to love God, and to love his neighbour], he is framed to be a pillar and ground of the truth, according to the language of the Apostle."—Hom. 14, in Cant. Cantic., vol. i., p. 684. Paris, 1638. Now, since it will not be pretended that Musonius, or Basil, or Eusebius, or that every pious Christian is infallible, we see that it is a modern fancy that these words "pillar and ground of the truth" imply infallibility.

We have not space for the consideration of more texts; but we have the satisfaction of thinking that we have devoted the limited space at our disposal to the discussion of those texts which the believers in the infallibility of the Church think to be the strongest in their favour. And the conclusion from the whole is, that there is not one whit more Scriptural ground for believing in an infallible Church than in an impeccable Church—that though our Lord is ever with his Church—though he has given it his Spirit, who is both a Spirit of truth and a Spirit of holiness—though that Spirit has prevented the sin and error of the world from shutting out his people from eternal life, yet that perfect truth or perfect holiness are not attainable in the present dispensation.

ALEXANDER VI. AND HENRY VIII.

IT is a matter of common observation, that when one of two rival disputants is worsted in an argument, he very frequently loses his temper, and begins to abuse his opponents, or his opponents' supposed friends and supporters. Sometimes, too, when a man feels that his cause is entirely indefensible, he is apt to have recourse to personal invective, in the hope that, by distracting the attention of his adversary from the real point at issue, he may be enabled to avoid a defeat which would otherwise have been inevitable. These attempts to make invective supply the want of argument, remind us of the story of the lawyer, who being retained in a cause in which justice was not exactly on his side, on opening his brief found only the concise instructions—"No case; abuse the plaintiff's attorney."

Our Skibbereen correspondent, Mr. James Willson, whose letter we printed at length in our last number, and from whom we have received another letter since indited in a similar spirit, appears to act on the principle just alluded to. Unwilling or unable to enter the fair field of argument, he has had recourse to the ignoble weapons of abuse and invective. Those persons who were formerly instrumental in promoting the cause of the Reformation are, of course, the objects of his bitterest censure. According to him, "the murderous, the adulterous, the incestuous King Henry VIII. was the founder of the iniquitous, perjuring, antichristian" Church of England. He stigmatizes Luther as "an envious, proud friar, the firebrand of hell, the arch-heretic." And he finally winds up his denunciations by the sweeping assertion that we have "calumniated Popes, Popery, bishops, priests, monks, nuns, the confessional—in fact, anything Catholic—all Christianity."

To the charge against ourselves, urged as it is without a shadow of proof or foundation, we shall not condescend to offer a word of reply. And we may safely leave the character of the great German reformer to the judgment of more cool and dispassionate critics than Mr. Willson of Skibbereen. It was wittily observed by Erasmus, in the life-time of Luther, in reference to the hostile attacks which were then made upon him—"Luther has committed two unpardonable faults: he touched the monks' bellies and the Pope's crown." And we may add that the deadly enmity of some Roman Catholic writers to the memory of Luther only proves how keenly they feel the fatal injury which was inflicted upon the Church of Rome by his means.

As regards the character of Henry VIII., however, and his connection with the English Reformation, we desire, more for our readers' sake than our own, to say a few words. This has always been a favourite topic with Roman Catholic controversialists, who have sought, by exposing the faults of that monarch's history, to throw discredit on the origin of the great religious movement which severed England from the Papal See. And yet, it needs but a moment's reflection to see that this question is one which is entirely irrelevant to the real point at issue between the two Churches—namely, the truth or falsehood of the doctrines which they respectively hold.

Let it be granted, for the sake of argument, that the character of Henry VIII. was as bad, and his motives as corrupt, as his worst enemies have represented them to be, we ask, what has this to do with the religious part of the controversy, the only part in which people of the present day have any real interest or concern? The character of the founder of a new religion may, indeed, be fairly called in question, when we wish to form a judgment as to the nature of the religious system which he taught. We may point out the features of the Mahometan creed, for example, which were impressed upon it by the peculiar temperament and position of Mahomet himself; but this analogy is totally inapplicable to the case of the English Reformation. Our readers do not need to be told that the Church of England claims to be in possession of a system of Divine truth, which was taught by Christ and his Apostles, and with which the character of Henry VIII. has as little to do as that of Confucius.

We assert, in opposition to the Church of Rome, that the sacrifice of the mass is unscriptural and unlawful: is it any answer to be told that Henry VIII. was a cruel and inconstant husband? We call in question the supremacy and infallibility of the Pope; we are met by the reply, that Henry VIII. beheaded Catherine Howard. We believe that there is but one Mediator, and that invocation of saints is forbidden: "no matter," it is said, "the Church of England was founded by a monster who had six wives!" Surely such puerile attempts to mislead inquirers from the real and momentous points at issue only indicate the inherent weakness of the adversary's cause.

But, perhaps, a more effective way of checking such a line of controversy for the future will be, to show how easily it can be retorted against Roman Catholics themselves. As the character of Henry VIII. has been so frequently brought upon the stage by Romish controversialists, it can scarcely be deemed unreasonable to compare the personal history of this monarch with that of some contemporaneous Pope. This comparison is, indeed, almost forced upon us by the arguments of one of our chief opponents. Cardinal Bellarmine, as it is well known, has specified "holiness of life of the doctors of the Church" as one of his "notes" whereby the true Church may be distinguished; and where are we to look for holiness, if not in the Church's infallible head, who claims the title of "His Holiness" as his proper and peculiar designation? Our only apprehension is, lest the ghost of the king may haunt us for our unfairness, in venturing to expect as much virtue and self-denial from a mere earthly monarch, as from the wearer of the triple crown—the vicar and vicegerent of Christ upon earth.

We propose, therefore, for the information of our readers, to draw a brief parallel between Henry VIII. and the contemporaneous (or nearly contemporaneous)* Pontiff, Alexander VI. We shall perform this task with the strictest fairness and impartiality; and for this end, the facts relating to the history of the Pope shall be taken from the most unimpeachable Roman Catholic authorities, Guiccardini, Burchard,† Moreri, Cardinal Bembo, and others.

In estimating the character of Henry VIII. we are prepared, for the sake of brevity, to admit all, or nearly all, that his enemies have laid to his charge. The most eminent English historian who has treated of his reign, declares that he was violent, cruel, profuse, rapacious, bigoted, and unjust. Lest our Roman Catholic readers should feel any undue triumph in this matter, however, we must remind them of a fact which is often forgotten—namely, that up to the very end of his life the religious opinions of this king were much more akin to those of the Church of Rome than the Church of England. In proof of this assertion, we need only refer to the atrocious Act of Six Articles, which he compelled his parliament to pass in 1539, a few years before the close of his reign.‡ By this Act all persons who denied the doctrine of the real presence were condemned to be burnt; and the denial of communion in one kind, of the perpetual obligation of vows of chastity, of private masses, of the celibacy of the clergy, or of auricular confession, subjected the offender to the forfeiture of all his goods and chattels, and imprisonment during the king's pleasure. It is plain, therefore, that a monarch who enforced upon his subjects, under such severe penalties, the belief of all these points of orthodox Roman Catholic belief, must have been himself at heart much more of a Roman Catholic than a Protestant.

Let us now turn our eyes from the King to the Pontiff. Roderigo Lenzuoli was descended from a noble Spanish family. On the elevation of his maternal uncle, Alfonso Borgia, to the pontificate, under the title of Calixtus III., Roderigo was called to Rome, and, taking the name of Borgia, he was appointed Archbishop of Valencia, and Cardinal of S. Nicolo. After filling these high dignities for more than thirty-five years, he was elected Pope, under the title of Alexander VI.

So far, all the advantages were on the side of the Pontiff. Henry at his accession was young and inexperienced, and just set free from parental control. Alexander VI. had for years filled high ecclesiastical functions, imposing grave responsibilities; and he had reached the mature age of sixty before he was elected to fill the Papal throne. We may naturally expect, therefore, to find the latter free from those faults and vices which disgraced the character of the former.

But how stands the case? Alexander's first act was to purchase the Popedom by the most flagitious bribery. We are told, in the diary of his Chamberlain Burchard, which

* A period of only six years intervened between the death of Alexander VI. and Henry's succession to the throne. The former event happened in 1503, the latter in 1509.

† Burchard was Master of the Ceremonies to Alexander VI., and an eye-witness of many of the events which he describes. His diary, written in a curious mixture of Latin, French, and Italian, was published at Hanover, in 1696.

‡ See the CATHOLIC LAYMAN, Vol. I., p. 121, for a full account of this public record of Henry VIII.th's religious sentiments is still extant,* that four mules, laden with silver, were sent to one of the Cardinals, and five thousand gold crowns to another, for the purchase of their respective votes. Out of the entire conclave, there were only five Cardinals who did not sell their votes!

When Simon Magus offered money to Saint Peter for the purchase of a spiritual gift, Scripture records the Apostle's indignant reply (Acts viii. 20)—"Thy money perish with thee, because thou hast thought that the gift of God may be purchased with money." And yet, after the lapse of fifteen centuries from the time that Saint Peter uttered these words, what a scene do we behold in the capital of the Christian world? The office of highest rank and dignity in the Church—that office which claims to have been founded by the great Apostle himself, and which is supposed to confer the gift of infallibility—is put up, as it were, for sale, and shamelessly disposed of to the highest bidder! After this, who will venture to assert that the Church did not stand in need of a reformation?

We have seen how Alexander VI. secured his elevation to the Popedom: let us now inquire how he conducted himself in his office. Rome was filled with scenes of rapine and violence. Everything of which the clergy were possessed was, upon their decease, claimed by the Pope, as his property; so that no prelate or cardinal was allowed to make a will. The sums arising from the benefices while vacant were likewise secured; and the benefices themselves sold like common goods in a market. This abuse was carried to such a scandalous excess, that, as Cardinal Bembo observes in his History of Venice, the secular princes were obliged to provide against the evil, by prohibiting their subjects, under the penalty of banishment, from going to purchase benefices with their money at Rome.† It was with reference to these shameful transactions of the Pontiff that the well-known pasquinade (one of the first of its kind) was composed:—

Vendit Alexander claves, altaria, Christum.
Vendere jure potest; emerat ille prius.

"Alexander sells the keys, the altars, Christ himself;
He has a right to sell them—he had bought them before."

Cruelty was another feature in the character of this Pope. We have only space to mention a single instance.‡ The Pope having heard that Giovanni Lorenzo, a Venetian, had written some satires against him, ordered him to be seized and thrown into prison. The Venetian senate sent orders to their ambassadors at Rome to intercede with the Pope in his behalf. To this the Pope replied, "that he was sorry he could not comply with their request, because the person for whom they interceded was already put to death by his orders, and, therefore, their intercession came too late." And, indeed, it was so, for the unfortunate man had been ordered to be strangled, and thrown into the Tiber.

We are obliged to touch but lightly upon the profligacy of the Pope's private life, not for want of ample materials, but because the subject is too revolting to admit of being treated fully in a paper intended for general circulation. Henry VIII. has been charged, and justly, with sensuality, and with inhuman conduct towards his wives. But he had not, like Alexander, made a vow of celibacy, and then lived for many years in open disregard of every precept of morality. We must pass over, for the reason just assigned, the history of the Pontiff's intrigue with Vanozza, which commenced in Spain, and was continued for many years after his removal to Rome. We must pass over the history of his four sons (one of whom was the notorious Cæsar Borgia), and of his daughter Lucretia, upon whose memory, as well as that of her father and brother, the epitaph of Pontano has cast such an indelible blot.§ Without dwelling further, however, on the crimes of which his Holiness is accused, and in comparison with which Henry VIII. may be considered almost a miracle of continence, we transcribe, in the note below, an account of a scene which took place in the Pontifical Palace, on a Sunday evening, in October, 1502, which will give some idea of this Pope's shameless disregard of decency. As the passage is too gross to be translated, we give it in the original Latin, from the diary of Burchard, the Pope's Master of the Ceremonies, who appears to have been present at the disgraceful scene which he so circumstantially describes.‖

We hasten on to the closing scene in the life of the Pontiff. We are informed by Guiccardini, as a well-known fact, that "it was the frequent custom both of Alexander and of his son, Cæsar Borgia, to use poison, not only to avenge themselves upon their enemies, but still more, for the wicked purpose of robbing rich courtiers, cardinals, and others of their properties, and appropriating them to their own use."* Acting upon this plan, the Pope and his son determined to promote nine of the richest of the Prelates to be Cardinals, whom they resolved to dispatch by poison immediately after their promotion. But their scheme proved fatal to themselves. They invited the new Cardinals to sup at a vineyard, near the Vatican, belonging to Cardinal Adriano di Corneto, who, as he was extremely rich, was among the rest singled out to die by the same poison. Cæsar Borgia, in order to execute this design, sent to the Pope's butler, who was to wait at supper, some particular flasks of wine, which he had mixed with a certain poison, called Canterelle, which he had frequently made use of upon similar occasions. He gave the butler a strict charge that none should taste of it but those whom he should particularly direct.

Accordingly, on the 10th of August, the Pope and Cæsar, about the cool of the evening, came to the vineyard, where they were to sup. Some authors relate, that the Pope usually carried the consecrated host in a gold box, having been informed by a certain astrologer that while he carried the holy wafer about with him he should never die; but having now left it by accident in his apartment in the Vatican, as soon as he missed it, he dispatched Monsignor Caraffa to his chamber to bring it to him. While Caraffa was gone, Alexander being thirsty, and the weather exceedingly hot, desired the under butler to give him something to drink before he sat down to supper; the chief butler having gone to the Vatican to fetch a salver of peaches which he had forgotten. The under butler finding six particular flasks of wine in a corner, imagined that they contained better wine than the rest, and therefore poured out a glassful of the poisoned liquor, and gave it to the Pope, and Cæsar Borgia. The latter, by the vigour of his youth, and the force of the powerful antidotes given to him by his physicians, escaped the effects of the poison; but Alexander, after lingering for a week in excruciating torments, died on the 18th of August, 1503, in the seventy-second year of his age.

"The following day," as Guiccardini relates,† "his corpse was carried, according to the custom of the Popes, into the Church of St. Peter. It was black, swollen, and disfigured, exhibiting the most manifest signs of poison. The whole city of Rome ran with incredible joy into St. Peter's to gaze upon the dead body of Alexander. They could not satisfy their eager desire to behold that serpent at last crushed, who, by his boundless ambition and destructive perfidy, by numberless examples of horrible cruelty and insatiable lust, by his unheard of avarice, and indiscriminate sale of every object, sacred and profane, had infected the whole world."

The same unfavourable estimate of the character of the Pontiff was formed by the historian Machiavelli, a devoted adherent of the family of Borgia, and, therefore, disposed to dwell as lightly as possible upon the dark features of his personal history; yet even he felt himself constrained to characterize his life and conduct by three ominous words—lust, simony, and cruelty.‡

Such was the fearful career of Pope Alexander VI. The world, perhaps, never beheld such an example of a notorious disregard of the holiest obligations, of open and abandoned profligacy, of a daring violation of all laws, human and divine. The Christian Church had long beheld and mourned over the faults and vices of preceding Pontiffs, and had often loudly called for a reform, both in the Head and members. The Popes, for a long series of years, had disregarded these warnings, and persevered in the same reckless course of conduct; but the patience of the world at length reached its limit; the cup was now nearly full, and the flagrant crimes of Alexander and his successor, Julius, caused it at length to overflow. Within fifteen years after the death of Alexander, the REFORMATION began;. and we ask again, what impartial inquirer, after reading the history of that Pontiff, and the system of which he formed a part, will venture to assert that the Church did not stand in need of such a change?

When Roman Catholics attempt (as they often do) to draw attention away from more important questions to the personal character of those who brought that Reformation about, we think their Protestant friends will now know how to bring them speedily back to more profitable subjects of discussion, by inviting them to compare the personal character of the very worst of the reformers with that of the head of the Roman Catholic Church, His Holiness Alexander VI.

DOES THE WORSHIP OF THE CHURCH OF ROME ANSWER THE TRUE ENDS OF DEVOTION?

NO. II.

WE attempted to show in our last, by way of clearing our path towards the discussion of this momentous question, that what too often pass in the world as good works but little deserve that name, and that practical men find it to be a truth that by their own good works they cannot merit heaven or earn salvation.

The question naturally arises, do we then wish to discountenance good works, or wish good works to be deemed useless or impracticable, because we hold that no amount of good works will gain a man entrance into Christ's heavenly kingdom? This we know is a favourite assertion of the advocates of the Church of Rome against those who hold the Scriptural doctrine of justification by faith, as if it were the inevitable result of that doctrine, that men who believe in it should disregard the moral law or the code of practical benevolence which our Blessed Lord so eminently taught, both by precept and example, while on earth; as if, in short, good works must be useless and superfluous, unless as in themselves constituting the passport to heaven, or as if all must be Antinomians, or opposers of the moral law of the Gospel, who do not hold the doctrine of human merit as the foundation of salvation.

Now, we hope to be able to establish the very reverse, and not only to show that the same Holy Scriptures which plainly inculcate the doctrine of justification by faith, and teach that man's salvation is the free gift of God—not the purchase by man for himself, or of his own deserving—also demonstrate that without holiness no man can see the Lord, and everywhere preach the strictest and purest morality and practical benevolence; but viewing the matter in a purely philosophical point of view, we hope to show there is no other way of doing the will of our Heavenly Father than by simply embracing the Gospel offer of a free, unmerited salvation, which is the gift of God, through Jesus Christ.*

Does it thence follow that we would discountenance good works or deem them useless or impracticable? God forbid. It is, on the contrary, because we are persuaded that it is the only way to produce and encourage real good works that we can, in a spirit of what we believe to be true philosophy, embrace the doctrines of Christianity as written in the pages of Holy Writ. When you want man to do good works before his heart is renewed and rendered happy by the joy of a full pardon and free salvation, you are, in our judgment, wanting a tree to bring forth fruit before it is planted. The Gospel plants the tree by the roots and not by the branches; it sows the love of God in the heart, through gratitude for salvation, in order to produce good works, and the good works, thus produced, are the fruits of humility, instead of the fruits of pride; a small difference, perhaps, in the eye of man, who is satisfied with the outward appearances, but immense in the sight of God, who looks at the immortal soul destined to live with him throughout eternity, and has taught us, in his Holy Word, that it was not the Pharisee who fasted twice in the week and gave tithes of all that he possessed, but the Publican who smote upon his breast, saying, God be merciful to me a sinner, that was accepted with him. "I say unto you, this man went down to his house justified rather than the other: because every one that exalteth himself shall be humbled, but he that humbleth himself shall be exalted."—Luke xviii. 14 (Douay Bible).

There are, in fact, two classes of so-called good works—false good works, which are the result of fear, and real good works, which alone can spring from love.

What happens in all those religions which demand good works under pain of damnation? They obtain what they call good works—by fear. Fear is the mainspring employed in all false religions to produce goodness; fear is the great secret lever by which priestcraft, in all ages, has worked upon mankind, to keep up their influence and swell their fortunes. The great apostle, St. Paul, everywhere in his writings urges the assurance of salvation—free, full, unmerited, certain salvation—on those whose hearts he wants to rejoice, and whose life he wants to sanctify. Ask the priests of Rome when a man is sure of going to heaven? They will tell you, "never;" but they urge the fear of hell, as if they wished to preserve and speculate upon it,† as the principal means of influencing the believer, and the fear of purgatory, as if Christ had never promised pardon to the penitent thief upon the cross, and

† We have at this moment before us a book entitled "Hell Opened to Christians," illustrated by a series of engravings representing the infernal torments in a style well calculated to excite horror among the ignorant, but little likely, we think, to awaken piety or love to God in the soul of any one. We shall have occasion to deal with this tract again more fully in a future number.

as if all who felt their sinfulness (and who is there who does not?) must suffer the bitter pains of purgatorial fire before they could possibly claim the benefit of God's promises to the repentant sinner who believes truly in the Lord Jesus Christ, and looks to his merits alone for salvation. Do they ever fix the duration of purgatory? Have they even proved its existence? All is left doubtful, nothing fixed, nothing certain—fear during life, fear after death, fear always.

Thoughtful men cannot fail at times to ask, can it be possible that any of them urge this fear in order to have the opportunity of delivering man from that (imaginary) place by paid masses? To fix the duration of purgatory would be to put an end at the same time to fear, and the liberality of relations, weeping for the dead, which flows from it. If you were told that purgatory would last for your father a million of years, you would possibly have no masses said, thinking that the few you could get performed would be nearly useless. If you were told it will last only a week, you would have none said either, because your mind would soon be at rest. It is plainly the interest of those who vend masses for the dead to leave all uncertain, in order to speculate upon your fears as long as possible. We never heard of any priest deeming masses for the dead unnecessary, so long as the survivors were able or willing to pay for them. Fear is the great secret by which man would wring false good works (and real good money) from his brother man. The great secret of God, on the contrary, to obtain genuine goodness, is, to make faith spring up in man, until it gives him the assurance of salvation. God rejoices the heart in order to obtain from it works done cheerfully and with pleasure. He gives us at once free pardon, the Holy Spirit, heaven, eternity, love, happiness; so that, in our turn, moved by holy gratitude, we may be enabled to love him and to deny ourselves; not out of mercenary calculation, but out of the impulse of the heart. Jesus did not say to the praying thief upon the cross—"Tremble, thou shalt go through purgatory; tremble, and order masses to be said for thy poor, guilty soul." But he said—"To-day thou shalt be with me in Paradise." Not to-morrow, or a thousand years hence, but to-day; not in purgatory, but in paradise! And Jesus said it, not to a little venial sinner, but to a thief. If God then places a penitent and believing criminal in paradise, whom will He put in purgatory? What need of such a place when we are assured that "the blood of Jesus cleanseth from all sin?" What wonder, then, that none of our correspondents have been able to prove the existence of purgatory by any of the Fathers of the first three centuries, who drew their doctrines from the Holy Scriptures of God, and not from human inventions or uncertain traditions?

But to return. The religion of Christ is a religion of love, and not of fear. God demands from us confidence in his full and free mercy, until it produces in us a full though humble assurance of our salvation. He gives us a portion we can never lose, a crown of which we cannot be despoiled, an unquenchable love, an endless life; and it is when we feel ourselves assured of all those blessings, impossible to be lost, that we rejoice with exceeding joy, and say with St Paul—"Who shall separate us from the love of Christ? Shall tribulation? or distress? or famine? or nakedness? or danger? or persecution? or the sword? For I am sure that neither death, nor life, nor angels, nor principalities, nor powers, nor things present, nor things to come, nor height, nor depth, nor any other creature, shall be able to separate us from the love of God, which is in Christ Jesus our Lord."—Rom. viii. 35-39 (Douay Bible).

This indeed is the great source of the peace and joy of the sincere Christian, and which strengthens and animates him in his efforts to sanctify his life, not in order to save himself, but because he is saved by Christ. It is the firm assurance that God has loved him, saved him, endowed him with heaven and eternity, which is the mainspring of his actions. Therefore it is that the Christian does good works with pleasure and earnestness, or rather does them without thinking anything of them, without remembering them, regretting and feeling humbled that he does no more, and regarding it as the highest privilege to be able to contribute in ever so small a degree to fulfilling the will of his God. The desire to do good works possesses him so fully that he is no longer aware of those he does, or at most he is only aware of their fewness and their imperfections; so that the grace which bestows heaven upon him, not only produces in him holy works, but also, and above all, humility, which presses him on to do more and better. The Christian philanthropist can do noble and generous actions out of genuine gratitude to God; the Christian patriot can practise glorious self-denial without the stimulus of ambition or of fame; the Christian philosopher can devote himself to the service of his great Master without a thought of personal aggrandizement either to his order or himself; and such, we think, is doing the will of our Father who is in heaven. And is it not, indeed, a wonderful and heavenly wisdom which, while it seems, by the doctrine of free grace, to dispense with works, is found in fact to enable and induce the penitent and believing sinner to perform them, and thus reconcile every part of that mysterious scheme, which at the same time tells us to work out our own salvation with fear and trembling, and adds, "for it is God who worketh in you to will and to do his good pleasure?"

What then, it may be said, is the difference, for both classes of theologians preach up both faith and good works? The difference is this, that one class, by holding good works to be the foundation, necessarily either lower the standard, by taking a superficial view of men's conduct, or substitute, as we have shewn, palatable duties for irksome ones, or sufferings for morality, with all the human results of dispensations, and indulgences, and observances done for them by others, and by some or all of these modes of self-delusion fail to do the will of God, or persuade themselves, in a spirit of Pharisaical pride, that they can over-do that will, and hand over their superfluous merits and works of supererogation to their fellow-sinners; while the other class, in the true spirit of Christian humility, acknowledge that, after all their exertions to fulfil the will of their Heavenly Father, they are but unprofitable servants;* they have done no more—nay, even much less—than it was their duty to do, and they are ever, like the great Apostle Paul, "forgetting those things which are behind, and reaching forward to those things which are before, pressing forward toward the mark of the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus" (Philippians iii. 13, 14), ever seeking a higher degree of perfection, a more perfect devotion to the glory of God, a more perfect conformity to God's image and character, that they may become meet to be made partakers of the inheritance of the saints in light. Verily "by their fruits ye shall know them," and none shall ever enter the kingdom of heaven but they that thus "do the will of their Father who is in heaven."

We think this not only the clear doctrine of the Holy Scriptures, but even what the light of reason and the daily experience of mankind would lead a reflecting mind to expect; and we may, perhaps, illustrate our meaning by putting a practical question, which will be easily understood and appreciated by many of our readers through this agricultural country. If we were speculating on the probabilities of a man becoming energetic and industrious as a tiller of the soil, which should we think most likely to work hardest to procure an ample harvest or crop out of his farm, the tenant who owes a large arrear of rent, which he can never pay, but from whom, he knows, it will be rigorously exacted to the last farthing, or the tenant whose arrears have been freely wiped off by a wise and benevolent landlord, in the hope that he will exert himself more cheerfully and heartily to perform his engagements for the time to come? Can any one doubt the true answer? and, if not, is it not easy to see how God's way of salvation, by way of free gift, instead of leading to an Antinomian recklessness, and neglect of good works, is the true and only way of effecting real good works, done through the love of God, and in the true spirit of Christian humility, which alone can render them acceptable to "our Father, who is in heaven," and whose great design is, to make us happy with Him to all eternity?

We think, having thus cleared the ground of certain errors, which might otherwise have impeded our inquiry, we are in a position to proceed to consider the momentous question which stands at the head of these reflections; and we shall commence with a subject of deep interest to every thoughtful mind who seriously regards the happiness of his fellow creatures or the good of his own soul, and wishes to make up his mind as to the best mode of securing a heavenly inheritance, either for himself or those who are dear to him.

There is, perhaps, no point in which the Church of Rome and the Church of England and Ireland practically differ more widely than in the encouragement given by the former to what we may denominate the monastic system—the voluntary withdrawal of devout persons, of either sex, from active life, and seclusion of themselves in retired communities, in monasteries, and convents, where they are subjected, under peculiar vows, to strict rules and austerities, which the Church does not impose or consider necessary to salvation in other members of her communion. This monastic state enters so largely into the system of the Church of Rome, and is so highly prized, as if it were the only thing worthy of the name of "religious," that a person accustomed to judge of the external pretensions, rather than the internal vitality of things, might naturally be led to think that there could not be as much disposition to piety in a Church which, like that of England, makes no provision for such places of retirement for devout people, nor even countenances the existence of such monasteries or religious houses, as in a Church which treats them as if they were the only state of perfection to which true Christians can attain in this life, and encourages such institutions as if they constituted the most essential part of true religion.

There are many sincere persons, we are convinced, who are far enough from thinking that they themselves are living in a way pleasing to God or honouring to Christianity, who still plume themselves on belonging to a Church which contains in it so many thousands of "religious" persons, who devote their whole lives to religious observances, which might, indeed, be of some value if it were established, first, that those "professed" in monasteries were truly more devout and pious than all others; and, secondly, that men could be religious by proxy, or without personal virtue, reap the reward promised to the righteous in another world, by reason of the virtues of others; neither of which matters we think at all self-evident, but, on the contrary, requiring proof, and a degree of proof which never yet has been given of them; even if we had not, in our foregoing observations, shown strong reason to believe that human merit is but a false foundation for the salvation of any individual himself, much less of procuring it for another more guilty still in the sight of God.

We shall endeavour to bring forward some of our reasons for believing that the life of monks is not any great help to true devotion, or any proof that true religion prevails most where monasteries and convents most abound; much less that such institutions are necessary to the well-being of the true Church of Christ on earth.

Our first reason is drawn from the historical matter of fact, that about three centuries passed away without any mention of them in ecclesiastical history. Until the Diocletian persecution, in the end of the third century, monkery appears to have been unknown. Some, it is true, led a more than ordinary severe or ascetic course of life, denying themselves lawful pleasures at some particular times, or on some special occasions (as the Nazarites of old), to humble themselves and bring their bodies under, as St. Paul advised the married, but not always to continue so, lest Satan should tempt them; but these men were so far from binding themselves by monastic vows, that they reckoned it in a higher degree praiseworthy for such acts of mortification to be voluntary, than that they should, once for all, force themselves to it, by engaging themselves in a solemn vow, distinct from or above that of their baptism. The best and most self-denying Christians in those purer and primitive ages, neither placed perfection in beggary, by taking on themselves a vow of poverty, nor did they vow, what the Church of Rome now calls chastity, but reckoned themselves as chaste in wedlock; nor did they vow obedience to any self-selected leader, but thought it sufficient to obey the commands of God, and those whom God had placed over them, their governors in Church and State, whose lawful commands they held themselves obliged to obey, for the more regular management of the ecclesiastical body, and the more peaceable government of mankind. And many such, we trust, there still are in the world, who are far enough from assuming the cowl or the veil, but who practise a stricter devotion than others, and by their earnest and constant prayers bring a blessing upon the Church and State of which they are members, and, by the strictness and voluntary severity of their lives, do their best to make some amends for the negligence and viciousness of the age in which they live. May God multiply the number of such men, who, by voluntary self-denial and wholesome mortification, keep their bodies under, and live a strict and holy life, after the pure and holy precepts of Him who came into the world to purchase unto himself a peculiar people, zealous of good works, and shew us "an example that we should follow his steps."

We hope to proceed with this important subject of monastic perfection in our next number.

TALK OF THE ROAD—No. XVIII.

"Well, Jem, I have come at the place that says the Bible is hard to be understood," said Pat one day as they met.

"Well, I was looking out for that," said Jem, "but I didn't know where to find it, though I heard tell it was in it."

"Well, here it is," said Pat; and he opened his Douay Bible at 2 Peter, ch. iii., v. 16.

"Tell us, then, does it bid us not read it?" said Jem in a great hurry, for he was beginning to be afraid, after all.

"Well," said Pat, "wouldn't it be the quare thing to write a letter to a man, and to put at the end of the letter for to not read what was in it?"

"Well, that would be out of the way, surely," said Jem; "but does it tell the man it was writ to, to not show it to any one else?"

"Not a word at all again' reading," said Pat, "that I can find; it says, sure enough, that there's some things hard to be understood; but it surely does not say that it's best not to read."

"Who was it written to at all?" said Jem; and he laid hold of the book to see, but he couldn't make it out, for the beginning of that Epistle only says—"To them that have obtained equal faith with us" (Douay Bible).

"Them must be great Christians, surely," said Jem; "would it be for the likes of us at all?"

"Try your book, Jem," said Pat; for they had got a way of putting the two books together. So Jem tried his book and found it this way—"To them that have obtained *like precious faith with us."

"Well, that would fit us better, surely," said Jem; "but how will we know about it?"

"Well, I made out who it was written to," said Pat; "for see here, at the first verse of the third chapter, he says, 'this second Epistle I write to you.' Now, doesn't that lay down that he wrote one before to the same people, and wouldn't that be the first Epistle? and look here," said Pat, turning over to the beginning of the first Epistle, "see here: this one is written to the strangers dispersed through Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, Asia, and Bithynia. And sure I met Mr. Owens's schoolmaster, and I asked him what places them were, and he told me they were all great countries, every one as big as Ireland; so you see, Jem, this Epistle was written to plenty of people, and would he go for to tell them not to read what he wrote to them? And if he wrote it to such lots of people, would he tell them not to show it to any one else? And more nor that, he wrote it to the very servants themselves in all them countries; for look here (and Pat read the eighteenth verse of the second chapter, Ep. 1,)—'Servants, be subject to your masters, with all fear;' so you see yourself the letter was to the servants, too, as well as to their betters; and isn't that coming near to the likes of us?"

"Well, let us mind the place well, and see what we can make of it," said Jem; for he was taking heart again about the reading, at what Pat said. So they read, "And account the long-suffering of our Lord salvation; as also our most dear brother Paul, according to the wisdom given him, hath written to you; as also in all his Epistles, speaking in them of these things; In which are certain things hard to be understood, which the unlearned and unstable wrest—as they do also the other Scriptures—to their own destruction; you, therefore, brethren, knowing these things before, take heed, lest being led aside by the error of the unwise, you fall from your own steadfastness." (Ep. 2, ch. 3, verses 15, 16, 17.)

"Now," said Pat, "if we weren't to read the Bible, wouldn't that be the place to say it in?"

"Well, that's the place it would fit, if it was to be said at all," said Jem.

"Well, and it isn't said, but only to take heed," said Pat.

"Well, that's true any way," said Jem, "and thanks be to God for that much itself. But still, Pat, sure it's said that the unlearned wrests the hard places to their own destruction; and sure it's little learning the like of us has."

"Well, I'm turning that over in my mind everyway," said Pat, "and I'm thinking that's said just the same of the easy places."

"Show me that again, Pat," said Jem; and he read that part over again, "which the unlearned and unstable wrest, as they do also THE OTHER SCRIPTURES, to their own destruction." "Well, that's it anyway," said Jem; "if there's any good in it at all, it's just as bad against the easy places as the hard places."

"Well now, Jem," said Pat, "what makes the priest read out the Gospel at mass in plain English? Didn't I hear it said, afore now, that the Church allows the easy places, that ignorant people can't wrest to their own destruction, to be read out to them in chapel, and only keeps away the hard places that they might wrest to their destruction for want of learning? Now if the unlearned wrests the easy places to their destruction, just the same way as they do the hard places, why would the one be read to them, no more nor the other? Answer me that now."

"Well, sure enough, Pat, you're right," said Jem; "and if that reason needn't stop the one, why should it stop the other? But let us see what caution St. Peter puts on it." So they read the next verse—"You therefore, brethren, knowing these things before, take heed, lest being led aside by the error of the unwise, you fall from your own steadfastness."

"Now, it's my opinion," said Pat, "if Father John had been at the writing of that verse, he would just have put down in place of it, 'Since you see the danger, don't read the Bible:' but you see, yourself, that St. Peter, that they allow was the first Pope, didn't say that anyway."

"True for you there, Pat," said Jem; "but let us try and make out what caution St. Peter did give us."

So they set to work at that; and says Pat, "I wonder what he means 'by the error of the unwise.' Wouldn't he tell us somewhere what that was?"

So they set to work to read over that chapter well, and at last Pat put his finger on verse 5, and, said he, "why here's people that's 'wilfully ignorant,' and would it be them?"

"Well, them's the scoffers in verse 3," said Jem, "and see here's what they say in verse 4—'Where is his promise or his coming? for since the time that the Fathers slept, all things continue as they were from the beginning of the creation.'"

So they set to study that, and then Jem said, "why them is people that would get up in the last days, and scoff at the promise of Christ's coming to judgment; and here's the reason they have—everything is going on for long enough, just the way it does now, and why won't it go on for ever just the same? Now, would that be 'the error of the unwise,' I wonder?"

"Aye, and them people is wilfully ignorant," said Pat, "and would them be 'the unlearned?'"

"And here's what they were wilfully ignorant about," said Jem, "about the flood that came in Noah's time, and drowned all the wicked."—(Verses 5 & 6.)

"And how would they be ignorant of that, only that they wouldn't read the Bible?" said Pat; "and sure if that's the ignorance, to not read would be the bad cure."

"Well, Pat, I'm seeing it now," said Jem; "them people would not learn what God did to the wicked long ago; and they wouldn't believe what God will do when he comes to judge the world; them's the unlearned, and, belike, unlearned means them that wouldn't learn;* and in course, them people, when the Scripture would come up against that, would have to twist that, till it didn't mean that: and isn't that the way that they would wrest the Scripture, hard places and easy places, to their own destruction; and doesn't that word wrest, show that they are doing it on purpose?"

"And now look here, where he tells us not to be ignorant," said Pat, pointing to the 8th verse, "and see how he makes it out that God isn't breaking his word about coming, but only waiting to save sinners; and see what things he tells them will be when Christ comes, when the fire will burn up the world itself and everything in it; and see here, won't there be new heavens and a new earth according to his promises, in which Justice dwelleth; and look, if it isn't here, that it's looking for the new heavens and the new earth that will make us diligent, that we may be found undefiled and unspotted to him in peace."

"Is there any one at all looking for a new earth, Pat?" said Jem.

"I never heard tell of it before," said Pat, "and how would I look for it?"

"Nor I neither," said Jem.

"Nor none of the people in this country," said Pat.

"And doesn't St. Peter say we shouldn't be ignorant of it?" said Jem.

"And why would we be ignorant of it, if it's that that's to make us diligent?" said Pat.

"And yet its one o fthe hard things surely," said Jem.

"And yet St. Peter writes about it to all them people in all them countries; and to the servants too;" said Pat.

"And where he was talking about hard things, he's just telling them hard things too himself," said Jem.

"And maybe if things is hard, there's more call for the Apostles themselves to teach us about them," said Pat.

"And maybe the hardness is in the things,* more nor in the way of writing about them," said Jem.

"And maybe no one else could speak half as plain, or as sure about them," said Pat.

"Anyway he wasn't wanting to keep the hard things off of them," said Jem.

"And it wasn't by talking to them, but just by writing to them about the hard things, for them to read it, that he wanted to keep them right," said Pat.

"Why, if he talked it to them, that might be easy forgot; and they mightn't know easy, ten years after, just what it was he said," said Jem.

"And if he only talked it to them, how would we get knowing what he said exactly? but when he wrote it, that does for always," said Pat.

"Maybe if he only spoke it to them, it would get about wrong; and maybe some people would allow that he said the Bible was hard, and bid us not read it," said Jem.

"Maybe if he only spoke it, and didn't write it, that would be the tradition in the Church of Rome now," said Pat.

"Well, that it would, with Father John anyway," said Jem; "but St. Peter spoiled that entirely by writing it."

"Well, and now for the caution he put on it all," said Pat.

"Aye," said Jem, "he bid them take heed ——."

"Stop a bit, Jem," said Pat, "I mind now them words is in it before, if we can only come on them and put them together, and see how they fit."

But Pat could not find the words, though he was sure he saw them somewhere; so Jem tried his book, and he found them in Chapter 1, verse 19. So they put the two books together again, and Jem said, "Well, it's take heed in my book, and it's attend in yours, and sure that's all one; and what did he bid them attend to?"

"Well, it's the firm prophetical word in one book, and its the sure word of prophecy in the other; and what's that?" said Jem.

"Sure that would be what the prophets wrote in the Old Testament," said Pat.

"Well," said Jem, "I didn't read much of that, for I found it a deal harder than the New Testament, so I let it alone; but see here, if St. Peter doesn't say of that, 'whereunto you do well to attend, as to a light that shineth in a dark place, until the day dawn, and the day star arise in your hearts?' and didn't he write the letter to servants and all?"

"Then, maybe, if we attend to the hard places, there will light come out of them yet," said Pat.

"Anyway, he bid them attend well to the Bible, in the very same letter in which he bid them take heed, lest they would be led away by the error of the unwise," said Jem, "and sure that wasn't bidding them not read the Bible?"

"It seems it's them that won't think or learn about Christ's coming to judgment, that's in danger to wrest the Scriptures wrong," said Pat; "but them that's still thinking of that day more nor of this day, is to attend to the Scriptures, or how would they know about that day?"

"Well, St. Peter said the great thing about knowledge here," said Jem, and he read the second verse in the first chapter (Ep. 1)—"Grace to you and peace be accomplished in the knowledge of God and of Christ Jesus our Lord."

"And where will we get that knowledge if we don't in the Bible?" said Pat; "wasn't I going to mass for forty years, and knowing nothing? and will I let any one tell me, that I didn't learn more about God and Christ once I took to the reading the Bible than ever I did in them forty years? Don't I know about the piety and the stone? don't I know about the hen? don't I know about the dove? don't I know about the Mediator? don't I know about the blood of Christ? don't I know that them that asks will get, and them that seeks will find? but what signifies talking? won't I keep to the reading?"

"Well, Pat," said Jem, "we have got nothing again the reading yet."

And if ever they do, we will tell it fairly.

* Jem is right about this: the Greek word ἀμαθεῖς means those who would not be taught, and the word "unwise" in v. 17 (wicked in the Protestant Bible) means those who reject and despise laws, ἀθεσμων. So the wilfully ignorant in verse 5, those who will not be taught, in verse 16, and those who despise laws, in verse 17, are three different descriptions of the same persons.

* Jem is quite right about this. The Greek makes it quite plain that the apostle meant, in which things (not in which epistles) there are some things hard to be understood—that is, in the coming of Christ, and the burning of the world, and the new heavens and the new earth, there are things hard to be understood.

THE APOCRYPHA.

OUR readers will probably remember what we said on this subject in our last number—we stated, that of a multitude of lists which the early Church has left us of canonical books, *only three lists contain the Apocrypha—viz., The list in the third Council of Carthage, the list in the epistle of Pope Innocent, and the list in the Roman council, held by Pope Gelasius—and we stated that these three lists bore evident marks of being forged.

This statement has led to some private communications, which induce us to say something more on the subject.

No one seems inclined to deny our assertion, that the lists of Pope Innocent and Pope Gelasius are mere forgeries, made by others in their names, many centuries after those Popes were dead. We might almost take this part of our statement as granted; yet we will give more proof of this presently.

About the list in the third Council of Carthage, however, some of our friends are not so fully convinced, and wish for further satisfaction, which we hope now to give them.

In the first place we observe, that if all the other lists which include the Apocrypha are forged, then, this list of Carthage stands alone; it is THE ONLY ONE in all the records of the early Church that includes the Apocrypha as being among the books properly canonical. This alone would make it very likely that it is a forgery too; and even if not forged, this would destroy its authority. Can any one believe that the Church of Africa alone had the full Bible, and that all the other Churches in the world were wrong? Surely no one would rest his faith respecting God's Word on so absurd a proposition.

But we must examine this list of the Council of Carthage more closely.

Now, all Roman Catholic writers, who have examined the question, admit that the canon† which contains this list, could not possibly have been passed at the third Council of Carthage, held in the year 397, in which we find it now, seeing that it refers to a Pope who was not Pope until twenty years after. Now, how do they get over this? Why, they say that this canon must have been passed by some other Council of Carthage, held afterwards. Very odd, then, that we should find it in the records of this third Council, and that we should not find it in the records of any other council! But they say that in the African‡ code this canon is attributed to a later Council, held in the year 419. But this is altogether a mistake. It is true that the date, 419 (as fixed by the names of those who were then consuls), stands at the head of the African code, as we have it now in Labbe and Cossart, vol. ii., p. 1041; but this is only because the Sixth Council of Carthage, of which that is the proper date, stands first in the code: we have a copy of that Sixth Council, also in Labbe and Cossart, vol. ii., p. 1589, in which there is no list of canonical books; and on comparing this Sixth Council with the beginning of this code, it appears that the proceedings of the Sixth Council only extend down to the middle of p. 1049 of the code; and the list of canonical books does not come in until p. 1061; where it stands among a collection of canons taken from Councils held before 419: so there is no shadow of ground for applying this date, 419, to that list of books. And there is no previous Council from which it can be supposed to be taken, except the Third Council, held in the year 397, in which all learned Roman Catholics confess that this list could not have been passed. And in the code, as given by Labbe and Cossart, we find the reference in the margin is to that Third Council (p. 1061).

The only way to decide the question is this, to inquire whether other writers who lived at the time, or in the following ages, and who had, and used, the African canons, knew anything of such a list of canonical books being among them. If we find that all those who had, and used, the African canons for some centuries afterwards, were all in ignorance of any such list being among them, then we may be sure that the list was put in after their time.

In the first place, we have in Labbe and Cossart, vol. ii., p. 1638, a collection of 105 canons or decrees of African Councils, made after the year 423 (for it contains a letter of the African bishops to Pope Celestine, who succeeded

* St. Augustine's list does not put the Apocrypha on the same footing as the other Scriptures. We shall show this hereafter.

† The word "canon" here means the "decree" of the Council.

‡ Carthage was the chief city in Africa. The councils and canons passed there are sometimes called "Carthaginian," from the city where the Councils were held; and sometimes "African," from the country. The "African code" mean the collection that was afterwards made out of all their councils, so as to form one body of laws for their Church.

Pope Boniface in that year). If ever the list of canonical books was made by any African Council, it must have been made before that year; for the list of canonical books professes to be submitted to Pope Boniface: yet in that collection of African canons, made after Pope Boniface was dead, no list of canonical books is to be found. We, therefore, conclude that the persons who drew up that collection of 105 canons, did not know of any African canon containing such a list.

Our next witness is Dionysius Exignus, of whom we have this testimony from Cassiodorus, a very learned Roman, who, after filling the highest offices in the state, founded a monastery about the year 542, and died, in the government of it, in the year 562. "In our times was Dionysius the monk, a Scythian by nation; but altogether a Roman in manners, . . . who with great force of eloquence compiled ecclesiastical canons which at this day the Roman Church holds in constant use."—Cap. 23, Divinarum Lectionum.

Hincmar, Archbishop of Rheims, who lived in the ninth century, also states that this collection of canons was in use in France in his day.—Du Pin. Eccl. Hist., vol. i., p. 549. Ed. Dublin, 1723.

Dionysius included in this collection the African Code. We ask our readers to take particular notice of this fact; and also that this collection of canons was in use both at Rome and in France.

Another collection was also made by Cresconius, an African bishop, about the year 700, which was also probably in use at Rome. In both those collections the African code was inserted. Now, the question is, was the list in question then in those collections? We say it was not; that those who then put the African code into their collections knew nothing of such a list being in it.

We are quite aware that the list is in the copies of their collection,* as we have them now. This does not surprise us; because if that list was forged, it was, of course, forged for the very purpose of putting it into these codes which were in use at Rome; and it was only put into the Third Council of Carthage, in order that it might be put into these collections too. Now, the question is, was this list in the collections which Dionysius Exiguus and Cresconius made, or has it been put into their collections in later times? We are content to rest the question on the answer to this.

And we have an answer—the plainest and most decisive that we could wish.

We have a letter from Pope Nicholas I. (Labbe and Cossart., vol. viii., p. 797), written in the ninth century to bishops in France—a memorable letter, which we shall have occasion to refer to again. In that letter, Pope Nicholas was arguing against those who maintain that they were not bound to receive what was only to be found in the decrees of Popes; but that they were bound only by the decrees of Councils. Against this, Pope Nicholas argues as follows:—"Why should we waste time further, since if these persons are to be listened to, neither would we now receive the Divine Scriptures themselves of the New and Old Testament; FOR NEITHER OF THESE IS FOUND INSERTED IN THE CODE OF ECCLESIASTICAL CANONS. . . Among the canons is found a summary of the holy Pope Innocent, by whose authority it is taught that either Testament is to be received by us, although in the canons themselves of the Fathers, NEITHER OF THEM† is contained, inserted as so many." Here Pope Nicholas expressly affirms that the question of the number of canonical books rested wholly on the list of Pope Innocent; and that there was no list of the kind in the canons of the Fathers. It is clear, then, that he knew of no list sanctioned by St. Augustine, the greatest of the Fathers, in the canons of Carthage. And since Cassiodorus has told us that the list of Dionysius Exignus, which contained the African canons, was in use at Rome long before that time, and Hincmar tells us it was in use in France at that very time, it is clear that there could have been no such list in the African canons then, but that it has been added since.

We have some further evidence still. We have lists of the canonical books left us by two African bishops, who lived in the next century after that Council of Carthage—Junilius Africanus, and Primasius, Bishop of Adrumetum. Speaking expressly of the books of Judith, Wisdom, and the Maccabees, Junilius asks—"Why are these books not among the canonical Scriptures? Answer: Because among the Jews, also, they were received under this distinction, as Jerome and others witness."—(De Partibus Divinæ legis lib. i. c. 3.) Primasius, in his Commentary upon the Apocalypse, c. iv., says (according to an interpretation common among the Fathers), that by the twenty-four wings and the twenty-four elders, St. John alludes to "the books of the Old Testament, which of that same number WE RECEIVE by canonical authority."

It is clear that these two bishops had never heard of any law or decree of the African Church (to which they both belonged) receiving six more books, as of canonical authority. Hence we conclude that this list now in the 3rd Council of Carthage did not exist in their day.

One word now about the light which the letter of Pope Nicholas throws on the pretended list of Pope Gelasius and his Council of seventy bishops. That Council is pretended to have made a canon, or decree, containing a list of canonical books, in the year 494. Pope Nicholas, in the year 865, says there was then no such list in the canons of the Church. Put this along with the fact, which we showed in our last number (p. 112. Col. 3), that the Pope's own ancient copy of that Council of Gelasius contains no list of canonical books, and who does not see that the list now in it must be a forgery, put into it after the ninth century?

Now for Pope Innocent's list. It is contained in an epistle which pretends to have been written by him, in the year 405. The list of canonical books stands at the end—just the place where a forger would add it in after times. No one appears ever to have heard of that list of Pope Innocent's for FOUR HUNDRED AND SIXTY YEARS after the date of that letter! Of this we have proof. Cresconius, who wrote at the end of the seventh century, professed to show the agreement between the canons of the Councils and the epistles of the Popes: he quotes that very letter of Pope Innocent's six times, to show its agreement with the canons of the Councils in six points; but when he comes to speak of the list of canonical books, he says nothing at all of any list made by Pope Innocent, clearly showing that no such list was in that letter in his time.

We hear of Pope Innocent's list FOR THE FIRST TIME in the ninth century, AFTER a great mass of forgeries of letters of Popes (which our readers will hear of in a future number) had been published and imposed upon the Church.

Even in that age, Pope Nicholas says there was no list yet in the canons of the Church, and he then produces the list of Pope Innocent for the first time, and that, too (as we shall shall show hereafter), in a letter written for the very purpose of imposing those forged letters on the Church as true and genuine documents!

These be the lists that the Church of Rome chiefly relies on to prove that the Bible, as settled at the Council of Trent, was the Bible of the ancient Church!

It is almost needless to show how these three lists differ from each other; but it is useful as showing, that even when the forgeries were committed, the forgers had not themselves agreed on what books they would put into the Bible.

The earliest copies of Innocent's list contained no book of Tobit.*

The Carthaginian list contained no book of Baruch; and as it stood in the MS. copy of Cresconius's collection, and in all the Greek copies, it contained neither of the two books of Maccabees.†

The list of Gelasius, besides being wholly left out in the Pope's own copy, is given differently in almost every copy in which it is found.—(Berhard in Canon. Gratiani, vol. ii. p. 316.)

We might fairly leave it to our readers to decide upon this evidence, whether the six apocryphal books be indeed a portion of God's inspired Word, and received as such by the early Church. But the vast importance of the subject makes it deserving of still further evidence. What can be more important than to know what is truly the Inspired Word of God to man?

But the question is still further important, as involving the infallibility of the Church of Rome. If she be proved to have erred on this great and vital question, what pretence can she have to infallibility at all? If the Church of Rome has been deceived herself by forged documents, or if she have tried to deceive others by forgeries, her infallibility is equally destroyed.

Our readers, as yet even, can have but a faint notion of the abundance of proofs which the Church, for FIFTEEN CENTURIES, has left us that Rome has erred in this great point.

In our next and following numbers, we will take each century in order; and produce the testimony of all ages, all nations, all Churches, to the fulness and completeness of the Protestant Bible.

THE LAND OF EYES.

WE have had occasion, in more places than one in this number, to discuss the question of the infallibility of the Church of Rome. This is a subject to which we invite our readers' most serious attention, because it is in reality the main point of dispute between Protestants and the Church of Rome. There are, it is true, a number of articles of faith, which Rome is charged with adding to the doctrines of Christ. Still discussion on these is but a battle of outposts; infallibility is the citadel. If the doctrine of the infallibility of the Church could be clearly and certainly made out, we should be obliged to assent to all the articles propounded by the Church, however little other evidence there might be for them: nay, however strong might seem to be the evidence against them. On the other hand, if Roman Catholics were to gain the victory upon every other point (such as transubstantiation, indulgences, the necessity of confession, &c.), but to fail in proving the infallibility of their Church, that Church would be convicted of an atrocious usurpation, both in declaring itself the only Church of Christ and in setting up her word as equal, if not superior, to God's word in the Scriptures; in short, this doctrine of infallibility is like the king at the game of chess, where it matters not how many other pieces are lost or won—it is the fate of the king which decides the battle.

A doctrine so important evidently requires to be established by very good proof. And there are other facts which make it still more incumbent on us to require strong proof for this doctrine. We know that God has bestowed upon us reason, and we must suppose that this, like his other gifts, was intended to be used. And the Roman Church confesses that the Scriptures are unquestionably the Word of God, and therefore one would suppose deserving of being carefully studied by all who acknowledge their Divine origin. But, if this doctrine of infallibility be true, all exercise of the reason on religious matters becomes injurious, and the Scripture itself is reduced to a dead letter, since Christians are to put on its statements, not the meaning which the words seem to bear, but the meaning which the Church is pleased to assign to them. In this system much respect may be expressed in words for the Bible; but its position is like that of the monarch in those countries where the king reigns, but does not govern, where the king may have all the honour, but the minister has all the power. He whose interpretation of the law must not be questioned, has the same power as if he had the actual making of the law.

We only put forward these considerations as suggesting the great necessity of good proof for the Romanist doctrine. If the Scripture be the Word of God, nothing short of the clearest revelation can entitle the interpretations of sinful men (call them church or what you will) to be placed on an equality with the Bible. He who claims to interpret the law infallibly must prove his right as clearly as the lawgiver established his own; otherwise the law will be given in vain, since the interpreter whose decision must not be contradicted can make the law say what he pleases. Let those, then, who claim this power over the Scriptures prove their case as clearly as it has been proved to us that we are bound to believe and follow Matthew, Mark, Luke, John, Paul, and the other writers of the New Testament. Through their writings we hear them speak every day and hour. If we are to turn away from them, in order to listen to the Pope—if it be our duty, when they say white, and the Pope says black, to take his sense as their meaning—their whole value depends on what he is worth: their inspiration is dross if his infallibility be not gold. Now, in plain honesty, are Rome's claims to be the infallible interpreter of Scripture equally good with those of the Scripture to be God's word? Have the Pope and his bishops as good a title to declare to us what it is that the sacred writers really say, and what they ought to have said, though they said it not, as those writers themselves had to declare the will of God to mankind? This is the case that the Romanists have to make out. If they fail, all their structure flies off in a cloud of dust.

Now, when we come to see what kind of proofs the advocates of the Church of Rome offer for this important proposition, we have reason to be amazed at their want of solidity. They present us with proofs from reason that an infallible guide would be a very comfortable thing, and would relieve us from a great deal of anxiety; while from Scripture they have not a single direct statement—nothing but the most far-fetched inferences. We suppose there is not a text in the Bible which they think speaks more decisively in their favour than the celebrated text, "Thou art Peter, and on this rock will I build my Church;" and yet see what a slender foundation it affords for the enormous castle that has been built upon it. They argue, 1st.—In this text our Lord conferred on St. Peter the prerogative of being, during his lifetime, the infallible guide of the Church. 2nd—That prerogative was continued to St. Peter's successors. 3rd.—St. Peter was Bishop of Rome. 4th.—And the Bishops of Rome are his successors. Now, as to the first proposition, we shall merely say, that whatever interpretation we give to this text must be consistent with the undoubted fact, that the Apostles did not consider St. Peter as a Head whose decisions must be implicitly followed (see Luke xxii. 24; Acts xi. 2; xv. 7; Galatians ii. 11.) But what shadow of Scripture proof can be offered for the other three propositions? St. Peter was a rock (as his name signified), and his faith in Christ was made the foundation of the Church, when he proclaimed it at Jerusalem, and converted about three thousand souls. But is it not a barefaced assumption to set up a succession of rocks, or foundations, as if the Church of Christ was to be built anew every nine years, on an average? Let the Church have been founded upon the faith of Peter; we are willing to stand on that foundation, but we will not be shifted from Pius to Gregory, and from Gregory to Pius, in never-ending succession. The very alarming consequences that have been so violently extorted from this text are well illustrated in a little parable, published a good many years ago, which we lately met with, and with which we shall close this article, leaving the interpretation to the ingenuity of our readers:—

"There was in days of yore a man who travelled in search of knowledge to distant and unknown regions. In his pilgrimage he met with strange men and strange customs; but the most curious of all his adventures was this:—He once had entered a new territory, and was approaching a large town, which rose at a distance, when, just in the act of crossing what he imagined to be the first turnpike-gate on the road, two men, one in black, the other in gray robes, stopped the way. He thought they came to ask for a foot-toll; but their demand was quite of another nature. One of them had a thick bandage in his hand; the other was furnished with a candle, some sealing-wax, and a large seal. Our traveller asked the meaning of those im-jdements, and learnt with astonishment that, by the law of the country, he must submit to having the bandage placed over his eyes, sealed with the arms of the government, and then give himself up to be led by the hand as long as he lived. If ever he attempted to remove the bandage, or was found trying to peep under it, the law condemned him to death. Justly alarmed at this statement, he was turning his back upon the strangers; but they collared him, declaring that, as he had crossed the gate, he could not be allowed to return.

"As there was no hope of escape for the present, he humbly entreated to be informed why he was to be deprived of the use of his sight, and kept for life in darkness, under the flood of sunbeams which heaven poured daily upon the world. To this the eldest of the strange men made answer:—'Many generations have passed away since the throne of this country was filled by a king, whose wisdom and goodness greatly surpassed that of the wisest and best of men. This king had a minister, to whom he gave a surname, which, in the language of our forefathers, signified EYES. It happened on a certain day, that the king, sitting in council with minister EYES, and his other ministers, twelve in all, proposed a question, about which many things were said, but none to the purpose. EYES, who certainly was a very quick and able man, observing the perplexity of his brethren in office, came forward with such a short and neat answer, that the king, to express his great satisfaction, broke out into these words: EYES, you well deserve the name you bear, for you are EYES, and through your eyes all my kingdom see. These words of our king we consider as the fundamental law of this realm; and from them we conclude that it is the duty of the people to renounce their natural sight, and to see through the eyes which our king appointed for his subjects.'

"Astonished at this account, and perceiving that the two strangers were not disinclined to a little more conversation, the traveller asked whether that great man, minister EYES, was still alive? 'No, no,' replied the man in gray, with a smile; 'he has been dead nearly two thousand years.' 'Indeed!' exclaimed the traveller; 'how then can he see for all the people here?' 'You seem, my friend,' replied the man in black, 'rather dull of apprehension; do you not understand, that since EYES was to see for all other men, some one must for ever occupy his place?' 'Did your king say so?' rejoined the travellers. 'Our king did not say anything about the matter,' answered the gray man with rising anger, 'but he could not but have meant it.' 'Allow me once more to inquire,' said the traveller, 'how is it you find a supply of successors to EYES?' 'We have some notion,' said one of the turnpike men, 'of the spot where it is said that he died. We accordingly choose one of ourselves to be EYES' successor; and when we have seated the person so elected in a chair, on that very spot, we take him to be in every respect as good to see for others as old EYES himself.'

"Here the unfortunate traveller lost all patience. 'So then,' he cries, 'I am to lose the use of my eyes, because you choose to understand literally a figurative expression, which a child could not mistake. But what a huge mountain of suppositions and inferences you go on to raise on that contemptible ground! Because your old minister had a penetrating understanding, and while he lived could be what his master called him, the EYES—that is, the guide, of his people—you take upon yourselves to set up a succession of men, who, be they ever so dull and stupid, are yet to be recognised as EYES for all the world, and to have the right of blindfolding us all. But how comes it that neither of you wear a bandage? 'Your impudence deserves another kind of answer; but I will bear with you a little longer,' said the man in black. 'There are many thousands like ourselves in this kingdom; we are EYES' eyes; and through us the people are to see all that old EYES would see for them if he still were alive. But as you wish to live,' he added with great solemnity, 'let me put the bandage on your eyes, and do not be obstinate about a point established beyond all doubt, by that saying of our great king—'EYES, YOU ARE EYES, AND BY YOUR EYES SHALL ALL MY KINGDOM SEE.'"

DUBLIN, NOVEMBER, 1853.

THE vastest truth or the vastest falsehood which has ever agitated the world, is the doctrine of the Church of Rome's infallibility. If that doctrine be true, millions of human souls have been lost for ever for not believing it. If it be false, millions of human souls have been lost for trusting to it. Surely it behoves every man, who regards his own safety and that of others dear to him, to examine this vast structure and its foundations carefully, and satisfy himself whether it be built upon a rock, and supported by pillars strong enough to bear its weight, or whether it rest on an unsound and shifting foundation, in which latter case he might discover, when too late, that he was like the foolish man spoken of by our Blessed Lord, in his Sermon on the Mount, "who built his house upon the sand, and the rains fell, and the floods came, and the winds blew, and beat upon that house, and it fell, and great was the fall thereof."—Matt. vii. 26, 27 (Douay Bible).

What an almost infinite amount of dreadful distractions, divisions, persecutions, errors, and mischiefs which have arisen in the world about the truth or falsehood of the pretensions of the Church of Rome, would have been prevented, if God had been only pleased to say in the Scriptures—"I have constituted the Church of Rome the mother and mistress of all Churches, and made the Bishop of Rome my vicegerent upon earth, and an infallible interpreter of my will to all my people, to guide them into all truth." If those propositions be a true exposition of God's will, we think they would have been as plainly stated in God's written Word as it is stated, again and again, "He that believeth in the Son shall have everlasting life;" and if one could venture to trust one's reason so far as to argue that anything must be so, because it would be useful or fitting that it should be so, we can see no possible answer to the argument that it would have been wholly inconsistent with the goodness of God, and His plain desire in giving us the Scriptures, and the care of Christ over his Church, to omit in the Bible a point so all important (if it be true) as the infallibility of the Church of Rome, on which all the rest was to depend, when doctrines of so much less concernment are plainly recorded, and over and over again repeated, in the Scriptures. If God had intended the Pope or Church of Rome for so great an office, reason and common sense proclaim that He would certainly have said so, very plainly and very frequently, or if not frequently, certainly sometimes; once, at least, surely He would have said so in express terms, so that none but those who wilfully shut their eyes could fail to see it.

Those who trust their reason sufficiently to argue that there must be a living and speaking judge to decide differences about the interpretation of the law, because otherwise controversies would be endless, might surely as well argue that God has not given us such a judge, or He could not have failed to point him out to us, or left us in the dark as to who he is, and where he is to be certainly found.

If it were as evident and certain that God hath appointed the Pope or the Church of Rome to be the guide of faith and judge of controversies, as that the Queen hath appointed such a one to be Lord Chancellor or Lord Chief Justice, we admit such a guide would be very valuable, and easily available, to preserve the Church in unity, and conduct men's souls to heaven. But a judge that had no better evidence of his title to his place, than the Pope has to that which he pretends to—a judge that is doubtful, and justly questionable whether he be, indeed, a judge or not—we think would be, in all probability, likely to produce just the opposite effects, and to be himself one of the greatest subjects of controversy and difference between men, as in point of fact we actually find to be the case with respect to the Church of Rome.

Whether Protestants be right or wrong, true Christians or heretics, there are millions of them in actual existence in England and Ireland alone, who still deny, as their ancestors have for centuries denied, the title of the Church of Rome to guide mankind, and who will neither take for granted that title without proof, or assume that Church to be infallible merely because she herself says so; but who are ever ready to retort the argument—"It is necessary there should be an infallible judge, therefore there is such a judge: by the argument, that "God has not provided, or ever said He has provided, such a judge; therefore such a judge is not necessary." And, indeed, we think all fair men, who venture to exercise their understandings in a priori reasonings, would admit, that if the doctrine of the Church of Rome be true—that an infallible judge is of such necessity, that without him we cannot understand, and are not even bound to believe that the Scriptures are the Word of God, and that submission to that judge is necessary to our salvation—it would be a thousand times more incredible that God (to whom all our present controversies must have been foreseen) should not have left us some mention of it in the Scriptures, than the contrary proposition would be—viz., that He should have not given us such a judge at all, because He considered such a judge unnecessary for us. If we were to consider usefulness a sufficient proof of the existence of anything, by a similar argument we could clearly prove that every Pope must have been a good man, and every priest infallible, and all the translators of the Bible infallible; and, more than all, that the doctrine of the Pope's supremacy and infallibility must be engraven upon every man's heart, or at least so plainly revealed in God's written Word, that none but the most wilful and obstinate heretics could deny it, none in fact except such men as it would be, according to the same rule, fitting and useful were God to send down fire from heaven to consume them.
